

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

LE
W

Weekly

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

DEVOTED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF

POLITICS, OF SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC TENDENCIES, OF HISTORY, LITERATURE, AND THE ARTS

VOLUME 1

From May 17, 1919, to December 31, 1919

IN TWO PARTS: PART II

154908
98/4/20

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

INDEX TO VOLUME 1

MAY TO DECEMBER, 1919

(Numbers 1-33)

BRIEF COMMENT—AT HOME

	PAGE		PAGE
ADVERTISING and "Publicity." [J. I. Clarke's Speech at the Financial Advertisers Assn.]	509	Repeal of [Wilson's Veto].....	200
Aliens.....	441	Defacing Old New York [Four Corners at Ninth Street].....	223
American Indian, Survival of.....	179	Delafield's [Miss Charlotte] Appointment as Secretary to La Guardia.....	694
American Legion.....	28	Deportation of Criminal Aliens.....	572
American Legion: Tipping.....	508	Disloyalty.....	528
"American Legion Weekly".....	178	Duelling [Bryan].....	244
America's Debt to Germany.....	551	EASTMAN, Monk, Regeneration of.....	3
America's International Relations.....	507	Eastman's [Max] Defense of the "Proletarian Revolution".....	222
Applied Psychology.....	288	Education: Advertising.....	3
Art: Freer's (Charles L.) Collections.....	440	Americanization.....	2
New York's New Court House and the Art Commission.....	694	Colleges and Public School Pupils.....	695
Russian Artists, Society for Aid of [New York].....	509	Colleges and the Cost of Living.....	509
War Memorials.....	29, 71, 137	Colleges, Columbia—Professors' Salaries.....	653
Tax.....	49	Colleges, Harvard's Ideal and Lowell (James Russell).....	529
Athletics: Army.....	49	Colleges—Hazing.....	440
Army, Organized.....	201	Colleges, Princeton—Campaign for Funds.....	672
Baseball.....	92, 441	Colleges, Professors, Salaries.....	463, 613
Competition Necessary.....	49	Colleges, Publicity Concerning Contributions.....	463
Compulsory.....	157	Endowment for Harvard's Physical Training of Freshmen.....	397
Golf.....	93	Greek and Latin.....	509
Physical Training of Freshmen [Harvard].....	397	Medical, Rockefeller's Gift.....	463
Automobile Races.....	71	Patriotic Pledge Required of Public School Children.....	671
Aviation: Appropriation Necessary.....	549	Public School vs. Private School as a Preparatory for College.....	694
Commercial.....	244, 486	Einstein's [Prof.] Theory.....	573
Congressional Appropriation Necessary.....	549	Embargo on Talk.....	612
Mail Service.....	28	Employment: Bureaus.....	2
Safety of.....	49	Soldiers.....	156
Transatlantic Flights.....	3, 29, 113	England and America's Friendship.....	591
BOLSHEVIK Conditions in Russia. (Isaac Don Levine in the Globe).....	592	English and American Democracy.....	591
Bolshevism and Governments.....	91	FARMERS and Labor.....	632
Bolshevism: Anti Meeting forbidden by Police.....	200	Federation of Women's Civil Service Organizations, Work of.....	352
Atlantic Monthly Article.....	178	Finance: Advertising and "Publicity" [J. I. Clarke].....	509
Bolshevik Government's Relations with Germany [Documents Proving].....	396	Budget [Loree].....	136
Bomb Plot.....	69	Gold Standard and W. J. Bryan.....	612
Convictions of I. W. W. Plotters and the Law's Delay.....	693	High Prices, Cause (Governor Harding and the Post).....	332
Deportation of Aliens.....	572	High Prices [Literary Digest].....	179
Farmers' Attitude [International Farm Congress].....	632	National Budget System, Economy.....	551
Foreign-Language Periodicals.....	441	Reconstruction in Europe, Aid Needed [Vanderlip & Davison].....	47, 114
Hagwood's [Norman] Attitude as Minister to Denmark.....	693	Trade and Its Payment.....	288
Intellectual Radicals.....	653	War Saving Stamps.....	137
Mitoor (Robert).....	528	Fire Department's (New York) Resolutions Against Strikes.....	396
"New Social Order" and Norman Angell.....	572	Ford, Henry: Libel Suit.....	221
Omaha Riots, Responsibility for (Gen. Wood) "One Big Union".....	462, 527	Fraud: Senator Newberry's Election in Michigan.....	631
Origin of America's (Lusk vs. Noske).....	572	Free Speech: Suppression of (Post Office Department).....	652
Our Policy Towards.....	612	Frick's [Henry C.] Will.....	653
Propagation of.....	352	GLASS'S (Carter) Appointment to the Senate.....	592
Soviet [William Allen White].....	178	Government Ownership [Hurley].....	265
Suppression of.....	136, 571	HAZING: Death at Colgate University.....	440
Winnipeg's and Ours.....	136	Hotel Rates.....	288
"Books and the News" in the Review	551	Housing: Building and the Closed Shop.....	652
Books, Buying of.....	672	Building, Increase of [Springfield].....	222
CALENDAR: Reorganization of.....	115	Financial Aid Needed.....	48
Capital, Attack on [Max Eastman].....	222	Mortgages Recommended Exempt From Federal Taxation.....	71
Charities: National Information Bureau.....	487	Howells and the "Short Story Taught in Forty Lessons".....	672
Citizenship in a Democracy.....	267	IMMIGRATION: Bureau's Policy Toward "Undesirables".....	612
Committee of Forty-Eight and Liberty.....	694	Japanese Anti-Legislation (Phelan).....	507
Committee of Forty-Eight and the "Plain People".....	652	Return of Immigrants.....	115, 396
Committee of Forty-Eight, Questionnaires.....	309	Industries: Tariff Protection.....	157, 177
Community Recreation Exposition.....	672	Intellectual Radicals.....	653
Congress and Reconsideration of War Resolution [Evening Sun].....	612	Ireland: Congress and Sinn Feinism.....	91
Congress: Aviation Appropriation Necessary.....	549	Sinn Fein Propaganda [Sir Edward Carson].....	199
Daylight Saving Law.....	71	JACOBI, Dr. Abraham.....	200
Disloyalty in.....	528	Japanese Question in California (Phelan).....	507
Fraudulent Election of Senator Newberry.....	631	Jewish Philanthropies Fund.....	396
Housing, Exemption of Mortgages from Federal Taxation Urged.....	71	Journalism and Fairness.....	352
Plumb Bill, Action on.....	287	Judiciary: Renomination of Judges [Newburger].....	265
Senate's Objection to Publication of Ludendorff's Memoirs.....	352	KING Albert and Cardinal Mercier's Reception in America.....	461
Treaty With France.....	177	LABOR: American Federation, Rejection of Bolshevism.....	137
Vote on Resolution of Sympathy With Sinn Fein Republic.....	91	Appeal for Increased Production and No Strikes [N. Y. State Fed.].....	351
Conscientious Objectors.....	178	Building Trades and the Closed Shop.....	652
Constitution, Birth, Celebration.....	373	Butler's Address: "The Real Labor Problem".....	485
Cost of Living: Colleges.....	509	"Capitalism" and the New Republic	591
Decrease Through Imports.....	288	Conference (Washington), Cause of.....	485
Extravagance.....	29	Farmers' Attitude [International Farm Congress].....	287, 331
Income Greater Than Expenses [National Federation of State Farm Bureaus' Interview With President].....	310	MAYLIGHT-SAVING: New York Board of Aldermen Passes Law.....	509
"Middleman's" Profits, Price of a Hotel Dinner.....	310	Repeal of.....	71, 115
Prohibition, Effect of.....	310
Wages [Railroad Brotherhoods].....	287, 331

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
State (Non-Partisan League) and Single Tax	222	Wilson's Message to Senate [Reasons for Entering War]	199	Submarine Warfare, Opposition to (von Tirpitz)	485
State (Non-Partisan League), Trial of Townley & Gilbert	352	Wilson's Methods in Relation to the Treaty	671	Submarine Warfare, Responsibility for (von Bethmann-Hollweg)	551
"Stars and Stripes"	288	Wilson's Tour for the Treaty	395	Surrender of Officers Accused of War Crimes (Lersner)	652
Strikes: Actors	93	Wilson's Speech in Paris (International Law Society)	1	Treaty, Acceptance of	135
Car Strike [Pittsburgh]	114	Wilson's Welcome in California	418	Von der Goltz and D'Annunzio, Analogy	462
Coal, Leaders Yield to the Government	571	Wilson and a Parable	92	War, Admiral von Tirpitz's Reasons for Its Loss	463
Coal, President's Plan for Settlement	527, 652	World's Latin Memorial Tablet	374	War, Responsibility for	47, 463, 572
Coal, Settlement of	652			War, Responsibility for Prolongation [Erzberger]	243
Coal, Violation of Contract	527			Great Britain: Coal Strike	243
Fire Department's Resolutions [New York City]	395	BRIEF COMMENT—ABROAD		Coal Strike Settlement	461
Police (Boston)	418, 572	AMERICA'S International Relations	507	Defeat of the Cabinet	528
Police, Coolidge Refuses to Take Back	572	Austria-Hungary: Brutality of the Hungarians White Terrorists (Authority for)	441	Democracy Compared with America's	591
Strikers	353	Marriages and the Hapsburgs	528	Effects of the German Payment of Indemnity	311
Public Utilities	287	Rumania's Refusal to Sign Treaty with Austria	396, 486	Hostile Movements in America	332
Railroad Brotherhoods, Wilson's Address	417	Rumania's Separate Peace with Austria	27	Hostility (American)	48
Steel	310	Treaty	27	Labor and the Pilotage Act	528
Subway, Cause of	310	Aviation. Transatlantic Flights	3, 29, 48, 113	Lady Astor's Victory	632
Subway, Need of Legislation	310			Lloyd George and Economy	508
TARIFF: Protective	157, 177	BELGIUM: Dr. August Borms, Punishment of	397	Lloyd George and Party Conflict	651
Tax: Income, Fraud	136	Electors, Results	593	Navy's Anti-Submarine Operations	611
Income, State Law [Non-Residents]	288	Libre Belgique	137	Poet-Laureate [Dr. Bridges]	267
Single and Non-Partisan League	222	Bolshevism: Fugitives' Accounts	550	Prince of Wales's Visit to the United States	591
Tobacco (Anti) Crusade	266	German and American (Noske)	572	Revolution, Resistance to	92
W. C. T. U.'s Methods	613	Isaac Don Levine's Accounts in Russia	592	Salvage of Germany's Sunken Ships	266
Trade: Abnormality of Our Relations With Europe [J. S. Alexander's Speech at International Conference]	509	Jews in Russia	396	Soviet Government (W. Allen White)	178
Effect on Cost of Living	288	Kolchak and Denikin Oppose	592	Guatemala: Cabrera Notified by State Department Not to Stand for Re-election	309
Trade-Marks, Protection of	179	"Nationalization of Women"	29
Treaty and Covenant: Arguments on	69	Propagation of	352
Bullitt's Disclosures	395	Russian Atrocities [Embry]	155	HOLLAND: Ex-Crown Prince and Court Life	528
California's Opinion	418	Russian Government's Relations with Germany [Documents]	396	Holland and the Ex-Kaiser	441
Compromise Necessary	265, 309, 373, 417, 439, 571	Russian Propaganda	631	Hungary: Coalition Cabinet, Formation of	632
General Smuts and the Nation	178	Socialists' Attitude	632	Rumanians and Archduke Joseph	331, 396
Lloyd George and Partisan Strife in Senate	651	Strikes	550	INTERNATIONALISM vs. Patriotism	613
McCumber's Argument	395	Bulgaria: Terms of Peace Breed Discord in Balkans	418	Ireland: Sinn Fein, Congress's Vote on Sympathy	91
Meeting of President and Senate Committee	309	Thrace and the Peace Conference	332, 418	Sinn Fein Propaganda in America [Sir Edward Carson]	199
Opposition to	27, 47, 507			Sinn Feinism and the Scotch	353
Party Issue (Borah)	47	CANADA: Bolshevism [Winnipeg Strike]	92, 114, 136	Wilson's Attitude	70
Questioning of Lansing by the Senate Committee	287	Strikes and the Law	353	Italy: D'Annunzio and Fiume	396
Ratification Outlook Promising	507	China: Loan	28	D'Annunzio and Fiume, Abstain From Action Against	418
Ratification Urged	439, 611	Christmas Superstition and Wine	695	D'Annunzio and Lincoln	440
Ratification Urged (Chamber of Commerce)	651	Cuba: Cost of Living and Prohibition	351	D'Annunzio and Revolution	612
Ratification Urged (Farwell Company)	550	EDUCATION	374	D'Annunzio and Von der Goltz, Analogy	462
Ratification Urged (Paderewski)	418	Einstein's (Prof.) Theory of Light	573	Electors, Results	593
Ratification Urgent [American Rights League]	332	FINANCE: Germany, Indemnity [Erzberger's Plan]	199	Elections, Claims to at Peace Conference	1, 440
Ratification Urgent [Lansing]	417	Loan to China	28	Riots	200
Rejection (Knox)	351	Reconstruction, Aid from U. S. (Vanderlip)	47	Socialists and Bolshevism	632
Rejection, Responsibility for	91, 221, 571, 651, 671	Solvency of the Allies	419	War Debts and D'Annunzio	419
Rejection, Results (Baker)	462	Unrest Due to the Depreciation of the Dollar (British Authority)	3	JAPAN: Shantung	1
Rejection, Results (Daniels)	508	Flemish Activist Leader	397	Shantung Amendment	351
Rejection, Wilson's Responsibility for	671	France: Clemenceau and the Academy	374	Shantung, Assurances from Japan Required	243
Republican Party (Lodge)	27	Clemenceau's Speech at Strassburg	550	Shantung, Defense of (Baron Goto)	486
Reservations, Vote Required to Pass	221	Clemenceau, Vote of Confidence in	244	Shantung (Phelan)	507
Reservations, Explanatory [McCumber]	155	Electors, Legislative	593	Shantung, Senate's Vote	351
Reservationists, Moderate	571	Electors, Results	592, 593	Viscount Ishii's Departure from Washington	113
Shantung, Amendment	351	Finance and Reconstruction	612	Jazz, Origin [Le Matin]	114
Shantung, Foreign Relations Committee's Vote	331	Hostility to Germany	70	MAETERLINCK'S Dedication to Those Who Died in War	672
Shantung (Phelan)	507	Internationalism vs. Patriotism	613	Mexico: Bull Fights Revived	593
Wilson's Lack of Frankness in Discussion	417	Langue's Attack on the Treaty	419	Lansing's Note re Jenkins	631
Wilson's Methods in Relation to	671	Removal of Our Dead	266	Villa Raids	135
Wilson's Tour	395	Socialists and Bolshevism	632	NORWAY: Prohibition	486
Vatican's Influence [Sherman]	136	Treaty, Criticism for Our Failure to Ratify	671	POLAND: Paderewski and the Disbanding of the Army	418
Voting Power	439	Treaty, Signing of	156	Pogroms, Investigation	70, 136
UNITED States Army: Athletics	49, 201	Treaty with U. S.	177	Silesia Conditions-Reports	508
Bonuses	374, 508	Wilson's Speech Before International Law Society (Paris)	1	Proportional Representation and Obligatory Voting	613
Court-Martial Code, Amendments to	266	GERMANY: Alldeutscher Verbund (Pan-German League)	462	RECONSTRUCTION: Financial Aid Needed [Vanderlip and Davison]	47, 114
Courts-Martial, Congressional Investigation Needed	463	America's Debt to	92	Rumania: Refusal to Sign Treaty with Austria	396, 486
General Wood's Resignation	693	America's Policy During Occupation	572	Separate Peace with Austria	486
Gold and Silver Chevrans	48	Bernstorff and Propaganda	572	Russia: Blockade of Soviet-Russia	550
Pershing, Rewards	373	Bolshevism and Noske	572	Bolshevik Russia, Conditions (Fugitives' Accounts)	550
Russian Policy	27	Constitution	440, 652	Bolshevik Russia, Conditions (Isaac Don Levine)	592
Size of, if League is Rejected (Baker)	462	Dryander (Dr.) and the ex-Kaiser	572	Bolsheviks and Denikin	592
Soldiers, Employment of	156	Flame-thrower [Erzberger's Suggestion]	333	Bolsheviks' Relationship with Germany	396
Universal Service [Wadsworth Bill]	287	Haase (Hugo)—Death of	593	Bolshevism, Atrocities [Embry]	155
Universal Training [Chamberlain-Kahn Bill]	265	Income Tax and the Right of Self-Determination	672	Bolshevism ("Nationalization of Women")	29
United States Navy: Dress	115	Indemnity [Derburg]	91	Bolshevism, Propagation of	352
Mine Sweepers	611	Indemnity [Erzberger's Plan]	199	Jews and Bolshevism	396
Newspaper [The Hatchet]	92	Indemnity, Payment, Effects of	311	Kolchak, Attack [Bullard]	222
Size of, if League is Rejected (Daniels)	508	Indemnity, Reply of the Allied Powers to Germany	113	Kolchak Needs American Support for Triumph of Democracy	309, 332, 592
United States Refuses Export Licenses to Soviet Russia	551	Indemnity, World Trading Necessary	222	Kolchak's Disaster	592
Unpopular Review Changed to Unpartisan Review	136	Labor, Hours of	485	Policy (America's)	27, 592
WAR: Benefits from [Lodge]	135	League of Nations, Entrance to	70	Soviet Government, Propaganda	631
Charities (National Information Bureau)	487	Ludendorff's Story of the War, American Suppression of	352	Treaty and Covenant (Soviet Government)	2
Conscientious Objectors (Baker)	178	Marriages of German Girls with American Soldiers	309	United States Refuses Export Licenses to Soviet-Russia	551
Gas, Effects [Sibert]	156	Muhsam (Erich) and Communism	528	SILESIA (Upper), German and Polish Reports Socialist and Catholic Parties Dominant Since the War	613
Ludendorff's Story, Publication and Senate Preparation For [Graham's Attack on the Council of National Defense]	177	Particularism of Individual States (Prof. Preuss)	652	THRACE: Peace Conference's Decision	332, 418
Reasons for Entering [Wilson]	199	Prussian Influence [Dr. Schiffer]	652	Treaty and Covenant: 1, 2, 113, 135, 156, 178, 243, 331, 351, 419, 486, 507, 651, 671
Results, Extravagance	29	Psychology of	1	Turkey: Sultan Enthroned as Chief of Islam	47
Winning of [Haig]	201	Rhine Provinces, Secession	69
Wilson Administration: Appointment of Hapgood to Denmark	693	Scheidemann Advocates Union Between Minority and Majority Socialists	572
Attitude Towards Ireland	70	Scheidemann Denounces Noske	419
Bullitt's Disclosures	395	Schids, Sinking of	135, 266
Wilson Congratulates Gov. Coolidge	549	Silesia, Conditions—German Reports	551
Wilson's Appeal to Railway Brotherhoods, Lack of Firmness	331	Sinking of Ships, Damages for	653
Wilson's Attitude Toward Republican Party	651, 671	Statuary and the War	653
Wilson's Lack of Frankness in Discussing Treaty	417	Strikes and Bolshevism (Borsig Concern)	550
Wilson's Memorial Day Address	70
Wilson's Message on the Plumb Bill	287

WAR: Admiral von Tirpitz's Reasons for Its Loss 463
 Detrimental to Liberalism..... 613
 Responsibility for 47, 463, 572
 Responsibility for Prolongation [Erzberger]..... 243
 Submarine, Opposition to (von Tirpitz)..... 485
 Submarine, Responsibility for (von Bethmann-Hollweg)..... 551
 Winning of [Haig] 201
 Wells [H. G.] and His World History..... 374

EDITORIAL ARTICLES

ACADEME Unbends [College Commencement] 140
 Actors' Strike and Others, The..... 314
 Admiral Scheer Speaks Out..... 182
 American Finance and World Restoration..... 269
 American Legion, The..... 7
 American, Portrait of an..... 637
 Anarchist, A Sweetly Reasonable..... 269
 Anti-Submarine Campaign, The..... 95
 Armenia's Danger..... 512
 Army, Disorganizing the..... 248
 Army Plans, The New..... 421
 Art Homeward Bound..... 270
 Artists' Haven, An..... 533
 Austria, Exit..... 32
 Austria, The Peace Treaty with..... 377
 Austrian Terms, The..... 247

BACON (Robert): A Reminiscence..... 75
 Baltic Menace to Peace, The..... 490
 Bartender, The Passing of the..... 161
 Bernhardt Carries On..... 268
 Bessarabia..... 553
 Blakelock, R. A..... 314
 Bolsheviki, The Parlor..... 656
 Books, Winter's for..... 697
 Boston, The Real Issue In [Strike]..... 398
 Botha (Louis)..... 355
 Bring it to a Head [Treaty]..... 245
 "Broken Pledge, The"..... 594
 Brotherhoods, The Country and the..... 267
 Bulgaria, The Peace with..... 676
 Bullitt's Testimony, An Analysis of..... 444

CAPORETTO, Accounting for..... 335
 Cardinal Mercier..... 399
 Carnegie, Andrew..... 291
 Coal Crisis in Great Britain, The..... 224
 Coal Situation, Lloyd George Faces the..... 334 College Back Again, The..... 378
 College in the Middle, Parting the..... 119
 College Salaries and College Quality..... 315 Committee's Proposal, The [Treaty]..... 377
 Conference, The Hitch at the [Labor]..... 510 Conference Under Way, The..... 488
 Congress, The New..... 31
 Country and the Brotherhoods, The..... 267
 Court-Martial Reform..... 52
 Crisis in Siberia, The..... 312
 Cutting Down the Corpse..... 596

DANGER of Deadlock, The (Treaty)..... 487
 Daylight Saving Fight, The..... 357
 Debtor Class? What Has Become of the..... 491
 Deportation, The..... 695
 Direct Action and the Public [Strikes]..... 292

EDUCATION—Its Constant Values..... 97
 England in Persia..... 356
 Es is Nicht Wahr..... 657
 European Neutrals and the League..... 656

FARMER Draws the Line, Where the..... 555
 Farmer's Profits, The..... 615
 Fjume, Kiaochow, and the Pledge to France..... 5
 Flights, The Ocean..... 204
 Flivver Mind, The [Henry Ford]..... 226
 Food, Reflections on Cooked..... 33
 France, Decentralization in..... 577
 France, The Pact with..... 179
 Free Discussion in the Schools..... 51
 Free Speech, The Issue of..... 634
 French View of the Treaty, A..... 677

GARDENS Threatened, American..... 271
 German Constitution, The..... 313
 German Version of Archduke Joseph's Coup, A..... 401
 Germany in Africa..... 74
 Germany Not Russanized..... 183
 Germany Submits..... 137
 Government Control, Some Lessons from..... 93

HIGH Prices, The Chief Cause of..... 614
 Holland and Belgium..... 420
 Homer on an S. P..... 53
 Housing and Prices..... 247
 Hungarian Tangle, The..... 292

INDEPENDENCE Day, Thoughts For..... 158
 Industrial Organization, Progress In..... 118
 Industry Upon Principle, Basing..... 419
 Inflation and Prices..... 311
 Intellectual Armageddon..... 575
 Italian Imbroglion, The..... 139

JAPAN Reconsiders..... 696
 Justice Holmea's Dissent..... 636
 Justice," The "Passion for..... 633

KAUTSKY'S Exposure..... 699
 Kolchak and the Peace Conference..... 117
 Knox Resolution, The [Treaty]..... 115

LABOR, American, Against Class War..... 93
 Labor and Capital to Talk it Over..... 399
 Labor Conference, The..... 464
 Labor Conference, The New..... 615
 Labor, Now for a Genuine Conference on..... 530
 Labor, The Future of..... 354
 Labor, The Position of..... 673
 Land Values and Congestion..... 94
 Lawlessness and Human Nature..... 595
 League, European Neutrals and the..... 656
 Legion, The American..... 7
 Let the Country Speak!..... 611
 Literary Profiteers, A Bas..... 357
 Lloyd George Faces the Coal Situation..... 334
 Ludendorff and von Tirpitz, The Apologies of..... 400

MINERS, The Country and the..... 552
 Moment's Halt, A..... 467
 Money and Prices..... 654
 Motor Boating After the War..... 183

NORTH Dakota Coalition, The..... 180
 "Not Just Yet"..... 616

OBLIGATIONS and Reservations [Treaty]..... 333
 Open Letter to Senator Hitchcock, An..... 461
 Opportunity of the Seven, The [Treaty]..... 353
 Osborne (G. M.) Seaman 2..... 227
 Our Relations to Russia..... 73

PACT with France, The..... 179
 Peace and the Future, The..... 4
 Peace with Bulgaria, The..... 676
 Photo Music..... 423
 Physician, A Great [Dr. Oslér]..... 249
 President and Senate [Treaty]..... 201
 President and Senate Getting Together? Are [Treaty]..... 290
 President? Prophet or..... 116
 President Returns, The..... 157
 President's Health and Democratic Duty, The..... 653
 President's Tour, Results of the..... 442
 Prices, Money and..... 654
 Prices, The Struggle Against High..... 289 Privileged Classes, The New..... 225
 Production, Distribution, Happiness..... 202
 Progress in Industrial Organization..... 118
 Prohibition Means, What Constitutional..... 72
 Protests, German and Other..... 50
 Psychology of Woodrow Wilson, The..... 30
 Public and the Packers, The..... 576
 Public Strikes, When the..... 531

RATIFICATION with Caution..... 464
 Religion Pure and Undefined..... 181
 Reports that Call Red Pink..... 575
 Republic Without Republicans? A..... 617
 Restriction of Output..... 422
 Review, The..... 6
 Revolution by Conspiracy..... 443
 Revolution, New Style..... 159
 Rhode Island's Protest [Prohibition]..... 697
 Rifle in the Army, The..... 161
 Roosevelt, The Americanism of..... 511
 Root versus Knox [Treaty]..... 138
 Russia, A New Chapter Opening in..... 510
 Russia, Our Relations to..... 73
 Russian National Movement, The..... 676
 Russia's Plight..... 554

SCHOOLS, Free Discussion in the..... 51
 Seamen's Strike, The..... 246
 Senate and Shantung, The..... 223
 Senate, The Situation In the [Treaty]..... 398
 Shantung, The Senate and..... 223
 Siberia, Our Duty in..... 378
 Siberia, The Crisis in..... 312
 Single Tax, The Astor Fortune and..... 513
 Socialist Vote in New York City, The..... 574
 Spellers, Unbinding the..... 205
 Strike and Others, The Actors'..... 314
 Strike and the Law, The..... 552
 Strike, Another Week of the Steel..... 466
 Strike, The Seamen's..... 246
 Strike, The Steel..... 442
 Summer Reading..... 141

TRANS-Siberian, Guarding the..... 489
 Treaties, More Secret..... 203
 Treaty, A French View of the..... 677
 Treaty? Life or Death for the..... 594
 Treaty Still in Danger, The..... 531
 Truth and the Newspapers, The..... 673

UNREST and Distrust..... 75

VLADIVOSTOK, The Crises at..... 465
 Voices in the Air..... 573

WEALTH, The Wickedness of Invested..... 160
 Weir, Alden..... 675
 When the Dew is on the Corn [Daylight Saving]..... 532
 Wilson (Mr.) on the Stump (Treaty)..... 376
 Wilson (Woodrow), The Psychology of..... 30
 Woman's Chance in Public Affairs..... 597
 Working Day, The Shortened..... 336

SPECIAL ARTICLES

AMERICAN Commission in Syria, The Ameen Rihani..... 252
 American Family in Recent Fiction, The. H. W. Boynton..... 15
 Amy Lowell's Collection of Modern Verse..... 240
 Andreyev [Leonid] and the Bolsheviki. L. Pasvolovsky..... 638
 "Anti-Wilson," H. de W. F..... 424

BARRIE Plays in Print. O. W. Firkins..... 20
 Belgium's Annexationist Claims. A. J. Barnouw..... 187
 Big Five and the Problem of Monopoly, The Investigator..... 578
 Bolshevik Russia, The Latest Witness from. D. Aronson..... 446
 Bolsheviki, Leonid Andreyev and the. L. Pasvolovsky..... 638
 Bolshevism, The Two. J. Landfield..... 598
 Bolshevik Propaganda Ninety Years Ago. G. Myers..... 369
 Book Stalls, Among the Old. L. Williams..... 503
 Books and Debarcation. W. A. Slade..... 174
 Borden (Sir Robert). J. K. F..... 702
 British Labor, The Example of. J. L. Laughlin..... 143
 British Press, The. E. S. Roscoe..... 153
 Budget, An Executive. J. T. Pratt..... 55

CANADA, Conditions In. J. K. F..... 121
 Canada, The Orange Convention in. J. K. F..... 328
 Canadian Industrial Conference. The. L. J. B..... 452
 Canadian Situation, The. J. K. F..... 172
 Canadian Trades and Labor Congress, The. J. K. F..... 220
 Capitalism and the Proposed Alternative. W. J. Ghent..... 272
 Caveat Negotiator [Treaty]. R. Hayden..... 229
 Civilization Failed? Has. H. de W. F..... 165
 China's Reaction to the Shantung Settlement. Kuang-Ti May..... 251
 Church of England, The Established. E. S. Roscoe..... 687
 Coal Strike, The Threatened. E. W. Parker..... 534
 Commissar Disillusioned, A. J. Landfield..... 447
 Constitution, The Birthday of the. D. J. Hill..... 381
 Courts-Martial. G. W. Martin..... 471
 Covenant, An Examination of the. E. S. Corwin Creel (Mr.) and the Non-Partisan League. E. H. Nicholas..... 101
 Cultivating the Fundamentals, On. A. G. Keller..... 297
 Cummins Bill, The Fatal Defect. T. F. Woodlock..... 425

D'ANNUNZIO (Gabriele). V. de Santo..... 517
 Debate on the League. H. de W. Fuller..... 142
 Democracy, The Workings of. F. J. Whiting..... 448
 Deporting Undesirables, As to. S. Reid..... 468
 Dramatic Performances in London. W. Archer..... 109
 Dryden (Mr.) Meets Mr. Milton. R. D. Havens..... 110

EDUCATION, Post-War. A. G. Keller..... 275
 Education, The Larger. F. Watson..... 524
 Embargo on Talk, An. R. A. Gram..... 620
 England's Disillusion. E. S. Roscoe..... 619
 "English A" in France. R. P. Utter..... 348
 English Political Parties. E. S. Roscoe..... 412

FALL of Princes, The. A. J. Barnouw..... 162
 Familiar Misquotations. H. Ayres..... 194
 Financial Situation, The. G. E. Roberts..... 606
 France, A Voice From..... 173
 "Fed Up With the French." Major, A. E. F..... 76
 Freedom of the Seas, The. C. F. Goodrich..... 209
 French Call Water "Lo," Because the. S. Dewey French Stage During the War, The. W. H. Scheiney..... 218
 Frenchmen, Sticking Labels On. S. Dewey..... 250

GREAT BRITAIN and Ireland. E. R. Turner..... 99
HERMAN Melville. F. J. Mather, Jr..... 276
 Herman Melville II. F. J. Mather, Jr..... 298
 History That Might Have Happened, Some. G. E. Partridge..... 217
 Horace in the "Dry" Light. M. Monahan..... 566
 Hoover Going to Do? What's..... 478
 Hungarian Tangle, The. Examiner..... 535
 Hungary, Impressions from..... 701
 Hungary's Communist Experiment. Examiner..... 185

IMPECUNIOUS Idealism. W. Archer..... 479
 Industrial Conference, A Spectator at the. A Spectator..... 586
 Intensive Vacationing. H. Ayres..... 391
 Is There a Huge "Social Surplus"? A. O. Luvejoy..... 163
 Italian Farming, The Backwardness of. W. H. Johnson..... 640
 Italo-Yugoslav Controversy, The. Leo Pasvolovsky..... 120
 Italy's Point of View. H. N. Gay..... 403
 It All Depends [Free Speech]. G. Myers..... 261

KINGSLEY (Charles): A Centenary Notice. O. J. Campbell..... 107
 Kolchak Attacked? Why is. J. Landfield..... 273
 Kolchak, The Attempt to Discredit. J. Landfield..... 184

LABOR in the Peace Treaty. Watcher..... 556
 Labor Not a Commodity. J. L. Laughlin..... 678
 Lahor, The Example of British..... 143
 Land Ownership in England. E. S. Roscoe..... 567
 League, Debate on the. H. de W..... 142
 Leagues, A Lesson in International. L. J. B..... 639

THE REVIEW

LITERARY
MAY 27 1919
UNIVERSITY

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 1

New York, Saturday, May 17, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	1
Editorial Articles:
The Peace and the Future	4
Fiume, Kiaochow, and the Pledge to France	5
The Review	6
The American Legion	7
The Soviet Fiction. By Jerome Landfield	8
Thoughts on the New Worlders. By Harold de Wolf Fuller	9
Wandering Between Two Eras. By Stuart P. Sherman	10
Correspondence	13
Poetry:
Hungarian Rhapsody. By Harry Ayres	14
Book Reviews:
The Cult of Self-Reliance	14
The American Family in Recent Fiction. By H. W. Boynton	15
Swinburne's Letters	16
Philosophy as It is Taught	17
The Run of the Shelves	18
War Posters. By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr.	19
Barrie Plays in Print. By O. W. Firkins	20
War Inflation. By George E. Roberts	22

GERMAN psychology has long been a byword for absurdity and perversity. But the psychology of the German reception of the peace terms is neither absurd nor perverse, but normal and human. The terms are not so severe as extremists on either side of the Atlantic may have desired them to be, but they are of stunning severity. Nor can the fact that the Germans have for several months had abundant notice of what was awaiting them be regarded as sufficient reason for expecting them to view the fateful decree with serenity or resignation. That is not human nature. The depression and sadness with which we await the blow that impends when all hope has been abandoned is no protection against the sense of the cruelty of fate that overcomes us when the blow has actually fallen. And in the case of the Germans there is much more than this. One element of hope had been with them from the moment they began their negotiations for an armistice to the day on which they received the terms. In making the Fourteen Points the basis of the peace they looked not only to the specific content of those points, but to the influence which they expected Mr. Wilson and America to exercise in what they conceived to be the spirit of the President's utterances in general. Right or wrong, it would surely be a harsh judge who would censure them for indulging in this expectation. There are plenty of reasons for finding fault with German conduct since the armistice as well as before; but in the sudden access of rage and despair which they have shown on learning the hard truth, they have acted only as the people of any other nation would act in a like situation.

IN leaving Japan unconditional tenant of Kiaochow with much of the Shantung peninsula, the Peace Treaty goes far to diminish the authority of the Covenant of Nations. Kiaochow was one of the few clear cases before the Conference. The German lease was extorted from China on the pretext of compensation for the slaying of the German ambassador by the Boxers. Germany capitalized her affront outrageously, and, in a region where shaky titles abound, hers was morally and legally the worst. Japan drives out Germany and assumes her "rights." The Peace Conference acquiesces in the iniquity. The official press murmurs smoothly of the compromises inevitable in human affairs. Now Japan's occupancy of Shantung is not a compromise, but a flagrant breach of the letter and spirit of the Covenant. In consenting to it Mr. Wilson has cancelled one of the fairest pages in American diplomacy. The only apology made for the surrender is that otherwise Japan would not have joined the League of Nations. As it is, she joins having first shown that she declines to be bound by one of its constituent principles. An added chagrin to those who hoped most from the League is that the united wisdom of the present world has been less able to moderate Japan's aggressiveness than was John Hay single-handed.

IN comparison with Kiaochow the rival claims to Fiume were highly confusing, with much right on either side. It is perplexing then to find that the Conference, which had yielded readily where it should have stood firm, stood firm where it might well have compromised. A man who is stubborn where his case is weak and yielding where his case is strong hardly inspires confidence. Something of this vacillation at the Conference may be ascribed to the inevitable weariness of the delegates. They have tried to do too much in too limited a time, and thereby they have sacrificed within the Conference the ordinary deficiencies of deliberate procedure, and without the Conference decision and judgment. The issue of Fiume, being involved in the treaty with Austria, is still open. It is to be hoped that the Conference will give weight to such considerations as these:

(1) Italy has virtually waived the treaty of London and is willing to have the entire Adriatic question reopened and settled on its merits.

(2) Mr. Wilson's major contention that Fiume is a necessary outlet for Jugo-Slavia is false. There are plenty of ports down the Eastern Adriatic needing only development and proper railroad facilities.

(3) In a matter of grave doubt it is absurd to give the benefit of that doubt to an ambiguous congeries of late foes and present friends such as is Jugo-Slavia. Italy as a real nation and unquestionably a friend is entitled to the benefit of such doubt.

(4) The Italian claim to Fiume is based on the fact that the Istrian peninsula is and should be treated as a geographical unit. To effect this Italy will make concessions elsewhere.

(5) Italian Irredentism is not solely imperialistic. It comprises loyalty to fellow Italians in political adversity; it has its idealistic side. Fiume is an Italian city racially.

As we go to press it seems as though the settlement would be about as we have suggested above. To save face Italy may be appointed temporarily as mandatory over the regions she is later to control. Mr. Wilson's excessively harsh and highly irregular handling of the Italian question is in unpleasing contrast to his silent acquiescence in the surrender over Kiaochow.

THE President's speech before the International Law Society in Paris furnishes some indications that Wilson the shrewd political leader has for the time being supplanted Wilson the idealist. In reminding his audience that people must not expect "immediate emancipation from the things that have hampered and oppressed them," and especially in saying that "you cannot throw off the habits of society immediately," the President strikes a refreshing note of common sense. If he had not been preoccupied with a programme which should settle the whole world drama once and for all, he might have heard this same warning sounded in increasing volume even before he left for Europe on the first of his two visits. And it is not fanciful to attribute political intent to a certain collocation of ideas in a subsequent passage. In the course of his remarks on reconstruction he says: "The spirit of America responded without stint or limit and proved that it was ready to do that thing which I was privileged to call upon it to do." That our whole-hearted entrance into the war should thus be given the color of an American approval of the President's peace programme must strike any one as strange who remembers the outcome of the Congressional elections upon which Mr. Wilson in advance placed so much importance. The moral of all of which is that Wilson the idealist is fortunate in having as a counterpart Wilson the politician. The combination would be still more effective if the two moved forward side by side, an arrangement calculated to produce sound statesmanship. If, instead, they often are not within hailing distance of each other, that may be charged to single-track facilities.

THE Russian Soviet Bureau in New York is bitterly indignant over the contrast between what the Peace Conference has done about Russia and the promise held out to her by the sixth of President Wilson's fourteen points of a "welcome into the society of free nations, under institutions of her own choosing." Instead of such a welcome, says the Bureau, the Allies seem to have "one purpose only—to impose upon the Russian people institutions which are not of their own choosing." Whatever may be the plans or purposes of the Allies in regard to Russia, the one thing that seems quite certain in the situation is that the institutions under which the people of Soviet Russia are now living are not "of their own choosing." All the choosing has been done for them by a small fraction of the people, who seized power by force at a time of general upset and impotence and have held it by force ever since. The Soviet emissaries may either deny this or say that, though true, it has nothing to do with the case; but their indignation—and that of their American sympathizers—might possibly be mitigated by the consideration of two other circumstances. One is that there has thus far not been the slightest indication, on the part of the Allies, of a desire to interfere with any form of government which the Russian people may establish by their free choice. The other is that no desire has been more flagrantly shown by the Bolshevik rulers, alike in words and in deeds, than that of upsetting the established government of every civilized country in the world. But to the Bolshevik mind it is a poor rule that works both ways.

IN the passage at arms between Mr. Peek and Secretary Glass, the Secretary of the Treasury has decidedly the best of it. The late Chairman of the Industrial Board of the Department of Commerce rakes the Administration fore and aft, and his statement is a spirited bit of writing. But it is anything but convincing, and it winds up with a series of accusations which sound particularly wild. Nothing could be neater than the way in which Mr. Peek's query, "Does the Administration plan for 1920 a platform of State Socialism which it now finds inconsistent with the results achieved by the Board?" is disposed of in the Secretary's reply. He makes no reference whatever to the charge or to State Socialism, but he quietly says:

The attempt made to fix minimum prices for the public seemed to me wholly indefensible and contrary to fundamental principles of economics, of public policy and of the law.

Surely the healthy restoration of industrial life and activity is not to be found in the perpetuation and exaggeration, months after the cessation of hostilities, of the artificial conditions which in war time were tolerated as necessary evils. The Treasury has consistently striven since Armistice Day for the removal of all governmental restraints, controls, and interferences.

No more wholesome utterance has come from Administration quarters in many a long day. If it can be regarded as representing a general policy, we may all breathe more freely on the subject not only of State Socialism, but of various insidious approaches to Socialism, than we have recently felt warranted in doing. But the real test will come in the Administration's dealings with the railroad situation.

AMONG a number of important social agencies that have been crippled by the failure of the last Congress to pass necessary appropriations, are the employment bureaus. We do not refer here to the Bureau for Returning Soldiers and Sailors, but to local agencies. These have faced a winter of uncertainty and discouragement which have rendered impossible the free, confident, and untrammelled discharge of their functions. Local agents have not known, from month to month, whether they could hang on till help came, or whether they must shut up shop and abandon an enterprise that met a crying need. State aid has tided some of the bureaus over, so that they have a chance of recovery if Congress can be persuaded to grant stimulus at once. It is superfluous to point out the exceeding importance of these bureaus. The whole situation succeeding the armistice resolved itself into a need of reabsorption and redistribution of labor. Demobilization of war-industry alone threatened a condition of unemployment that could not but make for popular discomfort, complaint, and unrest. The local agents have acted as a buffer between discontented and even resentful men and willing but distraught employers; and their service in dropping oil upon local areas of friction and heat can not be overestimated. Their function has been, like that of the local draft-boards, of an unostentatious, but none the less vital character. That they should be freed from their present and undeserved impasse is a pressing national need; we hope that Congress will be alive to the necessity of immediately relieving them.

THE agency par excellence for Americanization is the public school. It is the formative years that produce the complex of ideas, ideal habitudes, and traditions which make the American. Said a shrewd Roman priest: "Give me the first six years of a child's life, and you others can have the rest." It is, therefore, in the highest degree necessary, if the "melting-pot" is to turn out a consistent and genuine product, that the public school shall be kept up to the highest possible level of excellence. But a school, like a home, is not a geographical location—a mere matter of latitude and longitude—nor yet is it the mass of inorganic matter which we fashion and pile up and call an "institution." It is an atmosphere. And, as the atmosphere of the home is generated by the guiding personalities in it, so is the atmosphere of the school generated by those who supervise and give instruction. If we want good schools, the sine qua non is good teachers. But the good teacher is a specialist or an artist comparable with the good doctor or preacher, and cannot be picked up at any street-corner. He must also possess character, in addition to technical equipment. He must have quality, and quality is something that must be paid for. The laborer of this order is certainly worthy of his hire. Yet the profession of teaching stands a chance of progressive impoverishment by reason of the inadequacy of its material rewards. The teacher may be willing, and generally is, to take the vow of poverty; but he will not continue always to take that of penury. He can not give out the virtue that is in him if he is never free from petty and sordid harassment. If we are anxious to Americanize—and there is nothing that we should be more intent on doing, in our own interest, if for no loftier reason—we must not be blind to this vital method, must not neglect it in favor of methods of more immediate impact but of less fundamental and less comprehensive character.

A HIGH British authority recently expressed his deliberate conviction that of the social unrest now prevalent throughout the world, eighty per cent. must be ascribed to the fall in the purchasing power of money. However this may be in general, it is safe to say that the dissatisfaction which is taking shape in the formation of the Middle Classes Union in England is mainly due to this cause. When the money unit falls in value—and the fall which we have been experiencing in the last few years is beyond all precedent—the adjustment which in the course of time restores normal relations is nowhere so slow as in a large section of what may be called the middle classes. In the case of the wage-earner there is a painful interval, but on the whole the time of his suffering from the dislocation of prices is not apt to be very long. Salaries are far slower than wages to respond to the pressure; and incomes from interest-bearing investments do not respond at all. The government official, the college professor, the permanent employee of almost any firm or private corporation, has to pull through as best he can on his old salary, or a salary but little increased, while the prices of everything he needs for himself and his family have gone up to unheard-of heights. The hardship is truly a grievous one, and the wonder is that the complaining is not louder and more insistent than it is. It must be remembered, nevertheless, that the forces of adjustment, though slow-working in this domain, are yet constantly operative—that the grievance, however serious, is not of a permanent nature. Whether by any scheme of automatic adjustment, such as that proposed by Professor Irving Fisher, relief could be obtained without inviting troubles more serious than those it removes is one of the interesting questions of the day.

AS this goes to press the rival armies of two nations are still camped on the bleak Newfoundland shore waiting on wind and weather. The stage remains set for the greatest sporting event of modern times. As between American and English contenders, it would seem that the Americans had the better chance of achieving a more limited objective: our naval fliers are using three multiple-engined seaplanes of great power and carrying capacity, machines capable of landing on the water and riding out anything short of a real storm; and they will make no attempt at a continuous, non-stop flight, but will proceed from Newfoundland to the Azores and thence to Spain. The preparation of the Americans has been scientific, deliberate, without hurry, and with a painstaking care for the elimination of avoidable error; they have gone about the great adventure in a businesslike way, and they stand a businesslike chance of being the first human beings to cross the Atlantic Ocean by air. The British, on the other hand, are striving for a greater and more elusive stake; with single-engined land planes of great speed they will try to jump the North Atlantic from Newfoundland to Ireland in one splendid mad rush; engine trouble means well-nigh certain disaster. Their venture is infinitely the more sporting, and measurably less likely to succeed. Should our naval men be lucky enough to get there first, there will still be plenty of glory for the intrepid Britishers if they can cap the American climax with an English non-stop flight; let us hope that this will be the outcome, and in the meantime let every Anglo-Saxon sportsman wish them Godspeed and sweet running engines—they deserve more and they can't cross the Atlantic with less.

THEY say that when Monk Eastman was examined for the draft the army surgeons found his body fairly covered with knife and gun-shot wounds. Each of these scars was a dishonorable one, representing not one, but many, lawless acts—for not even his best enemy in the New York Police Department but would admit that the famous gunman commonly gave better than he received. Now if you don't know offhand who Monk Eastman is, this is no time to sketch his picaresque career. It is enough to say that he was perhaps the most notorious gangster and all-round handy man with gun and knife that New York has ever known; bold, crafty, cruel, brave, unscrupulous and undisciplined. He served in State's prison, was discharged, caught up by the draft, sent to France and fought through the war. The other day he came back to America with his division, received his discharge from the army, and returned to private life—but not to the exercise of that citizenship which he had forfeited with his prison sentence. So he returned to private life, but with a couple of more wounds—honorable scars this time—received in battle, and with his company commander's rating of "Excellent" on his service-record, which is the highest rating a soldier may receive. He had in addition a decoration for valor, and letters from his platoon and regimental commanders which recited, among other things, that Private Eastman had shown himself to be self-controlled, unselfish, hard-working, brave and well-disciplined; that he had been a distinct credit to himself, to his regiment and to his country; and that his country ought to take cognizance of these facts by restoring him to full citizenship. And the other day Governor Smith signed certain papers which officially place Private Eastman where unofficially and in fact he has been for these many months—among those who are pulling their weight in the boat. Queer, fine, big thing, this army of ours has been: we haven't seemed to need a Foreign Legion in which to bury our scamp fighters; scalawag and parson, banker and bootblack—but what's the use of moralizing? The facts have done that.

NOWHERE has the millennial circus more enthusiastic barkers than among the advertising purveyors of educational opportunity for the millions. Would you get what you want,—wealth, beauty, renown, health, friends? For five dollars I will send you an exact replica of Fortunatus's cap, easy to adjust; may be worn during sleep, thus necessitating no detention from your regular business. Would you become a convincing talker and talk your way into the presidency of your concern within the week? A postal brings one of Demosthenes' pebbles; placed beneath the tongue it will raise your salary to $7,500 a year; cheaper and quicker than the now out-of-date Blarney Stone. Are you efficient? Self-reliance is the basis of efficiency. Mail this coupon and receive Emerson's course in self-reliance; the life-long application of the principles here laid down brought him an income of $50,000 to $70,000; you may do even better. Does your memory fail you? Follow the simple directions worked out by "Memory" Thompson (price five dollars) and remember the contents of every shop window you pass, the telephone number of every man you meet; you never can tell when this information may be useful. Thus the chorus; and a public, avid of self-improvement, pays its money and passes into the side-shows in sufficient numbers, apparently, to keep the cry merry and full. Our modern sophists will teach anything for a price. The royal road even is no longer sought; Socrates sits idly by, and gains the ear of not a single one of those who throng the democratic speedway. Ancient universities anxiously consider how they may transform themselves into sightseeing vehicles a little more sumptuously appointed and doing the circular tour of the new heaven and the new earth with even greater despatch than can be promised by the purveyors of correspondence courses. Such active bidding for an opportunity to afford light must arise from some genuine desire for it among large masses of men; but if the leaders themselves are dazzled into something like blindness, the awakening in the inevitable ditch will be rude indeed.

The Peace and the Future

ON the seventh of May, 1919, the curtain rose on the last act of the stupendous drama upon which for nearly five years the interest of a thousand million human beings had been absorbingly directed. The coincidence of the date with that of the startling crime which, four years before, had set fire to the smouldering indignation of America, did not pass without notice; but in the presence of an event so fraught with mighty consequences, and so weighted with grave problems, even the poetic justice which linked the spectacle of Germany bound and helpless with the defiant criminality of the Lusitania massacre could not claim more than a fleeting thought. But, vast and complex as is the mass of considerations which the publication of the terms of settlement brings forward, there are two aspects of it which, in the general mind, hold a dominant place. These are indicated in two phrases which, throughout the war, were constantly on men's lips and in their thoughts—"a peace of justice" and "a lasting peace." Whatever differences of opinion there may be among us, we have all agreed in fervently hoping for a peace that shall justify both these designations; and for us all the crucial question is whether the actual settlement fulfills this hope.

The justice of the settlement presents on its face little room for doubt or perplexity. Germany is to be utterly shorn of the power of military aggression; she must relinquish territory acquired by recent or remote conquest from France, from Denmark, from Poland, from China; she must forego her dreams of expansion in Africa; she will have to bear the burden of paying many billions of indemnity in reparation of the ruin she has wrought; she must accept, from the standpoint of a Great Power, the second of the alternatives which, as one of the leading spokesmen of her ambition put it, she deliberately confronted in undertaking the war—world-power or downfall. But there is to be no crushing indemnity such as Lloyd George talked about in his campaign speeches and as was demanded by many voices in France; there is to be no such economic boycott as was apparently planned by the famous Paris Conference of 1916; there is to be no dismemberment of Germany nor any interference with her internal organization. Her place as a Great Power she had used to the working of immeasurable calamity, of wrong beyond precedent, of evil surpassing the worst that the imagination of the civilized world had been able to conceive as possible; and she has lost her place as a Great Power. Surely this is not more than justice; and if it is less than justice, it is less only as the meting out of justice must in all the affairs of mankind be kept in restraint by the dictates of humanity and good sense.

But there is another aspect of the question of justice which we can not altogether ignore. We can not expect the German mind to accept the view which, to the mind of the world at large, is established beyond dispute. And unfortunately there has been more than one declaration, from the highest sources, upon which the Germans can fall back as justification for dissent. The distinction between the German Government and the German people had been put forward with such solemnity and such emphasis as unquestionably to raise hopes which are now seen to be impossible of fulfillment. Sharply faced with the facts as they are, everyone sees that no practical application of the distinction can be made; the terms of peace are predicated, without disguise or palliation, upon the assumption that no form of government which Germany may at the moment have adopted, or may in the immediate future adopt, can be regarded as a guarantee against a resumption of designs of conquest. The peace bears no trace of the influence of the catchword coined by British statesmen that Germany must be "either powerless or free," or of the distinction so frequently reiterated by President Wilson between the terms upon which peace might be granted to the German Imperial Government on the one hand, and the German people on the other. It would be hard to name a single particular in which the demands made by the Allies and the United States upon Imperial Germany would have been more severe than those to which the emissaries of President Ebert and the Weimar Assembly are now asked to submit at Versailles. If the hope of a lasting peace rested on the acceptance by the Germans of the peace as a peace of justice, the outlook would be dark indeed.

Still darker would be the outlook if we were to regard as authoritative that utterance of President Wilson's which, before the entry of our own country into the war, attracted attention beyond any other. In his address to the Senate on January 22, 1917, he declared that the first condition of an enduring peace is "that it must be a peace without victory." And, proceeding to put his "own interpretation" upon this dictum, he said:

Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest not permanently but only as upon quicksand.

Surely if ever there was a "peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished," we are witnessing such a peace now. If, as the President thought two years ago, such a peace could not be "made to endure," the world's hope for freedom from the horrors of war would have to be dismissed. For Mr. Wilson in his address did not leave open even the refuge which the League of Nations holds out as an escape from this conclusion. "If the peace presently to be made is to endure," he said, "it must be a peace made secure by the organized major force of mankind"; and he declared that the only kind of "peace for which such a guarantee can be secured" would be one that conformed to his doctrine of peace without victory.

It is not for the purpose of raking up dead ashes that we recall these episodes of what now seems almost a distant past. We have all traveled far in the eight and twenty fateful months since Mr. Wilson made that address. It boots little, perhaps, to insist that he was wrong; but it is not unprofitable to do justice to the element of truth which lay at the bottom of his impossible demand. We cannot admit that the League of Nations must fail because the peace with which it is interwoven flies squarely in the face of that demand; but we must remember that if it is to succeed it must do so in the face of that formidable difficulty which the President had declared to be insuperable. Not only the innumerable complexities of the specific problems with which in the nature of things the League will have to grapple, but the central fact of German humiliation and German resentment must be reckoned with in any estimate of the League's future. We may be thankful that extravagant conceptions of Germany's punishment have been ruled out, and that in the other features of the settlement imperialist desires have been kept down to the most moderate possible limits. We may feel profound satisfaction that the ideal of respect for the rights of nationalities, great and small, has been constantly held in view and that it has been respected as closely as the difficulties of the situation permitted. We may hope that in some essential respects even the humiliation to which Germany is now subjected may in the near future be materially mitigated; in particular, it is reasonable to expect that no very long time will pass before the disarmament of Germany is followed by a substantial approach toward disarmament among the other nations. But after all is said and done, it must be confessed that the League, fraught though it is with great possibilities for the lasting betterment of the state of the world, begins its career in circumstances that no one can deny are charged with grave difficulty and doubt.

Yet after all this has been admitted, the formation of the League may justly be regarded as a great step toward the freeing of mankind from the incubus of war. That it will be accepted—and that it ought to be accepted, possibly with some reservation on the part of the United States which shall not weaken its essential character—there is little reason to doubt. It might have been made better if its structure had been determined in more tranquil and deliberative fashion after the necessary terms of immediate settlement had been fixed; but such as it is, it enlists the governments and the peoples of the world in an undertaking to work together for the prevention of war, and provides permanent machinery for the carrying out of that undertaking. That it falls far short of that solid barrier against war which “the organized major force of mankind” could conceivably provide, its staunchest friends can not deny; but neither can the most severe of its critics maintain that it is but a Hague Convention writ large. It is vastly more than that; whether it will function well or ill, it is at all events an organic entity, a thing that will function.

There is standing ground for the view, which some intelligent critics honestly entertain, that the League is more likely to give rise to wars than to prevent them; but to think this is to regard the League not as impotent but as carrying potentialities of evil. We are confident that the view is a mistaken one; not because the potentialities do not exist, but because we believe that the general sense of mankind will prevent them from developing. For many decades to come—after the unrest and turmoil of this time of transition have subsided—there will be an intense and universal anxiety that the appalling experiences of the past four years shall not be repeated; and whatever threatens the possibility of such repetition will be instantly condemned by the public sentiment of the world. How the League of Nations will work depends not so much on the mechanism of its organization as on the forces of national sentiment that act upon that mechanism; and if the forces that make for peace shall suffice to keep the League safe for a decade or two, it is not too much to hope that by that time it will have so developed its best potentialities, and so submerged those that are bad, as to become something like what the hopes of sanguine persons had pictured it as being from the outset. This may be but a chastened hope; but better cherish a cautious hope that is sound than invite the dangers that attend upon uncritical and illusory confidence.

Fiume, Kiaochow, and the Pledge to France

THE enemies of the League of Nations have some justification in declaring that it comes into the world lame, halt, and blind. And its friends can not deny that as regards the military protection of France the League has seemed weak; as regards doing justice to China in Shantung it has shown itself conveniently blind; while in the shifting settlement of the Italian claim to Fiume the League has displayed a halting attitude. In short, France believes the League too weak to protect her, and asks additional assurances from England and the United States; the League believes itself too weak either to do territorial justice to China as against Japan, or racial justice to Japan as against Australia and our Pacific slope; and the League has not yet developed wisdom enough to settle the Fiume question. Thus the League comes into the world with a heavy handicap in the contrast of promise and non-performances. The adjustments, which are relatively slight blemishes in the Treaty of Peace, considered as such, are serious departures from the principles of the Covenant, and tend to diminish confidence in it. What would have been hailed as a very good peace in its own right is a rather poor first exhibit for the League of Nations.

The Peace should have been made first. Its general moral and political character would have been sufficiently defined by the Fourteen Points. It would have been just about the peace we actually have, but it would have counted differently. Its positive merits would have won confidence for its negotiators. The Conferees of Versailles, in subsequently undertaking the more general task of a League of Nations, could have pointed to their record. What they had done well on the immediate and pressing issues would seem an earnest of better things under the general Covenant. Above all, the shortcomings of the Peace would have appeared less cruelly against the somewhat nebulous background of the Fourteen Points than against the explicit formularies of the Covenant of Nations. To a Covenant coming after the Treaty of Peace, the Treaty, if reasonably good, was a certain source of strength; coming out simultaneously, the Treaty plainly emphasizes certain weaknesses in the League.

The decision rather to base the Peace on the Covenant than let the Covenant grow out of the Peace, seems to rest partly on fear and partly on false logic. It was plainly feared that men's interest in the Covenant would not brook the delay incident to making peace. Here is the fallacy of the psychological moment in its cruder form. It is assumed that if the energies of the world are not promptly enlisted in framing the Covenant, it will not be framed at all. People will “carry on” only for so long. The little truth in this notion implies a curious lack of faith in humanity. It is true that interest dwindles, but also true that if the world is capable of forgetting the ideal of peace within a few months of the armistice, or within a few years, then the world is also incapable of caring for any Covenant of Peace beyond a brief space. We take no such discouraged view of our fellow men. For centuries men have worked towards peace under all sorts of conditions; it has not been a spasmodic movement based on peculiar excitements or distresses, but a permanent and progressive tendency. We have no idea that the peculiar exaltations and lassitudes of the armistice were essential to the formation of a League of Nations. There are, on the contrary, many reasons for thinking it was the wrong time, and the wrong emotional conditions. With the background of successful peace negotiations, their hands in, and their minds reassured, the Conference could have proceeded serenely to the greater task, and public interest would not have failed them.

A graver mistake in choosing the order of business was the assumption that in any practical negotiation the conclusion can or should conform to the premises. Such conformity obtains only in a mathematical or scientific demonstration. In a matter of business, theoretical premises are only a point of departure, merely serving to start things going. When the conclusion is reached the premises are usually well forgotten. They have served their turn. The Fourteen Points and the Covenant are fundamentally only a basis for the conduct of international business. It is unhappy and maladroitness to accompany the promulgation of these new principles with the concrete evidence that they do not work. The right tactics was to make the settlement as well as possible, and somewhat in the light of the actual settlement build up the theoretical basis for deciding future issues. Any deductive approach to political problems, or, for that matter, to human problems generally, is hazardous. It impairs and cramps the delicate processes of common sense and necessary compromise, offering only logic where wisdom is wanted.

If the Covenant had been postponed and separated from the Peace Treaty, each would have been considered on its merits, and each would have helped the other. As things stand, the Covenant is a moral reproach to the Treaty, while the Treaty measurably impairs the prestige of the Covenant. The managers of the League have not believed enough either in the people or in the League itself. They have taxed unnecessarily the good will of the world. Yet there is every reason to expect that the world will confirm the Covenant. It will do so rather in spite of than because of the tactical activities of the promoters of the League. It will do so in the hope that future executors of the Covenant will show greater hopefulness, breadth, and lucidity than its creators appear to have commanded.

The Review

NO name could be more colorless than that which has been adopted as the title of this journal. Many names of infinitely more savor have been suggested for it; and to a number of these there was no intrinsic objection. In particular, there are two names, at once simple and significant, either of which would have been strictly appropriate. The paper might have been called either The Liberal or The Conservative without offense to the character which its editors hope to impress upon it. Between true liberalism and true conservatism there exists not only no incompatibility, but on the contrary a vital bond of connection. There is a loose-jointed liberalism which spurns the dear-bought fruits of the past, as there is an ossified conservatism which is incapable of seeing the inspiring possibilities of the future. But the true liberal views the future in the light of a genuine appreciation of the past, and the true conservative prizes the past without being blind to the demands of the present and the future.

To either of these names, however, there would have been the objection that, though correct intrinsically, it would have been liable, in the present state of the public mind, to obvious misconstruction. Indeed, it may almost be said that the primary endeavor of THE REVIEW will be to restore the words "liberal" and "conservative" to their rightful place in the minds of thinking people. The danger to the country from revolutionary agitations springing out of the great upheaval of the war may prove to be not a real menace but only a passing cloud; but there is a more subtle and more pervasive danger, of whose reality and whose gravity there can be no doubt whatever. This danger is embodied not so much in any movement, or even in the spread of any specific set of opinions, but in an attitude of mind. The tendency to ignore what is good and to magnify what is evil in existing institutions; the readiness to throw overboard any conviction or tradition, however fundamental, which seems to obstruct the immediate realization of some scheme of improvement: it is the rapid spread of these tendencies—not among the poor and ignorant, but among those who have enjoyed every advantage of culture and well-being—that is the most serious, as it is the most distinctive, feature of the situation with which we are confronted.

And there can be no greater error than to ascribe this phenomenon to the war. Not only was it with us, and in great force, a number of years before the war, but it may be doubted whether it has in any essential respect been modified by the war. All that the war has done is to give it a larger mass of material to act upon, an unexpected opportunity to manifest itself in concrete ways which, in more settled times, did not easily present themselves. Minds, for example, that are not gravely disturbed by the programme of a Lenin or a Bela Kun are minds that were so "open" before Lenin or Bela Kun had been heard of that nothing which these prophets of a new day might propose would come as a real shock to them. That this is so—if one doubts it—a single consideration should suffice to show. The curious spectacle has been presented of intense hostility and abhorrence on the part of veteran socialists like Spargo and Russell to that which has been looked upon with philosophical serenity by the "open-minded" reformers who had been coquetting with socialism while never ranging themselves under its banner. The explanation of the paradox is not far to seek. The seasoned socialist has been fully aware, all along, that it was a grim business he was dealing with; he was willing to go thus far and no farther, because he realized how deep a break was involved in going even thus far. He was prepared to sacrifice so much of what human life and human civilization has hitherto been built upon, for the sake of what he conceived to be a higher civilization; and precisely because he knew what that sacrifice meant he shrank with a genuine and instinctive abhorrence from the more sweeping sacrifice which the Bolshevik programme demanded. But to the dilettante whose hospitality for socialist ideas was merely the result of a loss of grip upon the values of life as it is and has been, there was only a faint and intellectual difference between Lenin's Bolshevism and the more or less misty socialism upon which he had for years been bestowing his platonic affection. Bolshevism, like socialism, he said to himself, is probably not half so black as it is painted; and since a "bourgeois" civilization is not worth saving anyhow, who knows but that Bolshevism may prove to be the best way to get rid of it?

With the menace that attaches to the prevalence of this state of mind in a large and influential element of our society, we shall long have to reckon. The chance of sweeping victories for the radical or revolutionary forces depends not only on the strength of those forces, but quite as much on the degree in which the forces that resist them are vitalized by a realizing sense of what is involved in the contest. The conservative too often permits the radical to put him in the position of supporting a vile thing, a thing to be defended only because what is proposed may be even worse. The heir of all the ages, he acts as though a hundred generations of human striving—of heroes and martyrs, of saints and sages, of builders and thinkers—had given him but a paltry inheritance. He leaves almost unchallenged the tacit assumption of the revolutionist that the imperfections of the existing order are the product of wickedness or folly, and that whatever is good in it is the spontaneous gift of nature. Material and spiritual advantages undreamed of in former ages, and the privilege of very few even in the recent past, are now the possession of multitudes; but instead of claiming them as the rich fruit of civilization, he permits the fact that they are not universal to pass as damning proof of hopeless failure. Because there are blots on the scutcheon, we are asked to throw away the shield; and some of us seem to think it a not unreasonable proposal.

Civilization, as we have thus far known it, rests upon certain fundamental institutions and ideas. The family, the nation, the institution of property, the idea of individual liberty and individual responsibility, the idea of liberal culture—these are some of the bases upon which everything that we regard as worthy and precious has been built up. There is not one of them that is without grave shortcomings; not one in which there is not room for improvement; not one upon which our views have not undergone notable change in generation after generation. But in their essentials, and in the place they hold in the life of the world, they have thus far remained unshaken. They are exposed to-day to more formidable and more many-sided attack than at any previous time in modern history. If the attack is to be withstood, the defenders must be animated by a genuine understanding of the value of that which they are seeking to save. If they are half ready to grant that the relation of husband and wife, of parents and children, is a little matter that might easily be replaced by some new device, they will have little chance against the silver-tongued "reformer" who depicts the ideal beauties of free love. If they do not realize that the right of property is the chief nursery of sturdy character and manly self-assertion for the great mass of human beings, they will be able to set up but a feeble resistance to the moves of those who see in it nothing but an embodiment of sordid or predatory instincts. In a word, if we are not to be helpless in the face of heady innovation, we must remember that all that we have and are is the long result of time; and that though it may be desirable to prove all things, it is absolutely essential to hold fast that which is good.

What so many people fail to realize is that a man may be tough-minded without being hard-hearted. He may be keenly desirous to improve the lot of mankind, and yet refuse to accept that as an improvement which furnishes an immediate gain at the cost of permanent loss, which provides betterment on the surface but impairs the deep-lying springs of all betterment. The difference between the tough-minded man and the tender-minded man—to use William James's terms—manifests itself most sharply, perhaps, in the refusal of the former to be swept off his feet by catch-words. If, for instance, he has believed all his life that those who provide the capital play a vital and honorable part in the processes of production, he will not forget all he ever knew about the matter merely because incomes derived from investments have come to be currently referred to as unearned incomes. If he has entertained the conviction that the prizes of conspicuous success in competitive enterprise furnish a legitimate incitement to energy and ambition, and are thus part of the great apparatus of human productivity, the invention of a handy epithet of opprobrium will not lead him to assign to the criminal class every person upon whom it suits the mood of the moment to put the brand of "profiteer." But with this firmness of grip on the essential claims of existing institutions there can go, and there ought to go, an honest readiness to recognize their defects and an eager desire to remove them. In order to welcome and promote efforts to improve the conditions of labor, it is not necessary to begin with a sweeping condemnation of "capitalism." We may recognize that there are many channels through which altruism can be brought into business, without abandoning the belief that the desire to advance one's own fortunes has been, and probably will long continue to be, the mainspring of productive energy, the most prolific source of general prosperity. Attachment to the fundamentals of the existing order does not imply blind adherence to every feature of it which habit has made familiar. The true conservative, the true liberal, is he who instinctively feels this difference, and intelligently acts upon it. If THE REVIEW can in some measure strengthen those who take this attitude and increase their number, it will have done something to promote the sound thought and right feeling which must in these critical times be the greatest reliance of the country.

The American Legion

DRAW four million men from every class and from every square mile of the United States; pound them intensively into being as an army; place upon all of them the ponderous but wholesome stamp of army discipline; let some of them fight together, and all of them work together with a common purpose, for a year or so; let them kick and cuss—in the manner of all true soldiers—at the civilian government which is mismanaging them; then send those four million back into every class and into every square mile whence they came and organize them into a quasi-military-civilian association dedicated to work for the well-being of their country—and what will be the outcome?

On the answer to this hangs the future of the newly formed American Legion.

The daily press has given much space to the details of this new organization, and has emphasized its obviously excellent features of democracy and wide representation. General officers and enlisted men rub elbows in the same district delegations and on the same committees, and those born to the purple of great American names will work hand in hand with corporals unknown beyond their own country villages. So far so good; but the real test of the American Legion will come when it first attempts to make its influence felt in our national life.

They are confronted by a great opportunity, are these young American fighting men who have come back filled with a new sense of responsibility for the welfare of their country: they have a great opportunity, and a still greater duty, in the leadership which is ready to their hands. They have four million war-toughened veterans to draw from—men whose unselfish work and sacrifice has bound them to their country in a degree that twenty years of fat-living, benefit-receiving home-citizenship alone could never have done.

And now it is as well—even at the risk of seeming to howl calamity before the fact—to point out the grave danger inherent in any association of war veterans, and shown in the history of most war-veteran movements in this country. No matter with what lofty ideals of public service they may start, the unscrupulous and the self-seeking soon appear to gain control, and the organization degenerates into a more or less powerful and more or less unscrupulous political machine. Every editor, every candidate for office, and every politician knows and fears the deadly mawkish menace of "the old soldier vote"; a menace the more sinister in that it deliberately and cynically over-capitalizes the patriotic gratitude of the public towards its ex-soldiers, and prostitutes that gratitude to base political uses.

"But," say the leaders of the new movement, "no such situation can conceivably arise, for the American Legion is to be a non-political organization: We simply want to crystallize the spirit which made it possible to get into this war and fight it as we did, and we are not going to mix into politics." Of the good faith of these men there can be no question—they mean to keep out of politics, in the sense that they will not allow themselves to engage in political manipulation. But a vast association of soldiers embarked upon a non-military enterprise is, on its face at least, an anomaly. Aside from its avowedly secondary fraternal functions, the Legion can have little or no excuse for permanent existence, indeed it can not hope to serve the country according to the language of its constitution, unless it does really make its influence felt in the political and social life of the country. In this broader sense, the Legion will enter our political life, first, because they can't keep out, and second, because the country needs them there—needs the clean-thinking, all-American sanity of its citizen army. Let them go into politics, but keep away from partisanship as well as from self-seeking. Their activity must be confined to the great issues of our national being, their energies devoted to the preservation of the essentials of our national polity. The distinction between public activity based on these concepts of service and political meddling of the traditional kind is difficult to define by the written phase, but readily recognizable as each issue arises.

If America is in truth the melting-pot, then surely the apotheosis of the melting-pot—the crucible from which must emerge the essence of to-morrow's Americanism—is the army of to-day. The American Legion is the peace-born offspring of our citizen army; devoted to honest and unselfish national service it should accomplish much for the good of the country; suffered to become the medium of politicians and the football of parties, it had better never been organized.

The Soviet Fiction

THE political dilettanti have evolved a delightfully simple theory of the régime at Moscow. It runs something like this. The soviets constitute a form of democratic government derived from peasant institutions, in harmony with Russian political genius, and directly responsive to popular will. The Bolsheviks are a political party that has got control of the soviet machinery of government. They are extremists, honest to be sure, but attempting an impracticable economic programme. They may be displaced in the soviets by some other party, or they may adapt their programme to the demands of economic fact. Indeed, their American apologists would have us believe that they are now following the latter course and have so far abandoned their intransigent attitude that it is possible for other peoples to have relations with them. In any case, your Russian peasant loves his dear soviet and is ready to die in its defense, and any Russians who oppose it are reactionaries, counter-revolutionaries, imperialists, Black Hundreds, and every other vile thing in the radical vocabulary.

This glamorous theory of Russian politics has only one little defect—it is utterly false and has no foundation in fact. It rests on the fanciful interpretation by unsound minds of data furnished by a few ignorant and biased observers, who knew nothing of the Russian people, their life and history, and who were singularly susceptible to the revolutionary atmosphere in which they found themselves in Petrograd and Moscow.

The soviet, in the sense in which the word is now used, is not a natural Russian institution and it has no connection whatever with the mir or peasant commune, as alleged by Raymond Robins in the hodge-podge of misrepresentations that make up his oratorical fantasies. The word is good Russian and means "council." A board of directors is a soviet; the upper house under the old régime was called the Gosudarstvenny Soviet, or Council of the Empire.

As now used, the term had its origin in 1905. When the revolution of 1905 took place, one phase of it was the attempt of the workmen to seize power. For a short time they dominated Petrograd and Moscow. The power naturally fell into the hands of their labor union councils, or soviets. This gave the idea to Trotsky, who later pointed out in his writings that this afforded a handy instrument for imposing the dictatorship of the proletariat. It was natural, then, that when the revolution of March, 1917, took place, as the result of a rising of the workmen and soldiers of Petrograd, they should hark back to the precedent of 1905.

The Soviets of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies did not, however, at first consider themselves a governing body. They accepted the Provisional Government and looked upon themselves as charged with the duty of protecting the interests of the workmen and soldiers in that government. As the days went by and the Provisional Government showed itself incapable of meeting the situation, the power of the soviets grew. They at first contained a majority of Mensheviks. The Bolsheviks used the slogan, "All power to the Soviets," effectively, as well as the universal demand for a cessation of the war, and in November came into full control, and the soviets became the government organization of Russia. Meanwhile, the soviet organization had been extended to the towns and even to the villages, displacing the zemstvos and peasant institutions of self-government. Theoretically, it was supposed to be elective; practically, it was self-chosen and was made up of the worst elements of the local population, frequently including released criminals and thugs imported from other towns and provinces.

There is no space here to enter into a discussion of how the peasants were deluded by a programme of expropriating the land which Lenin and Trotsky put forth, or of how disillusion came only after these brutal tyrants had consolidated their military power. When it was too late, the peasants realized that they had been tricked, and since then they have struggled everywhere, sometimes successfully but more frequently in vain, to throw out the hated soviets and to restore their own democratic institutions of self-government. This is why Bolshevik authorities organized the so-called Committees of the Poor to seize the property of the well-to-do and industrious peasants. Last summer, in many instances the peasants sent delegations into the provincial towns in search of the local landed proprietors to beg them to return and take back their estates and help the peasants in their struggle against the soviet tyranny, of which they were now the unhappy victims.

To-day the Bolsheviks and the soviets are one and the same thing. The soviets could not last a single day without the support of the mercenary armies. The soviet government looks pretty on paper. It has a constitution that provides for the election of local and provincial soviets, for the All-Russian Soviet, for the Executive Committee. Presumably any Russian who works for his living, who hires no one, who has no connection with the church or with trade, and whose political views are approved by the Bolsheviks, may vote for the members of these soviets. In practice, they are self-chosen and self-perpetuating.

The fact is that long ago all the Bolshevik leaders, with the possible exception of five or six fanatics, lost faith in the Bolshevik formula—if they ever had any. They now openly scoff at such deluded followers as take Bolshevism seriously. They are out for loot and plunder and to hold their power as long as they can and to find a safe refuge when their orgy is over. They are spending millions of their stolen money in propaganda abroad, propaganda that seeks, on the one hand, to stir up unrest and revolution, and, on the other, to convince the world that they are now becoming conservative and constructive, and may safely be taken into the family of nations. It is the plea of the cornered thief for immunity and for the retention of part of his loot on the promise to reform.

Another phase of the soviet legend deserves comment. There are those who seriously speak of the soviet system as an ideal form of democracy, while decrying Bolshevik excesses and extremes. They allege that the soviet means direct and immediate responsibility of government to the people. They prate much of some vague thing they call "industrial democracy." But the soviet idea not only is a death-blow to liberty and democracy, it spells irresponsible tyranny on the part of the ignorant and incompetent, and brings in its wake economic ruin and innumerable petty autocracies.

The result of soviet rule in Russia is clearly portrayed by the experience of a Russian who held a responsible position in the office of the Commissariat of War, and who has just escaped to Germany. After describing some of the ridiculous and tyrannical acts of the local soviets which caused great suffering, he says:

The idea of dictatorship, of persecuting the bourgeoisie and the educated classes, leads inevitably to irresponsibility on the part of the petty dictators who are now at the head of all the local soviets throughout the country. Every communist belonging to one of these local councils believes he is authorized to do anything, that he cannot be called to account for his acts, however arbitrary they may be. This feeling of irresponsibility, which grows and blossoms in the atmosphere of dictatorship, is ultimately the cause of all the horrors and cruelties that now prevail throughout Russia. The public never learns of these outrages, because the press is silenced . . . A measure is adopted first in the country districts or the smaller towns, and after it has become unendurable, the central authorities intervene and try to improve its administration. The misery and suffering that this independent action of the local authorities occasions is indicated by the fact that even the leaders of the communist party are now urging the local soviets to consult with the central authorities before taking measures which have not been introduced in other parts of the republic. However, this course of events was a necessary result of the general theories of the communist party, which required that all political and economic powers should rest in the hands of the Workers' and Soldiers' soviets. Since the local soviets are thus entrusted with complete authority and have been forced to fight their enemies alone, unassisted by aid from without, they have gradually become little independent republics, having nothing in common except the fact that they are governed by communists.

After describing some of the horrors of which he was a witness, and which he attempted to relieve, he goes on to say:

Such cruelties can only grow in an atmosphere of terror which results from the proclamation of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It is an atmosphere of consciousness of complete irresponsibility. The communist attitude of repudiating all democratic progress necessarily leads to the idea of a rule of force, and causes the Workers' and Soldiers' soviets irresistibly to adopt a policy of massacre, misery, and destruction such as now obtains in Russia. . . . Who pays any regard to law in a period of dictatorship? The people in the country say that the laws of Petrograd do not concern them. This is the legitimate result of the principle that all political power has been transferred to the Workers' and Soldiers' soviets.

(Frankfurter Zeitung, March 9.)

Yet this is the system which our bourgeois Bolsheviks think should be seriously considered as a possible substitute for the orderly processes of Anglo-Saxon democracy!

JEROME LANDFIELD

shedding tears over the ills of society and for purification of the individual by such tears. Coleridge, in 1797, in order to have an understanding of the new liberty, must be alone on a "sea-cliff's verge":

Yes, while I stood and gazed, my temples bare,
And shot my being through earth, sea, and air,
Possessing all things with intensest love,
O Liberty! my spirit felt thee there.

The leaders of the movement did not conceal their condescension towards the masses. The masses were to be uplifted, if at all, by the personal aspirations of the poetic souls who deplored their condition.

Consider the difference to-day. To the radical mind merit resides chiefly in the plain people. The snobbery of the old romanticism has become inverted. Hence the contempt for the aristocrat, as well as for the bourgeoisie and the middle of the road.

Like the older romanticism, the international socialism vaguely fostered by intellectuals is not an overnight growth; being but a new aspect of the older product. In America, the way was first prepared for it among intellectuals towards the beginning of the present century. Oddly enough, so solid a thinker as Miss Ida Tarbell gave it the initial impetus. In her inquiry into the methods of the Standard Oil Company are to be sought the beginnings of that great volume of exposure of corruption which brought hope especially to advocates of revolutionary changes. Our writers and dramatists joined in the search and their work has generally passed as realism. But it is easy now to see that where their purpose was more than sensationalism it was a highly romantic endeavor to reconstruct the world. How many heroines, contrary to the rules of typical human conduct, were forced into the mire in order that gilded youth might be scourged? How many politicians were shown to be utterly wicked in order that the hardships of the poor might be lessened, and how many capitalists wrought havoc that we might entertain a more sympathetic feeling for the humble working man! Yet how few girls and socialists and working men were drawn with weaknesses to which we might attach any blame? Well-meaning humanitarians, caught up by the preoccupation of the hour, made intensive studies of social disorders, especially among the plain people, including the I. W. W., and found what they went forth to seek; namely, that in the great majority of cases selfishness and crime and suffering were to be laid at the door of the capitalist system. That no good came from this attitude of mind I do not undertake to say. But I am certain that it resulted in much mischief.

Thoughts on the New Worlders

CONSIDERING the high hopes which sprang from the French Revolution, it is not surprising that out of the present upheaval should come the thought of a New Jerusalem. Standpattism has received a body blow, for scarcely anyone expects or desires to return to precisely the ante-bellum conditions. Comfort and faith must be put into the hearts of plain people such as they never knew before, and definite lines for bettering social and economic conditions must be worked out and followed. On this all right-feeling persons are agreed. Reform there must be. The extent and nature of the reform desired is the significant thing. It serves as a good test to-day of a man's status as liberal or radical. Liberals may be described as those persons who, while desirous of no uncertain improvements, will be alarmed if the greater part of the old civilization is not retained in something like its present form. The radicals wish to see the greater part of the old civilization entirely made over or discarded. Or, put more roughly still, the radicals are committed to a new deal; the liberals are not.

To see the color of present-day radicalism, more particularly in this country, it is only necessary to follow the thought of certain intellectuals. They are the self-appointed spokesmen of the poorer classes, whose programmes, so far as these are at all definite, like that of the British Labor Party, have been taken fully into account. The radicals in question are actuated—they would not deny it—largely by sentiment. A great wrong must be righted. Assuming that this has been a capitalist war, they profess their readiness to overthrow the capitalist system root and branch. This might seem a strange contradiction in persons who, though acknowledging that Germany at least touched off the great conflagration, exerted themselves to make Germany's payment of damages as small as possible! But the radicals' outlook is nothing if not international; and we suppose they would answer: individual nations mean nothing in our philosophy, and if the capitalist class in Germany brought on the war, why, capitalists the world over must share the responsibility and the losses.

Reduced to its simplest form, the point of departure of the intellectual radicals is this: the plain people must rule the world—a glowing sentiment, all the more potent because vaguely understood. Here, again, the difference between radical and liberal is largely one of degree. The liberal, too, admits that there must be a wider distribution of responsibility in politics and industry than that which has existed. But degree is everything sometimes: the democratic reaction from Czarism, when pushed still farther, passed into that autocracy known as Bolshevism. The radical in his enthusiasm has all along imagined that democracy capped by still more "democracy" must be a still finer thing. He is as intrepid in making appearances square with his premise concerning the plain people, as the Junker was in insisting that Kultur was the only panacea. In short, the radical, in a world full of new things, has become the new romanticist—a preacher whom it is hard to cope with, since in his present stage even he cannot quite put his finger on himself.

The French Revolution is supposed to offer the closest parallel in history to the overturn of the present. It, too, gave to the spirit of romanticism an enormous impulse. But there is this contrast to be noted. The revolutionary dreams which it prompted, as expressed by poets and romancers, the group that then exerted precisely the far-reaching influence which is now exerted by intellectual radicals, worked themselves out in individualistic channels. There were meetings à deux, or vigils tout seul, which furnished the opportunity for

This decade and more of systematic exposure, as it was aimed at those in places of authority, gave the greatest comfort to the radical's fixed idea; at length he could prove that the plain people were the elect. It mattered little to him that aspiring young writers, in the press, in books, and for the stage, were gathering statistics in much the same biased spirit in which the Kaiser card-catalogued the universe and found it amenable to his love of expansion and aggrandizement. The preconceived notion of a world in which capitalists were always wicked and the poor always virtuous agreed with the radical's deepest convictions and he did not trouble to check up the statistics.

Thus confirmed in his general outlook, the radical became possessed of a tremendous field for operations at the beginning of the war. International politics was simply domestic conditions writ large. All wars were started by capitalists. France and England would have remained at peace if they had considered the welfare of the plain people.

Naturally, the intellectual radical, being obsessed by so general a proposition as that the plain people must rule the world, made several strange friendships. As the champion of the under dog, he for a while fought the Kaiser's battles, since to his anti-capitalist mind, why should the Kaiser merit greater disesteem than the King of England! He was planning to be a friend of Kerensky and rebuked the Allies for not keeping him in power, and immediately thereafter proclaimed Lenin and Trotsky God-given agents destined to further the desired brotherhood of man. He has all along found it difficult to become incensed by the direct action of the I. W. W. Of late Boss Townley, of the Non-Partisan League, has been made a pillar of his society. Is not Townley's one aim in life to aid the plain farmer? Fashionable social-workers of great wealth are now eagerly welcomed to the fold. Clergymen and college professors answer the roll-call.

From such a personnel one might argue variously. One might conclude that persons of all classes had become genuinely moved by the plight of the down-trodden. And there is much to be said for this view. Among the great benefits of the war is a widespread altruism which must in large measure be perpetuated, and directed into practical channels. But the radical—not unnaturally, since in times of huge upheaval one can most easily glimpse the possibility of sweeping action—is not content with such a mild (and solid) ambition. Like the overzealous Lenin, he must turn the popular mood into a rush of feeling. He, himself, has no selfish motives, but is on that account all the more dangerous. He is the delighted victim of the thrills set up by the rapid innovations of the times. Yet it is difficult to fix the tag of romanticist upon him. It was different with the old romanticists. They dealt in such luxuries as the inner life, twilight meadows, sunrise on a mountain, and blushing posies—all matters easy to pooh-pooh. The new worlder deals in such necessities as statistics, short working-days, easy divorce, and the overthrow of capital. Is it any wonder that he readily makes himself appear the genuine realist of the age?

If this romantic desire for radical innovation were the harmless toy it is to some of its less devout adherents, one might step aside while it worked itself out. But with many portions of the world hospitable to it and with several of our own political leaders blind to the mischief which it may produce, there must be organized opposition, or it will go too far. True liberals, who wish to see solid reforms pushed to execution, should be the first to appreciate the danger. For the new romanticism, if unchecked now, may result in one of two disasters. Either it may win the day; in which case the complexion of this country will be entirely changed. Or through its excesses, it may suffer utter rout, and thus create a violent reactionary movement which would stop progress for years.

The way in which liberals can best cope with all these good impulses run wild is by inquiring relentlessly into the meaning of the slogan, the plain people must rule the world. This will be found as a tacit assumption in most of the radicals' pronouncements, however dressed up they may be with political and economic analyses. If by it they mean a wider distribution of responsibility in politics and industry, the liberals, too, have this in their programme. Does industrial democracy signify state or international socialism? The liberals, while welcoming certain features growing out of the socialist principle, will fight for the rejection of that principle, in the belief that individualism, rightly controlled, is a tradition which this country will surrender at its peril. Is there to be no aristocracy of brains? True, the liberal, himself, can not be entirely explicit on all heads. He does know that he will strive eternally to maintain that principle of individual self-reliance which has been the corner stone of free institutions in this country; he is certain that the rights of property are, to him, not merely arbitrary relics; that he is utterly opposed to wiping out marks of distinction which have resulted from real achievements, in whatever field of endeavor; and that with these and similar principles safeguarded, he is desirous to see progress along many lines. Here, at least, is a small body of doctrine by which he may be guided in moving towards reform. Can the new worlder show himself possessed of any such definite attachments?

The present era, which is already flooded with feeling, however nobly prompted, would greatly profit by a stiff dose of rational criticism. With the new worlder, reason has been largely supplanted by an instinctive reliance upon machinery. If he can raise funds and can set in motion committees, can hurry through legislation, he fancies that his revolutionary dreams will be realized in orderly fashion, without the need of first examining them in the strong light of reason: "The brotherhood of man"—let us hope that this overworked phrase may have substantial meaning when peaceful conditions return to earth. Along with "Democracy", "Liberty", and "American", it must be made to retain the blessings of its recent baptism of fire. Yet meaning can not be legislated to it. It must find definition ultimately in a supreme test, in which the reasonableness of present institutions, as compared with the reasonableness of the proposed reforms, should be the determining principle. And in this study of comparative values, let us not hastily infer that because selfishness and corruption have often dwelt in high places, therefore the perfectibility of man can be demonstrated by enthroning the proletariat.

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Wandering between Two Eras

LITERARY as well as political historians are certain to fix upon 1918 as the end of an old era, the beginning of a new one; and with increasing assurance, as that date recedes into the past, they will distinguish and insist upon the differences between the buzzing blooming confusion that preceded it and the buzzing blooming confusion that followed it. They will give to the ante-bellum era a significant name and to the post-bellum era a significant name; and by their names we shall know them; and from their names the way-faring man will be able to deduce the characteristics of the authors who lived in those eras, without the annoyance of having to read them. This will be a convenience to those who wish to find time for reading Plato or "Clarissa Harlowe."

Professor Cunliffe has recognized the existence of an ante-bellum era by publishing in the slow gray dawn of the new age a retrospective work which, evading the responsibilities of a god-father, he calls "English Literature During the Last Half Century."* He selects for more or less extensive treatment these British worthies: Meredith, Hardy, Butler (by J. B. Fletcher), Stevenson, Gissing (by Leland Hall), Shaw, Kipling, Conrad, Wells, Galsworthy and Bennett. In one chapter each he disposes of The Irish Movement, The New Poets, and The New Novelists. He professes to have written "to provide guidance for firsthand study—assistance in reading the authors themselves, not a substitute for it." As a first aid to the explorer, the book presents just what is needed: biographical sketches, summaries of novels and plays, critical excerpts, bibliographies, and a temper generally hospitable and temperately appreciative.

For readers, however, who have in some fashion gone through the literature of this half-century, and who are now ready to have it discussed and classified and shelved so that they may turn back to Plato and "Clarissa Harlowe" or press on to the New Poetry and the New Novel—for such readers Professor Cunliffe's treatment is likely to prove a bit disappointing. As an incitement to discussion it is almost too studiously unprovocative. "If the reader's own judgment," he says, "does not fall in with the criticisms here offered, it is hoped that no harm will be done, and no offence taken on either side." Now, that is not the temper in which one creates the idea of a new age! As the establisher of a literary epoch, Professor Cunliffe is over-wary of generalizations. He gives us a series of detached essays and notes on individual authors, which one must group and concatenate for oneself, if perchance one wants a vision of mass or processional movement, or is curious about the causes and connections of things, or hankers for a compact statement of the meaning of that interesting age on which the armistice has rung down the curtain.

In his introductory chapter he does sketch the social background of literature since 1867; or rather, we should say, he indicates some of the determining forces in it. But he leaves these forces in a good deal of a welter. "To sum up," he says, "the last half century was a period of extraordinarily rapid transition, political, social and intellectual." To be sure it was; every half century is that, if you look at it hard.

"The general sweep of thought," he continues, "was revolutionary; there was no political principle, no religious dogma, no social tradition, no moral convention that was not called in question. To some conservative minds it appeared merely as an era of destruction, but, powerless to resist the flood of change, they remained baffled and confused amid the contending currents, which drove now in one direction, now in another, but ever onward. Future generations will doubtless discern more constructive achievement than is obvious to the contemporary spectator, who is himself but an atom in the whirl of conflicting tendencies." The present generation, he concludes, must build upon this whirl; and "though the march of progress was interrupted by the Great War, the first task of humanity, when peace is restored, will be to take up the task of reconstruction."

Here is much cheery talk of transition and progress "ever onward"; but as Teufelsdröckh would say, "Whence, O God, and whither?" Professor Cunliffe supplies hints for an answer which he hesitates to formulate. He hesitates, apparently because he is not certain that all will think the answer consistent with his description of contemporary change as "the march of progress." I myself, less concerned about consistency than about getting Professor Cunliffe's fifty years characterized and distinguished from the years before and after, suggest that we call the span from 1832 to 1867 The Era of Middle Class Society or The Age of Gentlemen, that from 1867 to 1918 The Era of Biological Considerations or The Age of Vital Forces, and the half century for the dawn of which the cocks are now crowing, The Proletarian Millennium or The Age of Economic Units. These epithets have at least the merit of indicating a whence and a whither. When I have shown how the three periods are reflected in their respective literatures, and how they are related to one another, and how, finally, they are related to the deep current which bears the affairs of men onward whether they will or no, then the gentle reader may return to his classics, assured that his house or his houseboat has been set in order; or he may propose an arrangement of his own.

As mirrored in literature and seen through the soft blue haze of time, that early Victorian interval which we have called The Age of Gentlemen lies before us enveloped in its own atmosphere, serene, changeless, finished, like a classical landscape, only a little damaged by the slashing of Mr. Wells and the Militant Suffragettes. What first catches the dreaming eye is the towers of the cathedral at Barchester, that Trollope built, embosomed high in lofty trees, neighbored by Bishop Proudie's palace and the comfortable dwellings of Archdeacon Grantly and Dean Arabin. Then at wide intervals in a countryside tufted with woodlands one makes out the seats of great county families like the Luftons and the Crawleys and the Austin Feverels and odd places like Crotchet Castle and Gryll Grange. Piercing the greenery here and there, rise the ivory towers of the poets: in one of them Tennyson is writing with pearl-handled gold pen his "Idylls of the King," in another Arnold is meditating his "Tristram and Iseult"; in a third Swinburne is murmuring his "Atalanta in Calydon," and in still another Morris is chanting his "Earthly Paradise." These towers and castles are but the accents of the scene. For look! What populous towns and villages have emptied all their folk this pious morn to stream up by twos and threes to hear the Archdeacon's sermon? Colonel Newcome heads the line, followed by an endless procession of clergymen, lawyers, doctors, army officers, civil servants, journalists, merchants, tradesmen, farmers, and other representatives of that great class of bourgeois gentilshommes which began in 1832 significantly to displace the old aristocracy as the centre of English society. Some of these people have a long way to go before they overtake Colonel Newcome; but they all know where they are going, and they approve of the expedition.

The predominance of a respectable middle class was England's slowly matured response to the radical challenge of the French Revolution and to the contention that all men came to the social compact with equal rights in their hands, naked from the arms of nature. To the searching question put afresh in every age, What is man that he should inherit the earth? England replied, still cherishing fondly in her troubled heart the traditions of an ancient Christian chivalry: "Man is a creature of miscellaneous instincts and unpredictable conduct, as I have freely admitted by the mouth of Mr. Thackeray; but, as I have insisted also by the mouth of Mr. Tennyson, he has the aspirations of a Galahad, the ideals of an Arthur. Man is a being of dual personality; one side is as real as the other; if you would see him whole, you must take them both together. In his sentiments, if not always in his creed and conduct, he is a Christian, a patriot, and a gentleman. With that understanding, I admit him to my society; and I think that I can make a fairly human and creditable place of it." While that understanding endured, a considerable number of the inhabitants of England of course remained outside in mine and factory and unregarded corner, mute or clamoring for a revolution.

In the last fifty years the revolution took place. It created The Era of Biological Considerations. Professor Cunliffe dates its beginning at 1867, the year of the Second Reform Bill. But this is rather to overemphasize political influences, and to suggest that in our second period was accomplished merely an enlargement of the fold made in 1832 for the society of middle class gentlemen. What we actually discover there is the destruction—not by the lower orders but by the intellectuals—of the bonds which held that earlier society together. The Era of Biological Considerations, for which Darwin and Huxley prepared the way, is not properly a society at all. Its characteristic business is not to establish man's relations in a human community but to establish his relations in the animal kingdom. This business generates a new type of literary imagination, a new notion of realism, a new criticism. Equipped with a fresh conception of man, the children of The Era of Biological Considerations re-examine the professed aspirations of The Age of Gentlemen and pronounce them hypocrisy. What the first age revered as ideals, the second denounces as shams. "Talk not to us," cry the Butlers, the Shaws, the Wells's, the Cannans, the Mackenzies of this veracious epoch, "talk not to us of the duality of human nature, of Tennyson's Arthur and the Victorian ideal; the grand Victorian type is Pecksniff. Man is neither a Christian, a patriot, nor a gentleman; he is a 'bad monkey.' And we have had him under the scalpel. We have seen him under the microscope. He is an agitated congeries of chemical and physical forces. He is a bit of passionate protoplasm. He is a vital force."

*New York: The Macmillan Company.

We are all, except the very young and the very old, acquainted with the resolute and measurably successful efforts made by writers of the last half century to prove that men are not destined to be Christians, patriots, or gentlemen. It was perhaps Samuel Butler who led off by demonstrating this truth in the case of Ernest Pontifex in "The Way of All Flesh," a novel which I thought rather dull, till I found all my intelligent contemporaries praising it to the skies as a "brilliant attack upon the institution of the family, especially the relations between parents and children." Thomas Hardy, singular in his sense of the tragic nature of his task, developed with sombre and genuine poetic power the thesis that man is a bit of passionate protoplasm plastic on the wheel of Chance, the whimsical Potter, blindly worshipped by the Age of Gentlemen as the Divine Providence. George Moore joined in with a series of novels presenting vital forces in full evening dress, yet not for a moment mistakable for ladies and gentlemen; and he has recently added what I am assured is a very brilliant travesty on the life of Jesus. G. B. Shaw contributed to the bright bonfire of shams the garments of clergymen, prize-fighters, duchesses, and chauffeurs whom he had stripped down to the naked reality of vital forces and set speechifying in a parlor; and in recent years he has launched many a brilliant attack upon patriotism. Mr. Wells, eagerly reeking of the laboratory, has also specialized on heroes and heroines who are emancipated vital forces, and he has supplemented these representations by brilliant attacks upon humanistic education and other institutions designed to perpetuate The Age of Gentlemen. Mr. Galsworthy has scattered some brilliant aspersions on the institution of property; but, since the success of "The Dark Flower" has rather eclipsed his effusions on the Under Dog, he and his satellites tend to specialize on exhibitions of man as exquisitely palpitating protoplasm. I have just read, for example, in a current magazine his brilliant beginning of a new story about a London rector (of The Age of Gentlemen) and his palpitating cousin and daughter (of The Age of Vital Forces). The rector's cousin, having got rid of two husbands, is now the mistress of attractive Captain Fort. The daughter, having given herself to an officer departing for the war, "with the sole thought of making him hers forever," seems on the point of giving herself also to Captain Fort. While the Captain waits, says my author, he is "turning the leaves of an illustrated journal wherein society beauties, starving Serbians, actresses with pretty legs, prize dogs, sinking ships, royalties, shells bursting, and padres reading funeral services testified to the catholicity of the public taste but did not assuage his nerves."

One cannot compose the literature of this period into a picture of society; it doesn't compose. Like Captain Fort's journal, it presents us a bewildering medley of impressions. It is a picture of disorganization, of a human welter without top or bottom, such as one finds in the novels of Goncharóv, Dostoévsky, and Artzybashev. The writers who express the prevailing spirit of the time represent society as breaking up under biological criticism into the social anarchy of a state of nature. The more vigorous poets have left the ivory towers to go a-vagabonding and ballad-singing down the highways of the earth; others palpitate like exquisite jelly-fish responding to physical stimuli in a protoplasmic prose, sometimes called free verse. Only the novelists are lyrical; and they are lyrical perforce in the general decadence of the dramatic imagination and the confusion of the social scene.

The exceptions—Meredith with his picture of a coherent prosperous intellectual—aristocracy, Bennett with his picture of a coherent prosperous canny bourgeoisie, Gissing with his picture of a miserable "ignobly decent" one—these exceptions must be regarded as survivors, retaining in a hostile environment the standards, the aspirations of a former age. Mr. Chesterton is so obviously Dickensian that Professor Cunliffe only once mentions him. De Morgan is not mentioned at all. The "ethicist" Stevenson with his knightly pose is of course still more out of his setting. As for Conrad and Kipling, neither of them is a painter of society. Conrad is the voice of the vast wistfulness of men who remember hearth and home and household gods but are exiles roaming in African wildernesses, sailing desolate seas, outcast on solitary islands, mixing with human derelicts and savages, defeated, forgotten. Kipling, on the other hand, is the celebrant of vital forces adventurous, successful, disciplined to the level of military and administrative efficiency, better for the barracks than the parlor, many pegs below the fine wits of Meredith's world, several pegs above the palpitating protoplasms of Mr. Galsworthy's, good for imperial adventure, good for deciding in a world-society that is lapsing into barbarism which forces are fittest to survive.

On this scene the Great War breaks—an interruption in the "march of progress," as Professor Cunliffe regards it? Surely not as an interruption but as the completion of the overmastering drift of the age towards a return to nature. It was precipitated by Germany, because she first among the nations worked up the results of her biological considerations into a clearly defined national policy. Checking the naturalistic reversion at Mr. Kipling's level rather than at Mr. Galsworthy's she sent to the battle line not exquisite protoplasms but efficient vital forces. As fast as we could, we all followed suit. And for four years human society in the greater part of the world gave place to a primitive physical conflict in an ingenious and sophisticated branch of the animal kingdom.

The war is over, and every pleasant person one meets talks hopefully of a new age. Those with the faintest idea of how it is to differ from its predecessor usually betray the vacancy of their imaginations by a facile use of the word "reconstruction." But no hopeful person wants to reconstruct The Age of Vital Forces; that has been too thoroughly discredited. What considerations are going to take the place of those biological reveries which so profoundly affected the imagination of the preceding generation? Patriotism is still a little under the cloud of "vitalistic" nationalism. Christianity is not the prime concern of the reuniting churches, but the minimum wage. There is nothing visibly pointing to an immediate restoration of The Age of Gentlemen. In recognition of certain signs of the times—notably those great bodies of men who have discovered a bond strong enough to hold them together and to make them feel alike, think alike, act alike, and make the Government "stand and deliver"—

I have ventured to call the coming period The Proletarian Millennium or The Age of Economic Units. In the new age, when the searching question is asked, What is man that he should inherit the earth? the response will be: "Man is a paid laborer. He is a wage-earner. Give the words what breadth and scope you like." I don't think these definitions quite satisfy every aspiration of the heart; but they are an immense improvement over those which were current in The Age of Biological Considerations. They lift man at once out of the animal kingdom; animals are not wage-earners. They place him in a society at least rudimentarily human. They suggest rough elementary forms of individual and social discipline for other ends than battle.

As we have had only six months of the Millennium, its literature is not yet abundant. The front pages of even the current magazines are still filled with the naturalistic work of the old school. But happily the advertising sections, always written by men of great talent who understand the latest condition of the heart of the people, contain many jewels of the new economic imagination. I select one which indicates pretty well the direction which the march of progress may be expected to take in the next fifty years under the new social leaders. It is headed "Free Proof That I Can Raise Your Pay." It recites a truly inspiring little tale about a young man who, when he consulted the advertiser, had nothing: "Today this young man is worth $200,000. He is building a $25,000 home—and paying cash for it. He has three automobiles. His children go to private schools. He goes hunting, fishing, travelling whenever the mood strikes him. His income is over a thousand dollars a week."

I think that two automobiles might suffice, unless one can also afford a cook. But is there an impecunious Economic Unit that does not thrill responsively to literature like that? And in that thrill do we not discern "organic filaments" of a new order? Man is a worshipper of clothes—and woman, too, though at present she seems to prize them in inverse ratio to their quantity. Even in the shaggy "Bolshhevik" breast there lurks a furtive desire for a silk hat and a fur-trimmed overcoat, and a slumbering but inextinguishable liking for the manners that go with the clothes, the sentiments that go with the manners, and the principles that support the sentiments. In this universal and ineradicable passion for clothes lies, at present, the reformer's chief hope of bringing the whole body of English society "into one harmonious and truly humane life," that far-off goal towards which the current sets beneath all the whirl of conflicting tendencies.

STUART P. SHERMAN

Correspondence

Strassburg and the "Marseillaise"

[Baron de Dietrich, who writes the following letter, is the great grandson of the Mayor of Strassburg at the time of the French Revolution, in whose drawing-room the author of the "Marseillaise" sang his famous patriotic air for the first time.]

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

There has just been formed at Paris a National "Marseillaise" Committee, with President Poincaré, M. Clemenceau, M. Antonin Dubost and M. Paul Deschanel, the last two Presidents, respectively, of the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, as patrons. The aim of this committee is to erect at Strassburg, on the very square where stood until a few weeks ago a statue of Kaiser William I, a monument to commemorate the "Marseillaise" and its author.

It was on April 25—I am writing this letter on this same date 127 years later—in 1792 that Captain Rouget de l'Isle composed at Strassburg, my native city, our national air. Since then the song has had a glorious history, until now it has become the pæan of peace and war of all free peoples. This monument, therefore, must be beautiful and grand; and not only will all France, I feel sure, aid in the realization of our plan, but I know I am not wrong in adding that America, too, will wish to participate in our effort.

ALBERT DE DIETRICH,

President of the Committee

6 Place de la Bourse, Paris, April 25.

From an Expert in Publicity

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have been very much interested in the patient and steady work you have done to establish the weekly in which you are so much interested. You have a vision which has kept you at this work in spite of the many difficulties incident to starting any new venture of this kind. You have the spirit which I believe will mean the success of your work, because I think the object you have in mind is sound and important.

We are living in a period which calls on us to keep our minds alert. Subtle changes are creeping over our institutions. With wrong leadership a minority of the public will sometimes adjust itself to a point of view without a full public conviction as to the soundness of the proposed change. A bill is passed. And the legislature is blamed for its hasty action.

Very often we see in our politics the opposite extreme. The public makes up its mind to the necessity of a certain course of action. It subtly spreads from mouth to mouth and from newspaper to newspaper until everyone wonders why the legislature has not translated into law the opinion of the majority. Finally the legislation comes and the legislature is blamed for its dilatory action.

Between the two extremes of legislation rushed through by a minority, and legislation haltingly put through in spite of a favorable majority, we have many varieties of laws, good and bad, all of them quite secondary in importance to the fundamental proposition of clear thinking on the part of leaders of opinion and the people generally.

If anything has been demonstrated by the war it certainly is the fact that leaders of opinion, who are familiar with the machinery of sound publicity, can win popular support for almost any sound measure. There is a great responsibility resting upon the public men of this country to-day to see to it that the publicity machinery of the nation, the most powerful single force in existence to-day, is not allowed to fall into incompetent hands, or worse still into the hands of the ignorant and avaricious.

In most of the weekly papers of the United States at the present time radicalism may be said to be the order of the day. This is only natural because radical movements are seething all over the world and people are rightly interested in those things which are most potent and vital at any given time. I personally have not the slightest sympathy with any group of people who are opposed to radicalism on principle, because much of the discussion which comes under the name of radicalism includes a great deal of liberalism that is very important for our people. One of the great safeguards of American politics has been our readiness to incorporate into the platforms of one or the other of our great national parties the best elements of the platforms of our radical parties. Thus the Democrats took most of the good points out of the progressive platform and there was nothing for the Progressives to do but to go out of business. So, if we as Republicans or Democrats take the best ideas that the Socialists have, we are taking the very best step towards preventing the socialists from becoming anarchists. The one guarantee of making the radical element of the Socialist party strong in America is to oppose it unthinkingly and give it that element of martyrdom which will rally millions to their standard.

The net of all this is that we need clear thinking on the conservative side of liberalism. We do not want any more stand-pat papers, but we do want papers that state the facts clearly and (what is equally important) interestingly, even though the facts do not indicate the necessity of revolutions in every branch of our economic or social structure. Such an undertaking you have started, and I believe it merits the active support of all people who are interested in the steady progress and strengthening of our democracy. I believe such a paper under your management is capable of succeeding in a large way, and I hope you will have the success you deserve.

GUY EMERSON

New York, May 7

Poetry

WE have made provision to refresh our readers from time to time with a rill of poetical comment. To this end we shall traffic with all ages and climes. We shall endeavor to afford the best in all moods, lofty and light, and if we occasionally are willing to abide a laugh it is to be hoped that it will not be of the heedless kind. The world, indeed, may be in a way to perish quite as much from forgetting how to laugh soundly and reflectively as from failure to keep footing when it aims to scale the heights.

The following effusion on the new freedom purports to reach us from the land blessed with the rule of Bela Kun, for which mellifluous name we understand him lately to have exchanged that of Genghis Khan. Our leading revolutionists, it appears, like the lesser brethren of the craft, prefer to work under an alias. Not so, at whatever risk, ourselves.

These verses come to us without title; we venture tentatively to describe them as a sort of

Hungarian Rhapsody

WHEN all the world's a-tiptoe for a flight

Out of its age-long, thick, engulfing night

To glimpse the morning of the perfect day,

At last to follow Liberty's wild way,
And make of earth a fairer place than Heaven,

(Citizens must be off the street by seven)

Who would hold back? Who would not celebrate

In deep libations man's last happy state?
Come crown the cup, be-garlanded, be-rosed!

(Committee's order: All the bars are closed)

Well, never mind. There's stimulant enough

In the mere prospect; thrills are heady stuff.

Who could not greet millennium with a cheer

Without the added urgency of beer?
In such a mood the rural shades invite;

One tastes in solitude the full delight
Such as I've fixed my ardent hope and wish on.

(None may leave town without express permission)

Then come my love, upon this barricade,
The flag of Liberty aloft displayed,
Let us together welcome the bright years
With gushings of continual warm tears.
(You say you can't? My dear, I am surprised, What's that! O pshaw! Absurd! not nationalized?)

As well go home, when all's tried home is best,

There one may take one's ease, and hang the rest.

There one may sit before a cheering fire,

Remake the world more near to heart's desire.

But what's this notice nailed upon the door?

(This house allotted to deserving poor)

On this machine gun in the pleasant park
I still pursue reflections, not yet dark.

Keep bravely on, I'll make it all come straight;

One may buy Heaven at too cheap a rate.

One cannot reach perfection at a jump,
A little leaven only in the lump.

What's this? An order? The Committee . . . So?

Compulsory employment? I must go.

HARRY AYRES

Book Reviews

The Cult of Self-Reliance

RICHARD COBDEN — THE INTERNATIONAL MAN. By J. A. Hobson. New York: Henry Holt & Company.

COBDEN'S name has never been one to conjure with in this country. We have associated it with British gold for distribution on American election days and with laissez faire. To be sure, it is some years since our high-tariff politicians decided that there was no further campaign material in the absurd notion that a club of eminently respectable Englishmen was intent on bringing this country to economic ruin, and by the most questionable methods. Yet the fact that Cobden was possessed of qualities that should have endeared him long ago to Americans is far from being grasped on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. Hobson's new work is doubly welcome; first, because it undertakes a task so well worth doing, and, secondly, because it executes it so admirably. It is nearly forty years since Lord Morley published his "Life of Richard Cobden," which is, and is likely ever to remain, one of the most finished performances in English biographical literature. But it was, as Lord Morley himself pointed out, a personal biography. Mr. Hobson's work is of a quite different order, its aim being to rescue the memory of Cobden from the narrow misinterpretations to which it has of late been subjected, to emphasize his international work, and to expound his political and economic philosophy.

It is a timely performance. In coming months and years the merits of free trade and protection are likely to be discussed with vehemence in two hemispheres, as those of "intervention" and "non-intervention," per se, are certain to be; and no one has ever had deeper convictions on these subjects, or convictions more honestly and laboriously gained by reading, business experience, travel, and international correspondence, than Richard Cobden. His name, more emphatically than any other, is representative of the "Manchester School," a term which of late years has come more than ever to mean, "hands off" in the efforts of the bourgeoisie to exploit industry to their own selfish advantage. "Self-interest" is to-day construed ignobly, whereas Cobden used it to signify what he considered best and most commendable in human nature. No one has courage enough now to do the slightest reverence to laissez faire, though many have begun to ask where intervention by government in industry is leading us.

Cobden has been charged, on the one hand, with a narrow and grovelling commercialism; on the other, with a vague cosmopolitan idealism. The first view shows Cobden and his Manchester School reducing the whole of politics, including the honor and the vital interests of his country, to terms of trade and money making, conducted under the single principle of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market. Government was simply to stand aside and keep a ring within which this sordid struggle of the material interests of individuals, classes, and nations was to take place, on the assumption that its outcome would be the maximum of wealth and material prosperity. It was the interests of the manufacturers, as against the "landlord interests," and the interests of capital, as against labor, in the manufactures. Even cheap food, the prime motive for the repeal of the Corn Laws, was chiefly valued as the necessary means of keeping money, wages, and costs of production in the new manufacturing districts so low as to enable British cotton and other export goods to hold and to extend their world markets.

Even those who are aware that Cobden personally neglected a thriving business of his own and incurred heavy pecuniary sacrifices in following a political career, have often stigmatized him as dominated by the commercial interests and the aspirations of the new ambitious business class, the product of the industrial revolution which sought to displace the aristocracy and to impose upon their country a definitely "business government." Others, or often the same men in a different mood, fastening on his enthusiasm for free commerce as the great pacific and harmonizing influence in international relations, the intrinsic logic and morality of which was destined at no distant time to banish the fear of war and to liberate the forces of human brotherhood, derided him as a dangerous visionary who ignored the lessons of history, and believed in the rapid establishment of a millennium, peace and prosperity for all the peoples of the world.

Now each of these opposing views, as Mr. Hobson points out, is a travesty of the truth, though taken together, they lead towards a recognition of the truth. Cobden did strongly believe that the prosperous middle class business men were the chief present instruments of political and social progress, and that the more power they had the better. Their prosperity was certain, by the operation of laws as moral as they were economic, to redound to the advantage of their fellowmen; of their own employees, the nation of which they were a part, and through the operation of free commerce and communications, of humanity at large. Capital had no separate interest from labor: the accumulation of savings for profitable employment increased the wage fund and improved the condition of labor. If the political and economic power and privileges of landlordism could be curbed, by removing taxes on food and making land more accessible to those who could use it, if all legal or other obstructions to the free movement, sale, and employment of capital and labor could be removed, the enlightened self-interest, primarily of the manufacturers and commercial men, would tend to a production and a distribution of wealth among the various classes of the community which would, by giving a solid basis of industry and material prosperity, afford a new leverage to all the forces of civilization.

Cobden was an enthusiast for principles and consequently an optimist. Nearly forty years ago Lord Morley said: "In his intrepid faith in the perfectibility of man and of society, Cobden is the only practical statesman that this country has ever possessed, who constantly breathes the fine spirit of that French School in which the name of Turgot is the most illustrious." Mr. Hobson shares this view. He says that the central principle of Cobden is that of the harmony of men, irrespective of political, racial, or linguistic barriers, by means of organized mutual aid. This is Lord Welby's estimate too. He writes: "He [Cobden] believed that the interests of the individual, the interests of the nation, and the interests of all nations are identical: and that these several interests are all in entire and necessary concordance with the highest interests of morality. With this belief an economic truth acquired with him the dignity and vitality of a moral law, and instead of remaining a barren doctrine of the intellect, became a living force to move the hearts and consciences of men."

Cobden was, first and last, what Emile de Girardin called him, "an international man." The conception of a reign of law, which, on the one hand, related the physical and moral structure of man to his history and environment, on the other, built up an ordered scheme of human society, operating by free social intercourse, and dependent upon the co-operation of diverse tastes and capacities in various material surroundings, came as a captivating revelation to thoughtful men of the early nineteenth century. This free human co-operation, transcending the limits of nationality and race, was the positive force, intellectual and emotional, of which non-intervention was the negative condition.

Non-intervention with Cobden meant more than abstinence from aggressive or other unnecessary wars. It meant a reduction of foreign policy, in its governmental, diplomatic sense, to the smallest possible dimensions. Sound internationalism could not be brought about by arrangements between governments. Such relations were governed by motives and conducted by methods positively detrimental to the free pacific intercourse of individuals. The classes of government officials who conducted diplomacy, and the methods they employed, were poisoned by obsolete traditions of suspicion and hostility, the survivals of a world in which statecraft expressed the conflicting interests of rival dynasties and not the common benefits of the people. Cobden knew how perilous a foreign policy conducted by such men must be. So he concluded the less of it the better. If peoples are to get into sane, amicable, and mutually profitable relations with one another, that intercourse is best promoted by leaving it to them, with as little interference as possible, in the way of help or hindrance, by their respective governments.

Cobden and his friends would apply the principle of non-intervention to internal as well as to external affairs. Government was conceived as a bad thing in itself, always oppressive to individuals, frequently unjust, nearly always expensive and inefficient. A country had to bear government for its sins, as a provision against enemies outside and enemies within. Armaments and police were the essence of governments. The more rigorous logic of this laissez-faire thought and policy dictated an opposition to the entire body of factory laws and other state regulations of industry, and to all public provision or enforcement of sanitation and education; those bound by it were honest in believing that unrestricted freedom of contract and of exchange would secure the greatest, surest, and most rapid growth of industrial prosperity, and that the natural play of competition under the pressure of self-interest would win for all classes their proper share. In 1836 Cobden said: "I know it has been found easier to please people by holding out flattering and delusive prospects of cheap benefits to be derived from Parliament rather than by urging them to a course of self-reliance; but while I will not be the sycophant of the great, I cannot become the parasite of the poor. . . . Again I say to them. 'Look not to Parliament; look only to yourselves.'"

After all, the most fitting title for Cobden would be "High Priest of the Cult of Self-Reliance." His mistake was in crediting human nature with larger powers than it has yet demonstrated. No one, however, can question the nobility of his aims, or deny that so far as his tariff policy is concerned he was a real benefactor of his country. He was possessed of the logical faculty above almost any Englishman that can be recalled, and is perhaps as strong a reminder as we could have that logic is not all of life. When everything is said of him, he remains one of the sanest and most vivifying personalities of the nineteenth century. He at least reminds us more forcibly than anyone else has done, that government exists for man and not man for government.

The American Family in Recent Fiction

ALL American writing of the past four years must have been, if not war-blasted or war-inspired, at least war-conscious. Whether by reaction from a painful neutrality or from subtler cause, our novelists have taken a new turning. Or should they be said to have now for the first time set foot firmly on an old path?—a path blazed by Hawthorne, cleared and widened by Howells and Cable, but somehow long inaccessible even to those disciples who sought it most earnestly? We may see now that they were too anxious, too self-conscious. They could not muster that glorious unaffected handling of the American scene, could not help playing a little to the potential British "gallery." They themselves were in a way part of that gallery, condemned to cultivate local color with one hand and to fend off provincialism with the other. Nobody must fancy they did not see the quaintness of Yankee or Hoosier or Wild-Western manners! Or perhaps they went to the other extreme and flung at Americanism, as it were Twainishly, stressing the twang and the twinkle with a kind of defiance, hurling them at the world to make the best of, or be hanged. Self-conscious, at all events, even the best of our story-tellers remained in the tens as they had been in the nineties. Only under the shadow of war have they seemed to find themselves, quite suddenly and easily to "loosen up," and to begin speaking clearly and naturally of what as a nation we have been and now are. The development was not so abrupt as this sounds. Here and there, in the years before the war, certain novels like "Nathan Burke" and "Mr. Crewe's Career" and "The Squirrel Cage" had, each in its little corner, lifted its free note, not in vain. But the note had still a tentative ring. Now it may be heard round and sure on all sides, a true spontaneous utterance of our national life and character. Localism is its natural basis; fidelity to the appearances of place and time, and their interpretation in the light of a creative realism which focuses, with surprising unanimity, upon a study of the family rather than the individual.

This point of view is obviously not an American novelty, but a novelty in America. In continental fiction the family is almost helplessly the unit: the individual, it may be, a fragment to be physically broken off or flung off, but not to be detached in spirit or destiny from his closest kin. The "Books of the Small Souls" of the Dutch realist Couperus make up an extraordinary intensive study of the bondage of the family relation, and of any single generation's dependence on its nearest neighbors, before and after. That surprising "best-seller" of the hour, "The Four Horses of Apocalypse," is not least of all a family chronicle. Meanwhile the British novelist shows himself increasingly aware of the forces that link one generation to another. The tendency represents, one may surmise, a queer reaction of post-Victorian revolt. Official hater of the institution of family life, the "new novel" of England seems to be in the act of discovering that no single generation, not even the latest, can either demolish or properly represent the family in its larger unity. Even Mr. Wells, who willingly gives the past credit for nothing, appears of late to have barely eluded this fact. Mr. Bennett, of course, has always made much of it; and several of the "younger school," notably Hugh Walpole and Gilbert Cannan, have built largely upon it in their recent work. To us in America, to our best story-tellers of the past year or two, this larger conception, this imaginative realization of the procession of the generations, seems very recently to have come home with unique force. In their story of the American family, through sheer fidelity to the immediate theme, they have approached an embodiment of the whole course of our national life during the past half-century.

Two things are especially noticeable about the series of novels which we find dealing with this conception. One is their spontaneous and unforced Americanism in mood and style as well as in subject-matter. We find in them nothing, or next to nothing, of the pseudo-Russian or near-Gallic savor which have been so marked in our various experiments towards realism, from Frank Norris to Theodore Dreiser, and which, even more markedly, give an alien tang to much recent British fiction. Such overseas influence as we note goes back of this continentalism to models but lately deprecated: to Thackeray more than to any other. But this, for the most part, is a matter of method rather than accent. The confidential manner is in the ascendant with us, for the time being, at least, and we may well be reconciled to the novelist's taking his cue from Thackeray in preference to the god of the short-story writers, "O. Henry." The other remarkable thing about the group of novels we have in mind is the great variety of their localism. We have had plenty of out-of-the-way exploiting by local colorists. These writers quite simply find themselves concerned with their own special microcosm: New York in Ernest Poole's "His Family"; Pennsylvania in Joseph Hergesheimer's "The Three Black Pennys"; Bostonian New England in Daniel Chase's "Flood Tide"; Chicago in H. B. Fuller's "On the Stairs," and Henry Kitchell Webster's "An American Family"; Indiana in "The Magnificent Ambersons"; Kansas in William Allen White's "In the Heart of a Fool"; California in Mary Fisher's "The Treloars"; Ohio in "The Boardman Family" of Mary S. Watts.

All studies, these, of the American family of the old stock, of the "Anglo-Saxon" strain, as we seem condemned to label the special but complex blend which, however provably in a minority, has so unmistakably set our national type, for some time to come, at all events. The aging central figure of "His Family" is as typically American in his way as Silas Lapham; a city man built of country stuff, through whose eyes, as the years pass, we watch the transformation of the Manhattan of the seventies and eighties, still in essence a native town, to the cosmopolitan market-place of to-day. As for our Midland novels, these Corbetts and Boardmans and Ambersons are all kin. With this group our study concerns largely the rapid shifting of social strata in the Middle West during the past three generations. The very titles of Mr. Fuller's "On the Stairs" and "The Magnificent Ambersons" suggest the process, but it is quite as dominantly the theme of "The Boardman Family," and of hardly minor importance in "An American Family" and "In the Heart of a Fool." Again and again in these narratives we behold the pioneer of fifty or sixty years ago entering shirt-sleeved into his promised land, ranging himself presently in accordance with the material rewards of his superior energy or ruthlessness, and establishing a social supremacy which, after holding its own for a generation, finds itself presently menaced or overthrown outright by fresh tides of energy, industrial and social, welling up from beneath or flowing in from the crowded East. The third generation finds no flattering interpreter among these chroniclers. The feeble æsthetic of "On the Stairs," the spineless elegant parasite of "The Boardman Family," the pompous snob of "The Magnificent Ambersons," each represent the early withering of an aristocracy hastily run up on a foundation of material "success." This social flux and displacement is seen to be bound up with new industrial, social, and political movements the consideration of which, and of their place in this new fiction, may well be reserved for further comment. Its main virtue, after all, is its fidelity in chronicle and portraiture, its unforced and fruitful impulse to present imaginatively, with the unit of the family as interpreter, the development of our national life and character since the Civil War. Of all these studies, "An American Family" is, on the whole, broadest in treatment and soundest in characterization; near it, surely, would be ranked "His Family," and that extraordinary study in heredity by way of an unfamiliar localism, "The Three Black Pennys."

H. W. BOYNTON

Swinburne's Letters

THE LETTERS OF ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE. Edited by Edmund Gosse and Thomas James Wise. Two volumes. New York: John Lane Company.

OWING to causes not divulged the publication of Swinburne's letters has been a thing of shreds and patches. In 1912 we had the "Letters from A. C. Swinburne to Sir Henry Taylor and Other Correspondents" (referred to in a note to the present work, but not otherwise known to the reviewer); then, in 1917, came "Algernon Charles Swinburne," being a volume of letters to his mother and other members of the family; and, a year later, Messrs. Hake and Compton-Rickett brought out a third collection of letters, chiefly to Rossetti, Edwin Harrison (Jowett's protégé), and Watts-Dunton, with an interesting biographical commentary by the editors. We name these earlier books, because, with the exception of the footnote mentioned above, the editors of the work now under review would leave the reader to suppose that this, which they call "a first collection of the poet's letters," had no predecessors (see Introduction, pp. v, vi).

As a matter of fact, Swinburne's correspondence with his mother and sisters is quite the most entertaining of the volumes we have read. Here, for natural reasons, the more human side of the man is shown, especially in the brilliant, if rather hectic, accounts of his friendship with Mazzini and others, in striking descriptions of scenery, and vivid narrations of his fabulous exploits as a swimmer. Outside of this family circle Swinburne was a reluctant correspondent; the act of penmanship was physically painful to him (was this owing to the affliction of St. Vitus dance under which he suffered?), and his occasional letters are almost always wrung from him by some particular question or need. Scribbles of a very different stamp were indeed thrown off by him in his meteoric youth; but these, it would seem, are in part of so unsavory a character as to preclude general circulation.

We have other quarrels with Messrs. Gosse and Wise besides their curious editorial silence. After the excellent biography by Mr. Gosse we should not expect a narrative of Swinburne's life in the present work, although ordinarily a series of letters loses half its interest without some such connecting thread; but we have a right to demand something better than the haphazard sort of notes with which these volumes are actually furnished. A line or two of information is sadly needed in many places. And why, as a specimen of editorial carelessness, should we suddenly find on page 139 of the second volume this note: "Paul Hamilton Hayne (1830-86), the American poet," when the first letter to Hayne appeared as far back as page 207 of the first volume (not p. 231, as given in the Index)?

But enough of the editors; the letters themselves are the important thing. The correspondence embraced in the new collection is confined almost exclusively to the narrow circle of Swinburne's co-workers in poetry and criticism, and runs incessantly on such questions of literary craftsmanship and publication as would naturally arise among such friends. There is surprisingly little about Swinburne's life outside of the "shop." Inevitably letters of this kind tend to become monotonous, if not trivial. But Swinburne had the gift of words, and often his "cataclysmal verbosity" relieves what otherwise, for the world at large, would be downright dullness. Those interested in the technicalities of authorship will find much to interest them in the poet's appeals to Watts-Dunton for criticism of some minute point of versification in English, or to Mallarmé for decision on some delicate question of French usage. Swinburne's verse may suffer from a sort of breathless intrepidity, but one learns here, if one did not know it before, how attentive he was to the least niceties of sound and rhythm. In connection with this matter of rhythmical motion the reader may be interested in this bit of criticism taken from a letter to Rossetti not included in the present collection:

His [Morris's] Muse is like Homer's Trojan women; she drags her robes as she walks. I really think any Muse (when she is neither resting nor flying) ought to tighten her girdle, tuck up her skirts, and step out. It is better than Tennyson's short-winded and artificial concision—but there is such a thing as swift and spontaneous style. Top's [Morris's] is spontaneous and slow; and, especially, my ear hungers for more force and variety of sound in the verse.

"Swift and spontaneous" are evidently the epithets Swinburne would apply to his own style, and they are fit; we confess we had never thought of Morris's verse as slow, but on such a matter a dictum of Swinburne is final.

Apart from this shop-talk, of the narrower sort, these letters are filled with observations on the Elizabethan dramas which Bullen and others were then reprinting, and which Swinburne was criticizing in his remarkable series of essays. His enthusiasm here is in itself sublime, but his constant discovery of things "incomparable" becomes rather amusing, or rather boresome, to one familiar with the lower levels of that literature.

Philosophy as it is Taught

THE PRESENT CONFLICT OF IDEALS: A STUDY OF THE PHILOSOPHICAL BACKGROUND OF THE WORLD WAR. By Ralph Barton Perry. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

THESE lectures, delivered last year at the University of California, and now printed in a sizable volume, are really two books in one; the first being a study, by topics, of the various ideals now dividing the philosophical world, the second an attempt to distinguish and contrast the national ideals which are supposed to underlie the recent, or still existent, conflict in arms. The intention, manifestly, was to connect these two discussions logically, but in fact the nexus between them is not clearly worked out. However, considering the present price of books, no one will quarrel with the author's generosity.

The first section is avowedly a sequel to Mr. Perry's "Present Philosophical Tendencies," the difference being that, whereas in the earlier work he dealt mainly with "technicalities and fundamentals," he now deals with their "moral, emotional, political, and religious implications." To this end he follows the same method of classifying the schools as naturalistic, idealistic, pragmatic, and realistic, by the last meaning the movement recently started and much heralded by the little group of metaphysical rebels of which he is himself a distinguished member. In arranging the minor schools and individuals under these comprehensive heads he shows at times a subtle sense of affinities, with results that at first blush may surprise but are really sound at heart; metaphysics, no less than politics, makes strange bed-fellows. This is notably the case in his treatment of Santayana and Bertrand Russell as naturalists, or rather averted naturalists, if we may coin a phrase suggested by the author's language. Thus he depicts Santayana as one who regards the realm of mechanical nature as the only reality, yet turns away his gaze with a kind of shuddering distaste from this hard world, and yearns for some "imaginative echo of things natural and moral," some iridescent bubble of religion that floats before the eye, entrancingly, but shatters into nothingness if touched by profane fingers. Though Santayana is truly aesthetic where Haeckel has only "the untutored crudeness of the tyro," and is sensitively averse where Haeckel is complacently observant, it is a sound intuition to group them together as trailers, so to speak, in the wake of naturalism. Of the German spokesman for the "religion of the astonished microscopist" Mr. Perry writes with gusto: "One is reminded of the Chicago man's apology to the Easterner: 'We haven't gone in for culture yet, but when we do we'll make it hum.' Well, toward the end of his book on the stockyards of nature, Professor Haeckel 'goes in' for religion, for what he calls 'our monistic religion.'"

This quotation may serve at once to illustrate the author's art of classification and the occasional vigor of his style. He has learned from his master, William James, the argumentative value of the homely realistic phrase, and employs it often with telling effect. It must be admitted, however, that these efforts to arrest attention, interrupting a style less uniformly brilliant than James's, sometimes produce the effect of patchwork, and sometimes mistake vulgarity for vivacity (a fault which James himself did not always avoid).

Between these averted naturalists and his own school of neo-realists Mr. Perry inserts the two major groups of idealists and pragmatists. As might be expected, he is particularly clear in exposing the impossibility of the position into which the adherents of idealism are finally drawn. We have not often seen the con-traditions into which the "personal idealist" falls or the confusion between the degrees of reality and the degrees of value in which the "absolute idealist" is involved, more adequately exposed than in these chapters. In his effort to conceive God as the summation of all reality the absolute realist has never been able to free himself from this dilemma: either, like the Neo-Platonists, he is obliged to consider evil as a mere negation of being, or, like the Calvinist, he is driven to regard God as the source of evil. "As for an Absolute God in whom all evil is contained," Mr. Perry well says, "and by whose Will or Purpose all things must be explained, I feel strongly attracted to the view of Francis Bacon, who said: 'It were better to have no opinion of God at all, than such an opinion as is unworthy of Him. For the one is unbelief, the other is contumely: and certainly superstition is the reproach of the Deity.'"

In discussing pragmatism, Mr. Perry follows a more devious course. This is particularly true of his treatment of the "instrumentalism" of James and Dewey, the theory, that is, that nature is merely the instrument of man's thinking and that truth is to be judged by its success. In this form of pragmatism he sees a new justification of faith, "on the basis not of authority or intellectual proof, but of that same usefulness and fruitfulness which is also held to be the sole justification of science." Now it ought to be clear that this pragmatic attempt to reinstate religion will end in a pure romantic license to believe what one pleases. The will to believe asserts that it is better to believe, not because belief of the right sort will bring us into contact with objective spiritual facts, but because by the very act of belief certain emotions are "let loose." But in practice it is evident enough that one can get the veritable emotion only by an honest belief; it must follow, not precede belief; it cannot be pumped up by the desire to believe, or the will to believe, or belief that it is better to believe. Without the trust in an objective fact which imposes itself on the mind, religion degenerates into a sickly sentiment, and is likely to lead to sickly actions. This is not a proof of the substance of religious faith, but it is a rebuff to the whole range of sentimental religiosity of which James is the master source. An honest mind would prefer atheism.

The same criticism applies to the pragmatic attempt to find a basis for faith in the scientific observation of the behavior of men under religious excitement. "We have repeatedly referred to the fact," says Mr. Perry, "that the modern science of religion has emphasized the facts of religion." To which one might reply that "modern science" has demonstrated the universality of religious emotions, but it has not emphasized the "facts," if by facts we understand the reality of God and immortality lying behind these emotions. The true outcome of the pragmatic dallying with religion is the philosophy of a Sorel and a kind of spiritual Bolshevism. That is to say, the will to believe, as James taught it, may reinforce the immoral and destructive emotions of the soul just as well as the moral and constructive, and in the end, if man's desire is the measure of all things, will so act. Mr. Perry quotes an apposite passage (p. 312) in which Santayana penetrates the hollowness of this effort to bolster up religious faith by an appeal to the value of religious emotions with no authority of divine law behind them.

The truth is, there is a deep-seated error in Mr. Perry's whole scheme, which comes to light only when he takes up his own school of neo-realism. However shrewd his minor classifications, his major four-fold division obscures the real bifurcation which marks the modern teaching of philosophy. In reality pragmatism and neo-realism are offshoots of naturalism, and should be grouped under naturalism as opposed to idealism. It is because pragmatism is a halfway house between avowed naturalism and neo-realism that Mr. Perry is tender to its inconsistencies. His account of neo-realism, for reasons of modesty perhaps, is so brief as scarcely to afford material for a full criticism; but few readers of his book, we think, will fail to draw just such damaging conclusions from the premises of neo-realism as Mr. Perry has drawn against the more open schools of naturalism. His obscure account of consciousness as at once implicated in material nature and different from it is an indication of his real position; and his rejection of Plato's ethical Ideas while retaining the mathematical Ideas is still more significant. Mr. Perry and his fellows have done yeomen's service in laying bare the bankruptcy of the various schools of philosophy which derive from Kant; the solvency of their own school, or even its material distinctiveness, they have yet to demonstrate.

Of the second book included in Mr. Perry's volume we have left ourselves no space to speak. It is not without keen aperçus into so-called national psychology, particularly in the chapters dealing with Germany; but as a whole it is not so original or so significant as what precedes. Though interesting it does not seem to us to add much to the sum of knowledge or to contribute much to a solution of the practical questions now confronting the world. His philosophical chapters, on the contrary, offer a valuable survey of the present tendencies of thought in our schools.

The Run of the Shelves

A GLANCE at the book-shelves reveals a world more than ordinarily full of a number of things, a spectacle to which one might venture to react with at least so much happiness as falls to the lot of kings in these days. The world stands at a crest, looking before and after, and extending its view, shall we say, from Kiaochow to Tacna and Arica. The war must be reduced to comprehensible proportions; a safe course for the immediate future must somehow be charted; the uttermost parts of the earth must be brought into the reckoning. It is small wonder, then, that the Spring's books rival the tulip-beds for riotous contrast.

With so much pressing upon its attention it is a fine compliment to the world to present it with a uniform and limited edition of the works of Leonard Merrick, issued by Dutton. The series opens prosperously with "Conrad in Quest of His Youth," a story of whimsical sentiment, introduced to us by a master in the same field, Sir J. M. Barrie. Later volumes will appear with forewords from similarly distinguished specialists. Mr. W. J. Locke, for example, will later introduce us afresh to the eternally crisp humors of Tricotrin and his friends of the Paris garrets, gathered under the title of "The Man Who Knew Women." Between Locke and Merrick it would be invidious, in this connection, to draw a detailed comparison, but in the matter of his American vogue Merrick has come sadly short of his due. Merrick took the trouble to learn how to write before he began publishing his books, and the appreciation of his quality on the part of other writers is testified to by the large number of them who are eager to combine in an effort to recommend him to a wider public. And the public will do well, while it is busied with setting a world to rights, to discover for itself that the laughter of Paris which is liberated from his pages has in its gayety and dryness a smack of immortality.

"The Hohenzollerns in America" published by John Lane Co., is an extravagant fancy which gives the name to Stephen Leacock's latest volume. It fellows with other "impossibilities," but none of them, not even "With the Bolsheviks in Berlin," is quite so delightful as this peep at the diary ostensibly kept by a faithful niece of the former German Emperor. Under the democratic name of Hohen, Uncle William and Uncle Henry accompanied by Cousin Willie and Cousin Ferdinand of Bulgaria, and joined by Cousin Karl, seek in America, not exactly a refuge but a new field for their talents. Cousin Willie, exhibiting the same passion for souvenirs to which the châteaux of France sadly testify, is before long exiled, as his not too grieving father puts it, to the fortress of Sing Sing; Ferdinand discloses a remarkable ability in borrowing money and making his way in the clothing trade; Karl becomes a waiter, and the princess herself marries a sensible fellow named Peters who delivers ice and seems to be capable of making her quite happy. But it is the tragedy of William that is set forth at once amusingly and profoundly. Of all the fields of opportunity in America that for which the one-time Kaiser felt himself most eminently fit was—O ingenious Mr. Leacock, thus to point out that to which all men will at once delightedly assent!—the presidency of a university. With characteristically German foresight and thoroughness he had selected Harvard University in New York. When he found that the University in New York was called Columbia, he seemed to think it would do quite as well. Armed with his diplomas he presented himself at its offices and ordered the Trustees to be brought into his presence. Apparently he made the wrong sort of impression. He was sent home in a cab.

It would not be fair baldly to recapitulate the further misadventures of the fallen monarch, ending in a rehabilitation of his self-respect in the peddling of badges and buttons under the pleasing delusion that they were decorations pour le mérite. For to leave out the detail is to part company with both the humor and the pathos, and a just blending of the two is precisely what Mr. Leacock provides. Whom the gods destroy they have chosen, since the beginning of time, to make pathetically ridiculous, and in Mr. Leacock they have in this instance a most discerning chronicler of their grim playfulness.

The biological analogy has been made to do minute-man duty in support of war as a necessary condition of human existence. It can be made to serve, apparently with about equal success, as at least the ground of hope for a universal pacifism. Mr. Romain Rolland professes, in the May Atlantic, to have derived much comfort of this sort from his reading of Dr. August Forel's studies on ants. The ant, it appears, is not merely the type and symbol of industry; he is an intense nationalist and therefore, of course, sadly given to fighting. If by a little experiment, it proves possible to destroy his sense of nationality, then the prospect of doing the same for mankind is highly encouraging. The first important fact unearthed in the ant-hill is that newly hatched ants are not naturally combative. Just here, one might think analogy with the young of the human species shows signs of strain. With the ants, however, the fighting instinct puts in an appearance as soon as they are collected in large numbers. Two ants belonging to hostile nations and meeting far from home embrace in a fervor of good feeling—not at all, they avoid each other and pass on. Confine two hostile groups in a restricted space and they will fight ferociously for a time and then make it up; distribute them again among their own kinds and they fall to fighting with renewed fury. So far, ants seem in some respects remarkably like folks. But observe this charming picture:

Forel places a number of ants of enemy species, sanguinea and pratensis, in a glass bowl together. After several days of war, followed by a sullen and suspicious armistice, he introduces among them a tiny, extremely hungry, new-born pratensis. It runs to those of its own species, asking for food. The pratenses repulse it. [Why? Why should its uncles and its cousins treat it thus flint-heartedly?] The innocent one then turns toward the enemies of its race, the sanguinea, and according to the custom of the ants, licks the mouth of two of them. The two sanguinea are so seized by this gesture, which upsets their instinct, that they disgorge the honey to the little enemy. From then on all is said, and forever. An offensive and defensive alliance is concluded between the little pratenses and the sanguinea, against those of its race. And this alliance is irrevocable.

Thus shall a little pratensis, by a delicate gesture, reduce a whole world to constrictive tears. There are still other marvels which we refrain from quoting. "Go to the ant" is very well; but was there not a sting in the tail of the proverb—"Consider her ways and be wise?"

War Posters

THE Great War was rather one of peoples than of governments. To steady, warn, and hearten the people was everywhere necessary. They had to be incited to give to good works, and to lend for war expenses; to offer their skill and strength in factories, and their valor and lives in the trenches. Regions to most of us vague, Poland, Armenia, had to be made vivid and appealing. Women had to be called to unusual trades and pursuits, as laborers on the land, or in munition works; as clerks in the Army and Navy departments. Alongside of the Government activities, such auxiliaries as the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Salvation Army had to conduct vast campaigns both of recruiting personnel and of raising money. In all these multiform appeals to the loyalty and generosity of average people the picture poster played an extraordinary part. Never before has graphic art so definitely stirred and served the masses. The historian of the future will find in the war posters the most definite evidence of what moved men's minds during the Great War.

Fortunately there are many great collections of this art, among which those of the Library of Congress, of the Boston Public Library, of Princeton University, and of Clark University, are perhaps the most important. To explore in such a collection wakes many memories, and raises certain problems of art, of folk psychology, and of nationality. It is exemplary to find Germany using that ugly titanism with which she once celebrated her Imperial ambitions to impress her bewildered people with the horror of Bolshevism. These anti-Bolshevist posters now merely exploit for purposes of repulsion a kind of design which before the war was exploited for purposes of admiration. German art, whether intended to astound or appall, equally lacks style and measure.

On the other hand, nothing could better attest the fine balance of the French temperament than the French war posters. They are strangely quiet; ours shrieked in comparison. There is scarcely a scene of atrocity; perhaps the fact was too near and grim. So animated an apparition as A. Faivre's admirable charging poilu in "On les aura," is exceptional. Since there was no problem of enlistment in France, the posters were almost wholly for good works and for Government loans. Ordinarily the artist made no very overt appeal to emotion. He merely made visible certain facts which were supposed to be in themselves sufficiently appealing. If the appeal is for the Red Cross, Jonas simply shows you a first aid post. Everybody is attending to his business, a slightly wounded infantryman is loading his Lebel to go back to the firing line, another badly wounded on the stretcher awaits the bearers. Nobody pays any attention to you on the sidewalk, yet you have learned unforgettably what first aid implies to the invisible thin line in the trenches. It is the same with Steinlen's great poster "En Belgique les Belges ont Faim." The pitiful group of emaciated women and children ask no aid; they are simply there and very needy. Again Willette's argument for helping the soldier to come home on leave is simply a little peasant wife flying into the arms of her shabby hero husband—"Enfin Seuls" is the only text. The artist trusts the average person to supply the background of the sprawling promiscuity, the pitiless publicity of life in military service. There is almost never in a French poster anybody pointing, or smiling, or beckoning outside of the pictures. The appeal is mental and in a way only indirectly emotional. All this is partly due to the fact that emotion in France meant danger and had to be limited by reason and discipline. Moreover, no pictured emotion could well compete with that habitually in the French soul. Whatever the causes, hate, fear, and vulgarity are not in the French posters. They evince a national self-respect of an extraordinarily fine order.

The British and our own posters are quite different, partly because our need was different. England conducted a colossal recruiting campaign, and we treated our relatively minor recruiting for the Regular Army, Marines, Tank Corps, and Navy as if it were colossal. A vast enlistment of labor was also necessary. The French poster generally called only for sympathy and alms; the British and American poster often called for a man's person and contingently for his life. On the whole, the artists chose to make the most direct appeal. Uncle Sam or the Sergeant Major points an authoritative finger which unmistakably indicates to the slacker his duty. There are dozens of such posters. No doubt they were effective, but I fear the motive had somewhat lost impressiveness through year-long association with the advertising of soft drinks. On the whole, England went very light on atrocities—though Brangwyn did fine designs of this order—and on fighting. To induce a British slacker to enlist it was enough to show him that he thereby was getting into good company. The simplicity of the British recruiting posters is significant. We have just a well-set-up soldier, or a bit of a drill. After all, where the east wind regularly spread the drumming of the guns of Flanders over the eastern counties, there was no need to emphasize the romance of battle nor the imminence of danger. England produced rather few posters of artistic merit. Notable among these are Spencer-Pryce's and the illustrator Raven-Hills's "Watchers of the Seas." For the national loans England made no especial pictorial effort, nor needed to do so. Her poster designers as a class were more overt and direct in their appeals than the French, but hardly more emotional. A principle of social good form and restraint seems to rule, as one of intellectual and artistic discipline did in France.

Our case in America was one of urgency, our needs manifold. Moreover, the actual fighting was far away and dim. Hence the designers of our war posters made the most various and energetic appeals. Because of our mixture of races it was more difficult than in France and England to find the common basis of morale. It was natural then that our artists should cover the case by seeking the maximum emotional appeal. Here there was possibly some abuse of the pointing or pleading figure. A poster, unlike most pictures, is seen not once but a hundred times. It must be as effective the last time as it was the first. The trouble with the peremptory poster is that its effect wears off. If it misses you the first time, it probably misses you entirely; you stiffen against its implied reproach. On the other hand, we produced some of the best and most ingenious posters of the war. Nothing could seem more martially unavailable than the pretty girl of the magazine covers, yet, in Mr. Christy's hands her possible scorn became a potent argument for volunteering. Such posters as merely visualized the magnitude of our mechanical task—the shipyards of Joseph Pennell and of Jonas Lie—were in the French tradition, and most valuable. The Navy and the Marines had merely to continue their tried tradition of pictorial advertisement. They offered frankly the peril and the joy of combat. In the hands of Reisenberg and Reuterdaahl the appeal went home.

Unlike a mere work of art, a poster must evoke will and cause action. From this point of view the war produced no better poster than W. A. Roger's stricken soldier with the legend "His Liberty Bond is Paid in Full." It is at once an intensification and a refinement of the French procedure. Hardly less effective, and in similar tradition, is Gerrit A. Beneker's poster for the Fifth Liberty Loan—"Sure We'll Finish the Job." It represents the American as he likes to imagine himself, good-naturedly resolute and generous. It was consonant with the ideality with which we undertook the war that we alone should call symbolism to our aid. Here the Red Cross poster "The Greatest Mother" was typical. Of finer artistic quality in this vein were the late Kenyon Cox's Columbia and Mr. Blashfield's charging Victory in "Carry On." Humor in the war poster was again largely confined to America. Here the "Devil Dogs" poster for the marines was perhaps the best. The note of cheer was appropriately struck in the posters for the Y. M. C. A. and the Salvation Army. Surely the poster of the helmeted "Doughnut Girl" brought many a dollar to the most comforting of pots. Contrariwise the atrocities played a telling part in our posters. In that matter we had to be shaken out of an officially nourished indifference. Where we felt ourselves really champions of humanity was much less in future arrangements for peace than in making the black past impossible, whether in peace or in war. The artist who silhouetted a Hun leading off a little girl thoroughly understood the thinking of the average American soldier and sailor.

We still lack the material for Russia (which seems to have shown surprisingly little resourcefulness), for Italy, and for our Balkan allies. Germany showed her peculiar psychology in the notable series of poster portraits "Our War Chiefs." It was a kind of appeal that would hardly have counted in the unmilitary nations, who barely knew their generals, and who trusted more in their righteousness of the cause than in the professional skill of their war lords. And the effigies of the great German generals had the defect of the German endeavor generally of implying and requiring prompt success in arms. The war posters of the Allies did their work equally in success and in adversity, whereas the Old German God and his earthly paladins became together a mockery as the German arms failed.

In general the poster artists rose handsomely to the greatest of opportunities, and played an essential part in winning the war. In the poster files of our libraries the future historian will find the most vivid evidence of the hopes, fears, ambitions, and ideals that searched men's souls during the War of Nations.

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Barrie Plays in Print

IN THIS article I had intended to keep to the newly-printed plays,* including the older, but unaging, "Half Hours," without reference to plays I know only by sight or only by hearsay. But in New York at this moment it is hard to mention Barrie without a side-glance at "Dear Brutus" and the dexterous performance at the Empire to which all the actors impart finish, and to which Mr. William Gillette and Miss Helen Hayes add something beside which finish dwindles into coxcombry. The play, indeed, shows Barrie at his gravest, not his best. In these days of inverted sex, the husband is often a charge upon the wife; and if in "Dear Brutus" Barrie profits by an excellent thesis, the thesis may be said, in a way, to have Barrie upon its hands. I agree beforehand to its tart and tonic lesson; but when Barrie proceeds to expound it, I lend the faith which I should rightly borrow. In this play Puck has become senile, and archness didactic. Barrie has tried to be at the same time clever in everybody's way, pouting in his own way, and bitterly and ethically trenchant in the Hardy-esque or Dostoevsky way. No wonder he was overtaken.

The six volumes now before me will help to clarify the arts or spells by the aid of which Barrie has nested in the world's heart, has become, in a quite special sense, the chum of the public. That his mind is dramatic nobody, I think, will contest. Barrie (I call him Barrie, because the new title is as troublesome to the mouth as the new sword to the unhabituated legs) Barrie sees life vis-à-vis. He is at home in the clash, or, better, the click, of meeting and reacting personalities. It is equally clear that his drama is literary.

* QUALITY STREET.
WHAT EVERY WOMAN KNOWS.
THE ADMIRABLE CRICHTON.
ALICE SIT-BY-THE-FIRE.
ECHOES OF THE WAR.
HALF HOURS.
New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Even in his novels he practised that unavowed or disavowed form of literature which is most congenial to drama, the literature which adds to speech, not ornament or intricacy, but only character, which bestows, not the tiara, but the halo. The dialogue in his plays can be lightly and pregnantly straightforward, and it can put winks and finger-ends into speech. Moreover, few men in our time who have mastered the theatre have felt its coercion so little. Even on the stage Barrie's trump card has not been dramaturgy but Barrie. He has bent to the public, no doubt, but his pliancy has taken all reluctance and all stiffness from his compliance.

The chief deduction from the worth of these plays is a waywardness which strays from its aim and declines from its standard. I grant plenty of range to sprightliness, to whimsicality, but even a pleasure-boat will serve pleasure all the better for having sobriety at the helm. The wag or the acrobat in Barrie is the enemy of the comedian. His inequalities confound us. The first, the truly Scotch, act of "What Every Woman Knows" abounds in truth and savor. The wrappage of exaggeration is large, but the point is that this wrappage, however large, is detachable, like a nut-husk, and the kernel is nutritive and saccharine. But the rest of the play is all noise and splutter, three bustling acts panting in the vain attempt to overtake the runaway truth and vigor of the first. The wifely astuteness which foresees that the husband's physical passion for another woman can be cured, before consummation, by intellectual disgust is an astuteness valid only in the theatre. In the disobliging world of fact, results are less easily controllable.

In "Quality Street" the same inconsequence is visible. The play opens with a demurely arch portrayal of high-bred spinsters taking its own lightness very gravely in the childlike dignity of a provincial town. In Act II the woman of thirty impersonates a girl in her teens, the resumption of girlhood by the heroine marking, naturally enough, the play's relapse into juvenility. This rift in the woman's being gives occasion to some highly dramatic altercation between the two halves of the parted ego. The lover, however, has the good taste to prefer the spinster to the giddypate, and the reader, with equal discernment, prefers the earlier and soberer acts. In the last act the play forgets its object, and trips off in the chase of puerilities.

"Alice Sit-By-The-Fire" would be recant to its title if it did not exhale charm. The parents paying rival court to their own children after prolonged absence, and the mother momentarily worsted by the exultant father—this is precisely the material that everybody likes and fears to like. The public is neither child nor man, but big boy—immature in its recoil from immaturity. Really loving simplicity and domesticity, it is eager to be led back to the hearth and the cradle by any one clever enough to impart to this proceeding the smartness of adventure. The first act of "Alice" is a joy. Equally bright, if less delicate, material is found in the staged young girl, turning life into a stage-play, and proceeding to rescue a flourishing victim from a guileless seducer. Much of this is little short of captivating, but the antic in Barrie is so powerful that he cannot keep travesty out of nature even when nature is expressly pitted against travesty. To Amy's melodrama Barrie opposes a farce which he has the temerity to call life. It is quite true that he can humanize farce; the only drawback is that when farce is humanized, it becomes subject to the restraints that fetter humanity. When the ape becomes a child, the grimace which yesterday was excusable or delectable has become an indiscretion and offense. "Alice Sit-By-The-Fire" is a play with grave faults, but we forgive grave faults to those we love.

Worst of all, because best of all, is the fourth full-length play on our list. The "Admirable Crichton" is almost a great play; it would be equally true to declare that it is almost vaudeville. The story recounts the casting-away of a peer's family on a desert island, its self-abasement before the superior manhood of its own servant, and its self-recovery and reconquest of that servant when the conventions rejoin and reclaim it on the deck of the rescuing English ship. Both transformations are profoundly natural, and their juxtaposition in opposition is magnificent. But Barrie, rising like Crichton in face of the fact, falls with Crichton's abjectness before puerilities and forms. The fun of aristocracy on its head can of course be fully realized only in an aristocracy which has kept its erectness inviolable up to the hour of overturn. Barrie, who sees so much, is baffled by the obvious. Half of his point is lost by allowing the aristocracy before shipwreck to turn somersaults in its own drawing-room. On the island we fare no better. Humanity—among the cocoanuts—reverts to ancestral grimaces. But the last act is reckless above all the others. The bitter and biting satire of the re-submergence of the realities by forms and ceremonies—a satire fit for the land of the Yahoos or the isle of the Penguins—is shoved aside for a farcical exhibit of aplomb and mendacity, for the display of cleverness in a word at a point where it was brainless to be clever. Barrie shows his immaturity, not in failing to handle his tools like a man, but in dropping his tools like a boy at the sight of playthings.

In the beautiful equality of proportion of the varied yet consecutive interests of its four acts, "Crichton" is an artistic wonder. But the form of its virtuosity proves, as I think, that Barrie is essentially a writer of one-act plays. He writes novels in panels like Daudet, and his longer plays, in a sense, disband into playlets. "Crichton" itself, the great exception, is less remarkable for centrality than for the equal brilliance of its diverse and related centres—the whole presenting a tour de force of which Maeterlinck, another one-act dramatist, furnished a still more brilliant example in his "Monna Vanna." The two best plays before me are one-act plays. "A Well-Remembered Voice" is a nearly perfect example of vibrancy and poignancy in emotional narrative couched in dramatic form, and the "Twelve-Pound Look" is more than that—is an instance of pure drama in which rancor itself could scarcely surprise a flaw. It is very noticeable that Barrie's great danger, the applying of fantasy in the treatment to realism in the datum, is avoided in both these pieces, in a "Well-Remembered Voice" by the extension of the fantasy to the theme, in the "Twelve-Pound Look" by the extension of the realism to the treatment.

The merits of the other one-act plays are more variable. In the "New Word" we have the old problem of the two sentimentalists (in this case father and son parting in war-time) struggling with the dialect of cynicism. They awaken sympathy, but they manœuvre too much. That Englishmen in the supposed case should burst the meshes of habit is imaginable enough; it is hard to imagine that they would gnaw through them. In "Barbara's Wedding" the pathos quavers a little. In "The Old Lady Shows Her Medals" a woman feigns that she has a soldier son, the feint appears before her in flesh, blood, and khaki, and sonship in the orphan lad rushes to meet motherhood in the childless woman. The piece is hoydenish and saucy, sauciest perhaps in its demand for tears at the conclusion.

"The Will" in "Half Hours" is a strong and cruel play. In fifty-six pages it depicts the ravages of almost as many years in the lives of a married couple in whom a tender and generous youth hardens into an old age starving in its futile plenty and caught fast in the gripe of its own greed. "Rosalind" is the madcap and vertiginous tale of an actress in whom youth and age are exchangeable at pleasure, and "Pantaloon" is a dainty grotesque in which the springs in an old player's heart are affectionately touched.

The characters in the last two plays are largely actors, and the fact is a clew. Barrie's people of all sorts and grades tend to be masquers. The insides are wanting, wanting to the aristocrats who wear aristocracy like a livery, wanting to the spinsters of "Quality Street", wanting even to the Scotch craftsmen in whom reality might have seemed so inexpugnable. There has been a replacement in the cradles; the people are all changelings; or, if you prefer, they are all gamesters, people in whom zeal for the game, the love of mettle passing by gay transition into the love of bluff, is the animus that vivifies conduct. This makes John Shand heroically call out "Gentlemen, the future Mrs. John Shand;" this prompts Crichton's sublime (or ignominious) "My lady" at the close of Act III; this makes Roger refuse to say, and then consent to say, "Good-night, dear father"; this heartens Barrie to risk in "A Well-Remembered Voice" the supreme anomaly of the sportsmanlike ghost. Perhaps in this corelessness of the characters, at least of the grave characters, we draw near to the core of Barrie. But I have only six volumes at hand, and I leave the generality to confute or confirm itself when the completion of the series shall have widened its foundations.

O. W. FIRKINS

War Inflation

THE war has caused an enormous inflation of bank loans and currency, with a corresponding increase of wages and prices, and now that the business world faces about to resume normal trade and industry it is perplexed to know how to reckon with this situation. Are these prices and wages permanent, or, if not, how rapidly will they fall? To what extent are they related to the volume of credit currency in use, and what is the prospect for a reduction of the monetary circulation to pre-war proportions? Where is the gold standard in this situation?

A compilation recently made by the Swiss Central Bank shows that, excluding Russia, whose paper money issues are now utterly abnormal and not related to international affairs, outstanding issues of paper money had risen from a total of about $7,000,000,000 at the end of 1913 to over $30,000,000,000 at the close of 1918. Besides the expansion of credit in this form there is also a great expansion in the form of bank deposits, particularly in countries like Great Britain and the United States, where payments are commonly by checks. In the United States bank deposits increased from approximately $18,500,000,000 in June, 1913, to $30,000,000,000 in June, 1918, the latest date for which statements for all classes of banks are available. The deposit-and-check system performs practically the same function as the paper-money circulation.

It is debated whether high prices have been the cause or result of increased issues of currency. Evidently there is something to be said on both sides. Currency in itself is only a medium or facility; there must be an impulse to use it before it can be effective upon prices. The war created an insistent and almost unlimited demand upon productive capacity everywhere. Every employer became eager to increase his output, but after the slack was taken up and industrial expansion had reached the point where the entire available labor supply was employed, further efforts to enlarge production took the form of a competitive struggle between employers for labor and materials. The available supply of credit had been increased by the addition to bank reserves of over a billion of dollars in gold by importation, and by the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act and amendments. With this new purchasing power at their command, employers, each for himself, went into the markets to struggle for the limited amount of labor and materials available. Rising costs did not deter them as long as prices upon their products could be increased correspondingly without checking the demand. With wages and prices forced up by these conditions, every business required more working capital, and increased amounts of currency were absorbed in circulation.

It is evident that after the point was reached where the output of one establishment could be increased only by reducing the output of another, this competition spent itself almost wholly in raising wages and prices. This is the result properly described as inflation. The Government finally found it necessary to interfere with the drawing off of labor from the industries in which it was especially interested, and by price regulation exerted an influence to stabilize the situation.

With the war ended and the governments out of the market, both as employers and as purchasers, the situation naturally relaxes. The forces that have made for inflation are gone, and the forces which make for a restoration of normal conditions come into play. Buyers and investors are looking for a fall of prices. Buying proceeds for immediate consumption only. Merchants want no larger stocks than are required to enable them to do business from day to day, and construction work is postponed. The fact that the same amount of money and credit is available does not sustain prices in view of the changes affecting production and consumption. It is a familiar fact that in dull times money accumulates in the banks. A bank-note currency, such as our Federal Reserve notes, will undergo natural contraction and retirement when the impulse to trade is wanting. As the governments cease from borrowing and pay off their obligations, bank credit in the form of currency and deposits will shrink in volume. Bankers who went through the panic of 1907 will remember how the clearing house certificates, aggregating several hundred millions of dollars, disappeared apparently without effort. The same was true of the currency issued in 1914 under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. Bankers who were anxious about the redemption of these issues were relieved to find that there was no formal redemption; the public paid them into the banks in the regular order of business and they were not reissued.

The deflation of loans, deposits and currency, however, will not carry conditions back to the pre-war status without bringing opposing influences into play which will have bearing upon prices. Bankers will welcome a degree of natural deflation. They would like to have more leeway in the loan accounts, and they would not want to extend credit upon purely private account as far as they have extended it under the backing of Government credit. A considerable reduction of loans therefore will be welcome, and in this country the ambition of most of the bankers is to get out of the Federal Reserve Banks as regular borrowers. There is no proper objection to using the Reserve Banks to take care of seasonal and temporary demands; that is what they are for, but their resources should be normally reserved for that purpose. But when the member banks are back doing business within their own resources and with a margin to spare, competition for good loans will be resumed. The desire for earnings will prompt bankers to keep loans up to the limit of the new reserves, and business will be encouraged to that end. Low interest rates, therefore, will be an influence against further deflation long before the volume of loans reaches the pre-war level.

Whatever may be the price fluctuations, during this period of unsettlement, when other factors than credit are dominant, the amount of gold in reserves and the offer of cheap bank credit will be dominant factors in finally determining the price level. Cheap money is a stimulus to enterprise. It first raises the price of outstanding securities, for there is a clear profit in borrowing money at 4 per cent. to buy a 5 per cent. bond; and then when existing securities rise in value, there is a direct inducement to create new ones by means of new enterprises. During a period of transition and uncertainty money will lie idle, but money will not be offered at low

(Continued on page 24)

The Review

THE REVIEW had its origin in a prospectus issued February 1, 1918, by Fabian Franklin and Harold de Wolf Fuller. In brief, the object was to establish a weekly journal of general culture, devoted to the preservation of American ideals and American principles of government; a journal that should be animated by a spirit of progress, should welcome and promote needed projects of social improvement, but should insist on the preservation of those fundamentals which must be preserved if the nation is to remain a people of self-reliant freemen.

The need of such a journal, while clear enough then, was not so manifest as it has since become; and it was not until March, 1919, that the capital requisite to the establishment of the journal was, by gradual increments, obtained. This was subscribed in moderate sums by more than one hundred persons in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cleveland, Chicago, and San Francisco.

The subscription-agreement which was circulated for the purpose of obtaining this capital provided for the formation of a stock company with a capital of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares of $100 each. The agreement contained the following clause guaranteeing the independence of the Editors:

"It is mutually understood and agreed that the journal is to be absolutely independent and that its conduct and policy are to be directed exclusively by its Editors."

The Company was incorporated in March, 1919, under the title "The National Weekly Corporation." The act of incorporation contains the following provision:

"In the conduct of the said journal and its editorial policies, the Editors shall not be responsible or accountable to the Corporation for any opinion, comment or criticism lawfully made or expressed by them."

The total number of stockholders is 126. No stockholder has more than 100 shares out of the total of 2,000; 12 hold 50 shares each; 4 between 25 and 50; 12 have 25 shares each; 6 between 10 and 25; the remaining stockholders have amounts ranging from 10 shares to one share.

TIFFANY & Co.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE STATIONERY
WATCHES AND CLOCKS

QUALITY UTILITY AND VALUE

THE TIFFANY BLUE BOOK GIVES PRICES

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra.

Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

(Continued from page 22)

rates indefinitely without takers. Gradually the public will become accustomed to any situation, accept it as normal, and go ahead with business. When that time comes, the amount of bank reserves and available credit will be effective upon prices because the desire to use them will be present.

The gold reserves of the whole world have been augmented during the war. In all countries the gold which was formerly in circulation has been gathered into the banks of issue, and the policy will be followed of retaining it there, using paper in circulation. Gold remains the standard of value; its production is checked by the increase of mining costs, which in the long run will be an influence for a lower price level, but that influence for the present is overcome by the economies in the use of gold. The banking community will accustom itself to doing business upon smaller reserves. The examples of India and the Philippines show how the gold standard may be maintained as a measure of value with comparatively little gold in circulation or in reserves.

Only a few countries have less gold in their reserves than before the war, and the United States, Japan, Argentina, Spain, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries have far more than they ever held before. Eventually there will be a natural redistribution, but present trade conditions indicate that the United States will have more before it has less. The necessity which will exist for foreign purchases in this country, the interest which is accruing upon the foreign indebtedness held here, and the liquidation of our foreign indebtedness to Europe, indicate that the balance of payments will be in our favor and that nothing but liberal investments by America abroad will prevent importations of gold. The natural reaction from this would be a higher price level here than abroad. Under past conditions this situation would create an adverse trade balance, resulting in gold exports, but in our creditor position it will not easily occur.

The state of domestic bank reserves of our foreign exchanges and monetary conditions the world over are favorable, therefore, to the establishment of a higher price level than existed before the war. Furthermore, the adjustment of wages and prices after any period of unsettlement is always influenced more or less by organized effort and will be more now than ever before. There is a world-wide effort to maintain present wages and even to advance them, in face of conditions which naturally indicate a decline. The shortage of food and high cost of living affords a strong argument against wage reduction, but it presents the danger that we may have, as they have in Europe, high nominal wages, with much unemployment. Thus in the steel industry no reduction of wage rates has occurred, but with the mills running at little above one-half their capacity, a large reduction in actual wage-payments has occurred. Moreover, thousands of wage-earners are out of employment in the construction and other industries because of the high prices of iron and steel. It can not be considered that under these conditions wages are satisfactorily maintained.

These efforts to sustain and advance wage-rates and reduce working hours, to the extent that they increase the costs of production, tend to prevent a return to lower price levels, and are the strongest influences to this effect. The uncertainty and disorder in industry, which serves to discourage enterprise and reduce production, have the same effect. The transfer of industrial functions to the Government, so far as experience has shown, has a like effect. These influences arising from social conditions are more effective for the maintenance of high prices than monetary conditions, although, as we have seen, these are favorable to a higher level eventually than prevailed before the war.

The whole situation at the moment is regarded with misgiving, because it is in part artificial and in part supported by temporary conditions. The railways, despite the advances in their charges are running behind, and public utilities which have not had the privilege of increasing their charges are threatened with bankruptcy. Thousands of people belonging to the salaried class, or those whose employments are such that they have not been able to get their pay readjusted, are suffering injustice. Naturally, they are striving to get their pay up to the new level, but it will be a long time before a complete readjustment can be accomplished. Moreover, there is one class who never could be compensated for the losses they would suffer by having this inflation made permanent, and that is the class comprising creditors in fixed terms of money. The holders of bonds, mortgages, savings bank deposits, life insurance policies, pensions, etc., would endure a permanent shrinkage in the value of their holdings. On the other hand, powerful influences eventually will be enlisted in favor of a return towards the former level of values. When order is re-established in Europe agricultural production there will come back to the pre-war volume, and, with the encouragement that will be given to agriculture everywhere, the prices of foodstuffs, clothing materials, and other necessities may be expected to fall. Efforts to maintain fixed prices for these products never have been successful, and when the farmers are obliged to accept lower pay for feeding and clothing the workers in all the other industries, they certainly will not be content to go on paying the transportation charges and prices for manufactures which it is now sought to stabilize upon the war level. Nor is it conceivable that the purchasing power of the farm population can decline without affecting employment and prosperity in the other industries. The test of the policy of attempting to reorganize industry permanently upon the new level will come then.

GEORGE E. ROBERTS

Books Received

FICTION

- Author of Elizabeth and her German Garden. Christopher and Columbus. Doubleday, Page. $1.60 net.
 Bailey, Temple. The Tin Soldier. Penn Publishing Co.
 Bruere, Martha B. Mildred Carver, U. S. A. Macmillan. $1.50.
 Comstock, Sarah. The Valley of Vision. Doubleday, Page. $1.50 net.
 Conrad, Joseph. The Arrow of Gold. Doubleday, Page. $1.50.
 Cooke, M. B. The Cricket. Doubleday, Page. $1.50 net.
 George, W. L. Blind Alley. Little, Brown. $1.75 net.
 Grendon, Felix. Nixola of Wall Street. Century. $1.50.
 Ibañez, Vicente Blasco. Blood and Sand. Dutton. $1.90 net.
 Kelly, E. M. Why Joan? Century.
 Kerr, Sophie. The See-Saw. Doubleday, Page. $1.50 net.
 Kummer, F. A. The Web. Century. $1.50.
 La Motte, E. N. Peking Dust. Century. $1.50.
 Lane, R. W. Diverging Roads. Century. $1.50.
 Maxwell, W. B. The Mirror and the Lamp. Bobbs-Merrill. $1.75 net.
 Mearns, Hughes. The Vinegar Saint. Penn Publishing Co. $1.50 net.
 Merrick, Leonard. Conrad in Quest of His Youth. Dutton. $2.00.
 Snaith, J. C. The Undeclared. Appleton. $1.60 net.
 Tarbell, I. M. The Rising of the Tide. Macmillan. $1.50.
 Vorse, M. H. I've Come to Stay. Century. $1.25.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

- Bryce, Rt. Hon. Viscount. Essays and Addresses in War Time. Macmillan. $2.00.
 Cabell, J. B. Beyond Life. McBride. $1.50 net.
 Cambridge History of America Literature. Edited by W. P. Trent and Others: Parts I and II. Putnam. $3.50 each.
 Canby, H. S. Education by Violence: Essays on the War and the Future. Macmillan. $1.50.
 Leacock, Stephen. The Hohenzollerns in America. Lane. $1.25 net.
 Lippmann, Walter. The Political Scene. Holt. $1.00 net.
 Newbolt, Henry. A New Study of English Poetry. Dutton. $3.00 net.
 Thayer, W. R. Volleys from a Non-Combatant. Doubleday, Page. $2.00 net.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

- Hough, L. H. The Clean Sword. Abingdon Press. $1.00 net.
 Mackenna, R. W. The Adventure of Life. Macmillan. $1.25.

Perry, R. B. The Present Conflict of Ideals. Longmans, Green. $4.50 net.
 Ward, James. Psychological Principles. Putnam. $6.50 net.
 Whiting, Lillian. They Who Understand. Little, Brown. $1.25 net.
 Znaniecki, Florian. Cultural Reality. University of Chicago Press. $2.50 net.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

Gourko, B. War and Revolution in Russia, 1914-1917. Macmillan. $4.00.
 Halévy, Daniel. President Wilson: A Frenchman's Interpretation. Translated by Hugh Stokes. Lane. $1.50 net.
 Low, A. M. Woodrow Wilson: An Interpretation. Little, Brown. $2.00 net.
 Putnam, Emily J. The Lady. Putnam. New Edition. $1.75 net.
 Raymond, E. T. Uncensored Celebrities. Holt. $2.50 net.
 Robertson, C. G. Bismarck. Makers of the Nineteenth Century Series. Holt. $2.25 net.
 Strachey, Lytton. Eminent Victorians. Putnam. $3.50 net.
 Sweet, W. W. A History of Latin America. Abingdon Press. $3.00 net.
 The Letters of Algernon Charles Swinburne. Edited by E. Gosse and T. J. Wise. 2 volumes. Lane, $5.00 net per set.
 Voltaire in His Letters, Being a Selection from His Correspondence. Translated by S. G. Tallentyre. Putnam. $3.50 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Baker, G. P. Dramatic Technique. Houghton Mifflin. $3.75 net.
 Barrie, Sir James. Alice Sit By the Fire. Scribner.
 Fletcher, J. G. The Tree of Life. Macmillan. $1.60.
 Kipling, Rudyard. The Years Between. Doubleday, Page. $1.50 net.
 Lowes, J. L. Convention and Revolt in Poetry. Houghton Mifflin. $1.75 net.
 McCrae, John. In Flanders' Fields. Putnam. $1.50 net.
 Middleton, Scudder. The New Day. Macmillan. $1.00.
 Neihardt, J. G. The Song of Three Friends. Macmillan. $1.25.
 Rostrevor, G. Escape and Fantasy. Macmillan. $1.00.
 Trask, Katrina. Without The Walls. Macmillan. $1.40.
 Untermeyer, Louis. The New Era in American Poetry. Holt. $2.25 net.
 Yeats, W. B. The Wild Swans at Coole. Macmillan. $1.25.

(Continued on page 26)

The Tiger of France; A Modern Joan of Arc; A New Alfred Noyes Volume, Resurrected Nations, etc.

¶ H. M. HYNDMAN'S sincere, able life of the Tiger of France, CLEMENCEAU: The Man and His Time, is hailed on all sides as the right book at the right time. The Atlantic Monthly calls it, "A graphic sketch, a faithful study and an honest portrait . . . Interesting, and growing in interest, until we are shown in a mighty crisis how the hour and the man of the hour meet."

¶ One of the most remarkable human documents we have ever published is YASHKA: My Life as Peasant, Officer and Exile, by MARIA BOTCHIKAREVA. The Outlook calls it, "one of the most sincere and candid as it is certainly one of the most thrilling recitals of heroic adventure that the entire war has produced."

¶ The new ALFRED NOYES volume contains all this poet's verse written since 1914 and many other poems hitherto unpublished in America. It includes his great war poem, "The Avenue of the Allies," and such other well-liked poems as "Kilmeny," "Princeton, 1917," "The Phantom Fleet," etc. It is entitled THE NEW MORNING, and has, says the N. Y. Sun, "a divine sanity, clear beauty, and quiet strength."

¶ "As a background for intelligent understanding of current discussion," says the N. Y. Evening Post of ISAAC DONLEVINE'S THE RESURRECTED NATIONS, "the volume serves a useful purpose." A book that gives the essential facts about the national claims of Poland, Armenia, Jugoslavia, Arabia and fourteen other nations freed by the Great War.

¶ The N. Y. Sun describes OLIVE HIGGINS PROUTY'S notable volume of short stories, GOOD SPORTS, as "a treat to the lover of skilful story telling." Another striking example of "skilful story telling" is GERTRUDE ATIERTON'S THE AVALANCHE. "A mystery story and a good one," says the N. Y. Telegraph. "Mrs. Atherton has woven her tale so cleverly that the reader is kept in the dark until it is time for him to be given light."

¶ Captain EDDIE RICKENBACKER gives the essence of America's share of the war in the air, as well as the most thrilling and satisfying story of the conflict in FIGHTING THE FLYING CIRCUS. From his first flight until his return to America as our Premier Ace, with 26 German aircraft to his credit, Captain Rickenbacker's exploits form the most exciting chapter of America's air history. A thoroughly interesting book.

¶ At all bookshops

PUBLISHERS FREDERICK A. STOKES COMPANY NEW YORK

Common Sense for the New Day

Essays in Social Justice. By Thomas N. Carver. $2.00.

Whither humanity must steer is a question of fact and not of opinion, of likes and dislikes, or of approval and disapproval by an inner conscience. The essays setting forth this point of view are refreshing in their sturdy readiness to face actual conditions.

Some Aspects of the Tariff Question. By Frank W. Taussig. $2.00.

A statement of fundamental principles regarding tariff problems, followed by specific discussions showing the application of these principles to the sugar, iron, steel, silk, cotton, and wool industries.

The State Tax Commission. By Harley L. Lutz. $2.75.

In this book the principal emphasis is placed on the methods and results of centralized tax administration. Detailed accounts are given of eleven of the more important commissions, and comment on twenty-four others.

Bibliography of Municipal Utility Regulation and Municipal Ownership. By Don Lorenzo Stevens. $4.00.

Street-car problems now disturbing many sections of the country demand clear thinking; so do the many other questions involving municipal utilities. This book is an annotated selection of the most informing literature on all these subjects.

Collected Addresses. By Elihu Root. 7 volumes. $19.50 a set.

Volumes are also sold separately, the prices being either $2.50 or $3.00. A complete descriptive pamphlet will be sent upon request.

7 Randall Hall, Cambridge, Mass.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

280 Madison Avenue, New York City

BOOKS YOU SHOULD OWN

BOLSHEVISM

by JOHN SPARGO

"Spargo's great book is an overrunning storehouse of facts for which all will be grateful."—Charles Edward Russell in New York Times.

"Admirable study of the Russian Revolution and the Soviet."—Simeon Strunsky in New York Evening Post.

"The first careful, intelligent study which has been done in English."—New York Globe.

"Fortunate to have a book like John Spargo's 'Bolshevism'."—Ex.-Pres. William H. Taft in Philadelphia Public Ledger. $1.50

EXPERIMENTS IN INTERNATIONAL ADMINISTRATION

by FRANCIS BOWES SAYRE

"It is quite obvious that such a book as this is just about the most timely and useful that could possibly be put forth."—New York Tribune.

"It is an unusual and worth-while effort that will be of service to all who are interested in the technicalities of the project."—Boston Post.

"A book of vital interest to intelligent citizens."—Boston Herald. $1.50

IMPRESSIONS OF THE KAISER

by DAVID JAYNE HILL

Former American Ambassador to Germany

During the years when Dr. Hill represented this country at Berlin, he was in almost daily contact with either the Kaiser himself or with his ministers, and he has, in this book, given the world a real picture of the inner workings of the Kaiser's policies, as revealed through his own words and actions, his own letters and official documents.

Read this searching revelation if you would know the truth. $2.00

THE SOCIETY OF FREE STATES

by DWIGHT W. MORROW

The book sets forth simply and directly the history of the former projects for world peace; describes the previous ventures in international co-operation, including those extraordinary ones forced upon the world by the war with Germany; analyzes minutely the proposed Covenant of the League of Nations, and points out the great problem that must be solved, of how to secure world order with the least sacrifice of the principle of nationality and the largest measure of national liberty. $1.25

INTERNATIONAL IDEALS

by WOODROW WILSON

Uniform with "Why We Are at War," "In Our First Year of War"

This new book of the President's contains all the addresses made by him during his first stay in Europe, when the eyes of the whole world were upon him. From the first address delivered the book comes down to the final one given when he presented the League of Nations Covenant to the Peace Congress on February 14, 1919. 16mo, $1.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

Established 1817

NEW YORK

On the bare announcement of the publication of THE REVIEW, many hundreds of annual subscriptions were received even before the first issue went to press. A magazine dealer of forty years' experience has described as unprecedented the welcome thus accorded this publication.

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 2

New York, Saturday, May 24, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	27
Editorial Articles:
The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson	30
The New Congress	31
Exit Austria	32
Reflections on Cooked Food	33
The Middle West and the Peace. By Philo M. Buck, Jr.	34
Dance of Death. By Harry Ayres	35
Correspondence	39
Book Reviews:
Germany's Former Ascendency	40
The Mad English	40
The Bull-Fight	41
The Lot of American Wives. By H. W. Boynton	42
An Object-Lesson for Socialists	43
The Run of the Shelves	44
Drama:
Peninsular and Oriental—Bena- vente and Kalidasa. By O. W. Firkins	44
Jazz. By Howard Brockway	46

SENATOR LODGE'S statement, issued after the close of the first day's session of Congress, has been taken as an indication that there will be a bitter fight in the Senate against the acceptance of the League Covenant. Nevertheless, it is to be observed that the emphatic portion of his statement on this subject is contained in the expression of his own views; what he says about the attitude of "a majority of the Senate" is much more guarded. Senator Lodge is "satisfied that a majority of the Senate feel very strongly that the League, as now presented, must receive amendment, that in its present form, without any change, it is unacceptable and would not be accepted." When he goes on to declare that "the new form is distinctly worse than the old and more dangerous to the peace of the world and to American rights and interests," he is speaking only for himself. It is true that he is the leader of his party in the Senate; but there have been abundant indications that the party will by no means stand as a unit on this issue. If the Covenant is so bad as Mr. Lodge appears to regard it, and if this view should prevail in a large proportion of the Senate's membership, there will certainly be a bitter fight, for no mere reservation appended to the acceptance of the Covenant as a whole could remove the difficulty. Yet it is in that direction that sober thought must look for a sound and helpful treatment of the question. Long before the issue can be sharply drawn, the country will have been heard from in many ways, and not until then can any estimate be formed of the probabilities either of party or of personal alignment in the Senate.

Another point touched upon by Mr. Lodge gives occasion for reflections of wider scope. Speaking of the treaty with Germany, he says that it is impossible to gather from the summary that has been sent out "what the terms imposed upon Germany in many respects are." Those of us who wish to be candid must admit that this is true not merely on account of any deficiencies there may be in the summary but because of the immense complexity of the terms themselves. It takes much deeper study than any that seems thus far to have been given to it to decide, even approximately, what the economic condition of Germany will be if the terms are enforced. That they are extremely severe it would be fatuous to deny; but on the other hand, those who rush into lamentations over the reduction of the German people to a state of slavery have yet to show that anything of the kind is involved in the conditions. The thing is largely a question of arithmetic, and very little in the way of a sincere and competent arithmetical estimate has as yet been forthcoming. Humiliation there doubtless is in the treaty, and there is grave economic hardship. But unless it be assumed that the German people, either through lack of spirit or through revolutionary disorganization, will be prevented from exerting the tremendous recuperative powers naturally inherent in such a people, it would take a close examination of the facts to justify the assertion that they are debarred from the possibility of renewed prosperity.

THE considerable success of the Anti-Bolshevist campaign in Murmansk is the best answer to the ill-judged outcry against the presence of our troops in Russia. No one has seemed to reflect on why they were there, or on how they could be got out. They were there as a military measure, under the high command of the Allied armies. The purpose was to save war stores which were likely to go to Germany. The opposition of the Bolsheviki created a situation which had to be met. In all this we were simply doing our military duty by our allies. In honor we had no choice in the matter. Hence criticism of our sending a contingent is unfair. It was a necessary incident of our association with the Entente. It had no political color, was not expressly directed against the Bolsheviki but against Germany. Only those whose sympathy with the Russian dictatorship is supersensitive have any ground to complain, and their complaint again should be not against President Wilson but against the Allied high command. In view of what has actually occurred, the sound strategy of the move can scarcely be gainsaid. As our temporary occupation has lengthened, the Murmansk line has become a Russian line. The provisional government of the Archangel region has joined with the Siberian moderates, and a long step has been taken towards restoring self-government to tortured Russia. Luck—yes, but the kind of luck which generally follows the resolute performance of a plain duty. As to withdrawing our contingent instanter, it could neither have honorably been done, nor was it quite easy physically. There are minds which can remove a brigade from the Murmansk bogs as easily as the ivory peg is withdrawn from a hole on the cribbage board. Mere army staffs are incapable of these feats. It takes the imagination of a Henry Ford to get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas. The time will come when the United States will be glad to have played its modest part in the Archangel expedition.

ALTHOUGH the German settlement looks difficult for the moment, it really is simple as compared with the proposed partition of Austria. German Austria is reduced to her old geographical limits. There is nothing to fear from her except a possible union with Germany. To such an act of self-determination Europe must reconcile itself. It may not come. If it does, it should not be opposed. No permanent peace can be made on the basis of enforcing an artificial weakness in Central Europe. Our moral and physical guarantees must be adequate to deal with a strong Germany. The more urgent danger comes from the treatment of Hungary in the Peace Treaty. Unlike Austria, Hungary is potentially strong and aggressive, and in her own mind aggrieved. The local restraint upon her is simply Jugo-Slavia and Greater Rumania. Hungary is cut off from the sea, and finds hundreds of thousands of Magyars scattered through the surrounding Slavs and Rumanians. Jugo-Slavia is likely to receive a consideration, due naturally to sympathy for Serbia, out of proportion to her power and racial unity. All this is coming about logically enough as a dictate of racial self-determination.

But it is clear that racial self-determination does not in itself promise either justice or peace. It gives no safeguards, for example, to the Moslems and Catholics of Bosnia and Herzegovina, nor to the commercial needs of Hungary. The treaty may merely have moved the Macedonian situation from the Balkans to Central Europe, as too radical treatment of an ulcer on the extremities may drive it into the vitals. Many will feel that in denying Hungary access to the Adriatic across Croatia, which in religion is affine to her, the principle of self-determination has been carried to an extreme. What is certain is that peace depends upon an effective political surveillance of Jugo-Slavia. She is a European nation only by adoption. Such is the patent weakness of the adjustment. The strength of the situation is the strong moral entente between France and Serbia. That it is powerful enough to dominate the really very desperate elements of Jugo-Slavia is rather a pious hope than a reasonable expectation. With the external controls of Russia, and Imperial Russia, removed, the Balkan situation is by no means simplified. It will afford a field for all the patience and insight that Geneva can command. To what extent the United States is willing to be involved in such problems is one of the serious questions of the time.

AT first sight the Chinese Consortium represents no more than a business man's application of a political theory—the bankers of America, England, France, and Japan vitalizing the open-door policy—pooling financial resources for the development of Chinese railroads and mines. There are great practical benefits which should flow to China and to the world from the arrangement; uniformity of management and standardization of equipment over the whole field, in place of competitive confusion as under the old system of development within separate spheres of influence, will almost certainly render the enterprise a financial success for the investors of the four nations interested, and an economic boon to the country where it is launched. But the plan has deeper significance and far greater possibilities than those merely of material success. It is the first great experiment in developing the backward portions of the world by international coöperation instead of through the medium of competitive nations. A certain school of thought has long held that the most fruitful cause of war between nations is the economic friction engendered through over-competition, development of nationalistic aspirations within, and among, the so-called spheres of influence. One need not accept this doctrine unreservedly to agree at least that international friction will be lessened if there is more coöperation and less competition in any given sphere of world activity. A hundred-billion-dollar stock company of the world might not inconceivably prove a more powerful peace agency than international courts and fleets.

IT is gratifying indeed to discover a ray of sunshine in the otherwise cloudy record of the Post Office Department. The air mail route between New York and Washington has ended its first year with a book profit of twenty thousand-odd dollars, with a record of 128,000 miles flown and 193,000 pounds of mail delivered. The service was an experimental one, and the novelty of the air mail made it possible to charge almost any postage desired, so the financial balance one way or the other is of secondary importance in judging the success of the venture. What is important, and what is gratifying, is that the everyday commercial possibilities of the airplane as a means of rapid and dependable communication received a thoroughly successful tryout. The same six machines that started, finished out the year and are still in use and going strong. Our machines made as many as one hundred and seventy-nine flights without a forced landing. There were no crashes and no fatal accidents, and only one man was seriously hurt. These gasoline postmen of the air seem to have flown day in and day out in all sorts of weather, and to have adhered to schedule with the nonchalance of a bored letter-carrier. Stunt flying is necessary to train combat pilots, but commercial exploitation of the air will only come through careful, businesslike hack flying over prescribed routes.

WHOWER may be preparing to dance gleefully at the approaching funerals of John Barleycorn, the doctors are not among them. At a recent meeting of the New York Academy of Medicine not one but viewed his official departure with apprehension, not one who failed, with all his faults, to do the "good familiar creature" some sort of reverence. Who better than the physicians should know the ills that throng his train? Yet these same careful observers felt no conviction that drink's attendant ills would meekly consent, like widows of Hindustan, to share the grave of their late master. Fickle pensioners that they are, these evil ministers of the great devil may, in the doctor's opinion, enlist under new and more hostile banners to plague mankind with fresh virulence. Though the full measure be known of the harm done by the soon to be the late king, the extent of the ills he saves us from is yet to be discovered. It has yet to be proved that the thing that makes drunkards may not, if recourse to drink become impossible, make many of these unfortunates even more of a menace to themselves and to society. Again, how much the world will lose through the absence to themselves of the age-long social solvent, how much the poets will suffer through the lack of an occasional beaker full of the warm south, how much the philosophers will regret that goblet which passed from hand to hand among the three, while Socrates discoursed to the other two upon the kinship between comedy and tragedy, we do not know. The losses may be more than balanced by the gains, and great gains there undoubtedly will be; but the possible losses are large enough to claim real attention.

IN writing last week on the purposes and ideals of the American Legion, we took occasion to sound a warning against the danger of its becoming involved in political manipulation and self-seeking. Since that time, fuller accounts of the doings of the St. Louis caucus have come to hand; all of which indicate that the convention was dominated by an admirable temper of non-partisan nationalism, and an aggressive exclusion of self-interest. Several pernicious resolutions proposed from the floor were vociferously howled down. The convention refused overwhelmingly to take a stand on prohibition; and it appears that after all no Presidential straw-ballot—official or otherwise—was ever taken, this rumor having its origin in the fact that a local newspaper smuggled a few ballots on to the floor, which were promptly suppressed and destroyed as soon as discovered from the platform. But the prettiest incident of all was when a certain resolution asking more pay for discharged soldiers was actually reported favorably from committee only to be thrown out neck and crop by a thundering negative voice-vote of the full convention. As one soldier-speaker put it, "we aren't here to get something out of the government, but to put something into it." Shades of the G. A. R.! What is this? An association of war veterans which isn't looking out for itself first of all? Only time can tell; but in the meanwhile they have made a fine, clean get-away. It doesn't seem as if the country were precisely headed for the demnition bowwows when our "councils of soldiers and sailors" behave in this way, does it?

ONE great lesson already learned from the transatlantic attempts is that the seaplane is the only logical heavier-than-air vehicle for ocean flight. Had it not been for the ability of NC 1 and NC 3 to alight on the water and ride out a small gale, there would have been ten dead men floating around within a few hundred miles of the Azores instead of fifteen very live and very confident naval aviators at Ponta Delgada. Only fog, it is true, prevented all these craft from gaining their objectives: but if not fog next time, it will be storm, headwinds, loss of direction or engine trouble—any one of a number of causes to compel a descent; and a forced landing in mid-ocean means death, unless the machine can remain afloat to be rescued or can proceed on the surface to safety. Read, in the NC 4, achieved a sensational, epoch-making flight from land to land, earning the plaudits of the world. But second only to his exploit is that of Commander Towers; his astonishing feat of calmly taxiing in to his destination at Ponta Delgada after being fog-bound at sea for two days and virtually given up for lost, is a revelation of the seaworthiness of aircraft amid the most adverse conditions. In the still little-known element of the air, unlooked-for trouble and unanticipated forms of danger will for a long time to come be the rule rather than the exception. The highly successful flight, when all goes well, gives rise to a false optimism and teaches but little: and the highly unsuccessful flight, which attempts the well-nigh impossible, and ends in tragedy, teaches nothing at all of air navigation—though it stands to the eternal credit of the hot-blooded, iron-hearted courage of men who are willing to venture their lives on the short end of a glorious thousand to one bet.

IN the past week the Metropolitan Museum has been host to the College Art Association of America and to the American Federation of Fine Arts. The proceedings of both bodies were of more than usual interest. Both naturally discussed the living issue of war memorials. The smaller body of professors might reasonably claim that their trained students scattered throughout the country were the surest promise of beauty in the war monuments; whereas the Federation might point to its influence in many localities as yet untouched by the professors. On the whole matter of war memorials the Federation has been prompt and adroit in making suggestions and offering advice. More than two hundred and fifty local committees on war memorials have applied for advice to the central office of the Federation at Washington and doubtless many more have consulted the various local committees. The relation of such bodies as the College Art Association and the American Federation to the Metropolitan Museum and its compeers is worth considering. For trained directors and curators the Museum must depend largely on the young graduates from the college art courses. The relation will be mutually advantageous. It will tend to give a practical and professional scope to studies that have been pursued somewhat at random, and it will provide young museum officials earlier and better trained than were most of their predecessors.

ANYONE who reflects upon the past months and years must be impressed with the economic and political virtues, not to mention those of personal character, revealed by the great exigency. He becomes prouder than before, not only of his own countrymen, but of the ordinary people of other nations. He thinks wistfully of what the world might be if the virtues elicited by the crisis could be retained as everyday qualities. Brooding over the events of the war-period, however, tends to a certain balance between desire for the perpetuation of some of its results and misgiving as to the persistence of certain compensating follies—compensating, in that their presence tends to reduce the whole picture to lower tones. The most typical of the war-VICES, if they may be so termed, has been extravagance. Higher wages have been spent in suddenly lifting the standard of living to a level from which descent will be attended with much discomfort and perhaps resentment against an inevitable retrenchment. The girl munition-worker has purchased two or three tailor-made suits, a fur coat, a luxurious outfit of silk stockings—an outfit that many a daughter of even the wealthy would not think of owning. The man has bought an automobile and is now used to his luxury, as is the human way, so that it appears to be a necessity, denial of which is a real hardship. Life becomes much more complex and the taste for the simpler satisfactions is on the wane. Perhaps it is hopeless to think of retaining the good and discarding the ill that have come to us through the war; but we should use every possible agency to accomplish just that. In particular the younger generation should be fortified, if possible, in school and elsewhere, to realize that it is not necessary, in order to lead a happy life, that one should have complex and costly satisfactions; but that personal and national well-being are equally subserved by the practice of the simpler virtues of thrift and contentment.

THE "nationalization of women" ascribed to certain Bolshevik committees, whatever the facts may prove to be, gives occasion to remark that if there is to be an assault upon all forms of monopoly, that very strict type of monopoly, the monogamous family, can hardly hope to emerge scathless. As a matter of fact, any attack on property is likely to emerge in the guise of encroachment on marriage and the family. Few realize how intimately marriage and property have been interlocked from the beginning of their evolution; and that the latter has acted consistently, and still acts, as a sort of stabilizer for the former. The wife of status—the real wife as distinguished from the mere consort—was once the bought wife; and when women were purchased with a bride-price, they were proud of what they brought to their kinsmen and were endowed with honorable epithets indicative of the number of cattle or amount of other wealth realized through them. Later on in the evolution of the marriage institution, the status-wife was the one who brought dower to her husband; and her position was made the more stable thereby, for while her husband might meditate divorcing her, he receded from harboring the thought of divorcing, at the same time, the cattle that came with her. He was therefore more complaisant and forbearing, and the union was the more likely to endure.

In marriage there is involved the composition of the interests of many people, in addition to those of the protagonists; one of the chief of these interests is as to the disposition and inheritance of property. But only the children of the status-wife could regularly inherit, or continue the joint interests of the family. Also the whole community has an interest in the disposition of property; for if this matter is unregulated, lawlessness, confusion, and disorder easily supervene, with consequent menace to the well-being and integrity of the society at large. This correlation of marriage and property could be developed at length through its historical phases; but for the present purpose it is enough to note the interpenetration of the two institutions, which is so close that they have varied together, and have stood and fallen together. If property is to be nationalized or communalized, the appearance of the same process in the allied institution is not, at any rate, unthinkable. In any case, the further extremists go in this weird nationalization of women, the safer an Anglo-Saxon community, with its traditions of the sanctity of the family, is from the Bolshevik infection.

The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson

It was Mr. Wilson's achievement to give to this great yearning of the world's masses . . . a winning exposition and a moral uncton which caught the imagination of peoples everywhere, riveted their attention upon him as the one man living who sounded their motives and voiced their aspirations, and made him their idol as well as their guide and friend. . . . He was the hope of democracy, and the fear of his enemies was the confidence of his friends. How Mr. Wilson has repaid the confidence which the peoples gave him, all the world now knows. The one-time idol of democracy stands to-day discredited and condemned.—The Nation, May 17.

However much the words of the Fourteen Points may be invoked to justify this treaty, one thing is so plain as to seem beyond argument. The world which will result from the document can by no stretch of language be made to agree with the picture which the President had in mind when he went to Paris, or when he spoke in the days of his glory of what was to be accomplished. . . . By the standards of which he himself was the most eloquent spokesman he has failed.—The New Republic, May 17.

IN President Wilson's first annual address to Congress, delivered on December 2, 1913, there occurs this passage:

I turn to a subject which I hope can be handled promptly and without serious controversy of any kind. I mean the method of selecting nominees for the Presidency of the United States. I feel confident that I do not misinterpret the wishes or the expectations of the country when I urge the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of the several parties may choose their nominees for the Presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions.

What possible relation, it will doubtless be asked, is there between this little proposal about the mechanism of Presidential nominations and the colossal phenomena of to-day? What bearing can it have on the bitter disappointment expressed by the Nation and the New Republic over the final outcome of Mr. Wilson's dealings with the great war and the problem of peace?

The connection is not fantastic. Let us try to forget for a moment that we are living in a time when nothing short of the remaking of the world is regarded as matter of real moment, when millions of deaths are dismissed with little more thought than were hundreds a few years ago, when money sums that do not run up into the billions seem hardly worth mentioning. In December, 1913, a proposal to introduce a vital change in the method of conducting our Presidential elections was a major, not a minor, proposal; and the difficulty of devising a workable method—not to speak of the doubt as to the change being in itself desirable—was perfectly evident to everybody who had given the subject even the most cursory serious thought.

But to Mr. Wilson the matter was absolutely simple; and not only as to the merits of the question in the abstract, but as to the certainty of these being universally recognized. He hoped the subject would be "handled promptly and without serious controversy of any kind," and he urged "the prompt enactment" of the necessary legislation. Neither Congress nor the country paid any attention to the recommendation, and if it had come up for discussion nothing is more certain than that the proposal would have been found to bristle with extraordinary difficulties.

The defect here illustrated is not a trifling or accidental one. It is characteristic of Mr. Wilson; and it is most serious. It has been exhibited in his treatment of a score of issues here at home. Carried into his dealings with the gigantic world-problem in whose solution he has undertaken to play the commanding part, it has been productive of consequences which the world is not yet in a position to estimate, but which, whatever other aspects they may present, give ample ground for the feeling expressed in the passages we have quoted from the Nation and the New Republic. Not once, but twenty times, Mr. Wilson has declared that the settlement to be made after the war must satisfy certain ideal conditions; not only that it ought to do so as nearly as possible, but that it must actually do so. He has pictured all the peoples of the world as imperiously demanding such a settlement, and he has prophesied the wrath to come upon the head of any statesman who failed to live up to the demand. Turn the pages of any collection of Mr. Wilson's speeches, and you come upon passages like that in which it is most solemnly declared that for the obtaining of a secure and lasting peace it is "necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it"; that that price includes "not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with"; that "national purposes have fallen more and more into the background, and the common purpose of enlightened mankind has taken their place"; that in "the counsels of plain men" everywhere, all this has become perfectly clear; and that "statesmen must follow the common thought or be broken."

These words were spoken little more than half a year ago; it is impossible to imagine them spoken to-day. But it ought to have been as easy last September as it is to-day to see that when the time for the settlement came it could not be of such character as to satisfy all the "peoples whose fortunes are dealt with"; in particular that any peace which satisfied France could not by any possibility satisfy Germany. When Mr. Wilson came to the peace table he was compelled to choose between the one and the other—supposing that he had not already seen the necessity and complied with it. And in many another less crucial matter he has been brought sharply face to face with the fact that "the common purpose of enlightened mankind" is extremely far from having made "national purposes" a thing of the past. Whether all this is as it should be or not, is aside from the point. Mr. Wilson was not in the pulpit, speaking of a New Jerusalem to be attained in some shining future; he was deliberately announcing a programme to be presently fulfilled, and to the fulfillment of which he pledged his own powers as the head of the greatest nation in the world. If it was an impossible programme, a programme which any clear and responsible thinker must have seen to be impossible, the good intentions by which Mr. Wilson's words were undeniably prompted afford little mitigation for his offense.

Mr. Wilson's half-playful characterization of himself as having a "single track mind" cuts deeper than he was aware. The single track that he uses at any given time is the track that leads, or seems to lead, to the immediate object of his desire. The defect which he constantly exhibits is not merely that of impatience with details; a man may be impatient of details and yet take due account of their existence. Nor, indeed, is the trouble usually one of the relation of details to generalities; the things to which Mr. Wilson finds it possible to be blind are often quite as large and significant as those to which he gives exclusive heed. Other famous statesmen have been perhaps as inconsistent as he, but none that we can think of has been inconsistent in the same way. An early warning of his possibilities in this direction was given when, after a brief visit to the Pacific Coast while he was Governor of New Jersey, he declared, without a word of further explanation, that what he had seen in Oregon convinced him that all that he had taught for twenty years about the initiative and referendum was foolishness. If what he had taught was based on a serious consideration of the inherent tendencies of the initiative and referendum, it was manifestly impossible that any experience Oregon had gone through could have sufficed to overthrow his conclusions. Perhaps the most extraordinary instance of failure to think responsibly and adequately before making a decisive pronouncement is furnished by his sweeping demand for freedom of the seas in the second of the Fourteen Points—the subsequent history of which makes comment superfluous.

That Mr. Wilson has stimulated, in multitudes of high-minded men and women, noble hopes and aspirations is undeniable. His sincerity in the expression of his own ideals we have no desire to question. But it does not follow that the net result has been good rather than bad. The practical evil of a mistaken course may far outweigh the good that is attained by the excitation of beautiful sentiments; and even that excitation itself may be unwholesome in the long run. It is pretty sure to be unwholesome if after its subsidence there is left a feeling of hollowness and illusion. During half a century the hearts and minds of Americans have been uplifted and strengthened by the example of Abraham Lincoln as by no other. Through all that Lincoln said and did there runs a clear and high ideal; but declarations of ideal purpose are almost as scarce in his utterances as they are abundant in those of his latest successor. His eyes were kept steadily upon the limitations of possible achievement; his mind grappled unflinchingly with the difficulties that were inherent in his task. Let us hope that in confronting the sober realities with which the country is now called upon to deal Mr. Wilson may, after the chastening experiences of the past few months, come nearer to following that great example.

sharply divided, the circumstance that the Presidency is held by one party and the control of Congress by the other ought to operate as a check upon the diversion toward those issues of energy which should be applied to the best possible treatment of the great problems that are pressing upon us. Upon the tariff, for example, any legislation distinctly obnoxious from the Democratic standpoint would have to expect the Presidential veto, which the Republican margin in Congress is too small to override. But whether this reasonable and practical view of the situation will actually prevail depends on the breadth or the pettiness of the spirit of the party leaders; for, of course, the very fact that certain bills could not be enacted into law might be utilized as an opportunity for waving the party flag without assuming the responsibility of actual legislation. Let us hope at least that no great amount of the time of Congress will be expended in manoeuvres of this kind.

The New Congress

THE Congress which met in special session this week is confronted with problems unprecedented in magnitude and complexity. So fully is this recognized that the general expectation is that little or no interval will separate the present session from the regular session beginning next December. Partly on this account and partly because of the peculiar circumstances of the situation, the proceedings will, from the beginning, take on more or less of the character of a prelude to the Presidential campaign of next year. Accordingly, much as it might be desired that the urgent demands of the country's welfare, as well as the difficulties of the international crisis, should be met by united and non-partisan effort on the part of our national legislature, it is idle to expect that any such counsel of perfection will be followed; all that can be hoped, and this it is reasonable to hope, is that upon those questions which are not in their nature strongly affected with a party interest the work of the Congress shall manifest this high and patriotic spirit.

Among these questions are to be counted all that relate to the readjustment necessary for the obviation of impending economic evils, and for the removal of those which, as a consequence of the war, are already with us. There ought to be no difference between Republicans and Democrats, between Wilson men and anti-Wilson men, as to the eagerness of their desire to cure and to prevent unemployment; to provide opportunities for our returning soldiers to settle upon the land; to improve the apparatus of conciliation between labor and capital; to aid, at least by adequate investigation and information if not otherwise, toward the solution of the housing problem which the stoppage of building operations during the war and the extremely high prices of building materials have made acute throughout the country. Upon these and similar questions an early and concentrated effort should be directed by Congress.

In the domain of ordinary governmental activity, there is at least one constructive measure which should command the same degree of harmony. We are fifty years behind time in our lack of a budget system, for throughout a period of somewhat that length its introduction has been urged by a succession of responsible statesmen. But the colossal expenditures of the war period have made plain to the general mind what formerly was acutely recognized only by persons specially interested in the subject. Expenditures, to be sure, will not continue on quite the gigantic scale which we have been witnessing during the past two years; but they will still be large beyond all previous precedent, and, in any case, the lesson has been learned. To lay out programmes for national expenditure which runs into the billions without coördinating its items, without concentration of responsibility, with no assurance that any given part will bear anything like its due relation to other parts or to the whole—this is so preposterously absurd that the proposal of a decent substitute ought to be tantamount to its adoption. The time is as ripe now for the creation of a budget system as it was six years ago for the creation of the Federal Reserve system; and, as compared with the latter, the budget proposal has the advantage of not being bound up with any conflict of great interests. The Federal Reserve bill, though it had a stormy time in its various remouldings, was at last accepted with a gratifying approach to unanimity; the same result, and with far less trouble and struggle, should be attained in the present session of Congress for a budget system.

As to issues on which the parties are

The railroad question belongs in a different category. No single issue in our domestic affairs compares with this one either in difficulty or in the momentousness of the consequences involved. Public sentiment will approve the return of the railroads to private management at as early a date as is practicable for a proper arrangement, with a heartiness beyond anything which a year ago seemed at all likely. It would be too much to say that government management has been so fully tested as to leave no room for doubt; but the presumption against it was powerful to begin with, and instead of being weakened has been enormously strengthened by experience. The pertinacity with which those who objected to our sliding unawares into government ownership insisted on the insertion of a definite time-limit in the railroad-control bill has been fully vindicated. Were the case otherwise, all that would be necessary for the indefinite continuance of the present régime would be the failure to pass any legislation, a thing which might easily be accomplished; as it is, the failure of legislation would mean merely a chaotic instead of an orderly return of the railroads to private ownership. Even so, the problem is difficult enough; but it ought not to be beyond the power of Congress to effect a good working solution.

It is upon the subject of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations that the highest test of the quality of Congress will occur. The debates in the Senate will doubtless be open. No greater opportunity has ever been presented to what used to be spoken of as the most august legislative assembly in the world. But it will not rise to that opportunity unless some man be found big enough to set the note which must be struck if the discussion is to be in any degree worthy of the theme. It is not impossible for a man to subject the provisions of the treaty, or the contents of the League Covenant, to searching examination and yet keep himself free from the charge of being either a carping critic or a partisan advocate. Mr. Root's remarkable letter to Chairman Hays might well be turned to as a model of this kind of examination. From the point of view of party policy, no greater mistake could be made by the Republican leaders than that of factious opposition either to the treaty or to the league. They must show plainly that they desire to make the best of both; that if they can not give either one or the other ungrudging assent it is not for specious or interested reasons but on grounds that honest men must recognize as weighty. There must, on the other hand, be no attempt to stampede the Senate; discussion should be ample and fearless. But mere time-consuming debate, debate that makes no real contribution to understanding, would be as inexcusable as partisan or insincere opposition would be. If the Senate should rise to the height of the occasion, it will not only worthily perform a great duty but will inestimably raise its own standing before the country.

Exit Austria

OF the three empires that have crumbled in the world war only the Austrian Empire excites in its downfall anything like sympathy. The end of Czardom seems merely a personal tragedy. Our minds were prepared for Russian revolution. Again the German Kaisertum was too recent and spectacular to inspire sentimental regret. Its grandiosity was too self-conscious to seem quite real. Austria has sunk on the whole ignobly, a victim to such wiles as she herself invented, a sacrifice to her own incompetence; bankrupt in diplomacy and unheroic in war; yet no historically minded person will fail to pay to the deceased Austrian Empire a tribute of sentiment in which disapproval and sympathy blend paradoxically. Since the Peace of Westphalia, 1642, Austria had maintained a simulacrum of the Holy Roman Empire. Though her Emperor waived the empty title in 1806, the Austrian Empire remained, if in reduced caricature, a still recognizable representative of the world dominion of the Cæsars as of the visionary aspirations of the Hohenstaufens. For an imaginative person there is a certain pain in the dismemberment of Austria. So if the Coliseum fell into ruins, a world that by no means approves the gladiatorial games would none the less mourn.

The still potent spell of the Austrian Empire is the more worth studying that it rests on nothing more substantial than memory and a name. Austria did not even inherit honestly the Roman title and the Roman notion of universality. Ever since the peace of Westphalia, she has lived frugally on a glamour which she had bought or borrowed two centuries earlier. As the Middle Ages broke up and a kind of anarchy preluded coming nationalism, the name of Roman Emperor retained prestige; it had the intangible value of a trade-mark or commercial good will. It meant at least an ideal and a memory of order and unity amid distressing disorder and diversity. A few patient and scheming members of the Royal House of Hapsburg had the sense to perceive the value of the Roman label and the sagacity to pay the price for it. Thus the Austrian Empire rose in a very curious fabric of faith, fraud, and fatigue. Its assets were the unremitting, intelligent machinations of such Emperors as Frederick III, Maximilian, and Charles V; next the imperishable faith of mankind in the name of the Empire; finally the fatigue of Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia worn out by the stern business of stemming the Moslem invaders.

About fifty years before Columbus discovered America, a lethargic and despicable but thoroughly intelligent monarch, Frederick of Hapsburg, made the discovery of Europe. Upon that discovery the Austrian Empire was to live for nearly five hundred years. Frederick saw in the matter of contesting claims, in the apparent confusion of statelets throughout Europe, a complicated instrument which a clever man might learn to play. In his lethargic fashion he learned to control the stops and pedals. Of diplomacy, which had been an unwelcome and occasional resource of his heroic rivals of Poland and Hungary, he made a constant study and occupation. Racial hatreds, national jealousies, ecclesiastical feuds, constituted his diapason. And the dominant of the harmonies which he contrived to wring from so unpromising a stave was the universality of avarice. He never let self-respect stand in the way of power. He assumed the crown of Charlemagne in 1452, and as he rode away from St. Peter's to meet his young bride at the Lateran, on the way he thriftily peddled in the open street a few noble titles, not to mention some hundreds of simple knighthoods.

From him the Austrian Empire received a color which it never lost. Power was to be gained by dynastic marriages, by capitalizing the weakness and prejudices of vassal states, by distribution of honors and patronage, by money bribes. The plan worked because it was based on a deep understanding of human weakness. The Empire was built chiefly on negation, on keeping out of the dangerous and heroic realm of statesmanship while advancing unremittingly on the safe and certain level of politics and the lower diplomacy. To be sure, there were heroic interludes. Frederick's successor, the amiable and adroit Maximilian, not merely profited as honest broker for Middle Europe, but wheedled a personal military establishment out of his exhausted and loyal nominal empire. From this foundation Charles V spread the transient military glories of the Empire as far as Africa and the new Americas. The following Hapsburgs, rather through inertia than by deliberate choice, ceased to play at being Hohenstaufens, and gradually the impatient and unmanaging new nations of Northern and Western Europe clipped the Empire about the edges, till the Hapsburgs were left as tolerated trustees of the uncoveted and refractory states of Central Europe.

Even in this reduced condition the Empire retained its capacity for management, and withal an inexplicable prestige. Too slack to stem the latest of Turkish invasions, Sobieski and his Poles did the work. Frederick the Great soon did the dirty work of destroying Poland, and Austria, who had spent little in brains or blood, came off with the larger part of the spoils. Napoleon made a mockery of the tradition of Austrian military power, but Austria largely dictated the terms of the Holy Alliance after Napoleon had been overthrown. Austria was still to hold together for a century by practising her traditional politics. Where she must, as in dealing with Hungary, she yielded sufficiently to the new nationalism. She let Hungary pay for her independence, however, by assuming the odium of controlling the Southern Slavs. Geographically and racially the Empire remained a survival from the fifteenth century, and the old arts sufficed to maintain out of the jealousies of the Czech, Magyar, and Croat a troubled equilibrium for the Empire. It was an anachronism, but for internal purposes it worked.

Where Austria failed was in neglecting to develop a new Frederick III to rediscover the changed Europe. Her traditions had passed over to Bismarck who, however, knew how to capitalize not merely men's weaknesses but also their strength. Austria was readily outmanœuvred in the Schleswig-Holstein settlement of 1863, and as easily outfought in the brief inglorious war that ended with Sadowa. She no longer had a European policy. Italy beat her in diplomacy and in the field. In compensation Austria indulged expansionist visions really contrary to her interest. Germany treated her, as she herself had treated Hungary, as agent provocateur for the Balkans. Austria never ran less true to form than in those anguished days after the assassination at Serajevo, when for an ideal of self-respect and dynastic vanity she permitted a European war. It was a romantic lapse into Hohenstaufenism which hastened the fall of the Hapsburgs. Austria has had the grace, after five hundred years of opportunism, of dying for the imponderables.

With Austria perished the ideal of domination by intrigue over clashing races. Her long and fairly successful experiment in empire had the merit of demonstrating to the uttermost limit just how much can be done by a rule based solely on ruse and shrewdness. In one sense the crumbling of Austria is a blow to internationalism everywhere. It is a blow, however, only to her particular type of internationalism. We have the great task of substituting a new and better sort. The testing ground of our new ideals will be the old Austrian Empire. It would be foolish to pretend that the prospect is bright. Self-determination is no panacea. It threatens once more the particularism that was the plague of the Middle Ages. Yet when Frederick III and Maximilian found a palliative for the anarchy of the dying Middle Ages in guile and bribes, shall we despair of finding a new bond of nations in the imponderables of justice and mutual understanding and positive common interest?

Reflections on Cooked Food

PEOPLE always look for the social revolution in the wrong place—in red flags, party platforms, Bolshevism, and world covenants—all transient and unfundamental phenomena. The other day we saw the real thing—the Social Revolution spinning rapidly up our street and stopping in front of a neighbor's house. The Social Revolution came in the shape of a Ford delivery car, delicately paneled with heliotrope and bearing the legend—Cooked Food. The Reds of the New Revolution turned out to be two Blacks, one of whom operated the car, while the other delivered my neighbor's dinner in a shining tin conveyor, heated from within. Meanwhile the ancient sun went down in the old order behind the heliotrope car.

At all times dinners have been taken out of the American home in a tin conveyor. The full dinner pail is legendary. What was revolutionary was the reversal of direction—the full dinner pail invading the home, and all that that implied. It implied, we assumed, that Mrs. Financial Expert had given up the long fight to keep servants. It signifies, too, that Mrs. F. E. had reacted against a future of culinary servitude. It meant a shift in domestic legend and chronicle—the complete obscuration, for example, of the cookies that mother used to make. The children of the next generation would no longer indulge these saccharine phrases, but would impersonally recount to their children the merits of the heliotrope delivery car vs. the green, with all the relative advantages of table d'hôte and à la carte. These children would begin where we used to end. As this cheerful reflection took form, the Social Revolution, with what seemed an ostentatious rattling and bumping, backed, executed a quick turn and moved out of our street into the twilight.

What will be the career of the maidless and stoveless housewife of the future, the imagination refuses to define. One likes to think of energies released for self-improvement and civic activities, for fuller companionship in the household; and something of that there will be. It will mean also the end of certain individual delectations. To live on cooked food is one thing, to entertain on it is another. Shall the social feasting of the new era be merely exchange of the freight of some heliotrope car and of the contents of standardized glittering cans? Will some joy go out of feeding socially and being fed? The loss must be considered with the gain. Or may even every woman's cooked food be sufficiently diversified and glorified by every man's private stock illicitly husbanded since the going into effect of the eighteenth amendment? And when the private stock shall have been exhausted, as exhausted it some day must be, how shall we then retain the individual note in collective gourmandise? Or does the advent of the heliotrope van mark the end of old-time sociability?

So much is certain—that the gentlewoman of moderate means will soon have to choose between cooked food and boarding. Her old position as mistress in her own house, directing its work, is as obsolete as chivalry. She will either have to do its work herself, or get it done by outsiders who are in no sense her servants. The old-fashioned middle-class household becomes a receiving station for ready-cooked food and occasional service. This means a new set of folk-ways. The professor's wife and the small lawyer's will perhaps gain in time and tranquillity by substituting corporate for personal service. At least they may thereby continue to escape the domestic servitude which is the lot of most women. What cooked food and contract charring are doing is to make a new social cleavage. In fact the old line of demarcation between women was drawn by the presence or absence of the servant in the house. And in principle it didn't greatly matter whether the servant in the house was one or twenty; the gentlewoman began where the cooking and dishwashing wife left off. There were plenty of exceptions to this rule—gentlewomen who for one reason or another did the household work—but the condition was admittedly exceptional and undesirable. Pedantically speaking, every woman who had and kept at least one servant was a kind of capitalist and aristocrat. As Bridget, Nora, Selma, and Rosika became first intermittent and then non-existent, the level of capitalism and aristocracy moved upwards, with all kinds of readjustments necessary in a class that wished to preserve its identity.

Cooked food is one of several social life-preservers necessary to be worn against an advancing tide of proletarianism. It marks the creation of a new class, which is too poor to keep servants and too proud or too wise to let its womenkind do the housework. But plainly the housewife who has surrendered the hope of keeping servants, and necessarily has assumed a considerable part of the housework, is living more like the laborer's wife than like the millionaire's. Her social orientation is reversed. Certainly the subscriber to cooked food, and if not he himself at least his children, will be more sharply conscious of the difference between his manner of life and that of his rich neighbor, while he may also realize a new solidarity with his humble neighbors. For the moment cooked food is the prop of the household—the gastronomic via media between the old style genteel home and some impending life in family barracks. After cooked food the deluge.

Such were the musings of one who was keeping up the struggle for an old-time home which should be aided but not maintained by the ministrations of the heliotrope van. Realizing the difficulty of the struggle, he envied the more stable estate of his neighbor whose porte cochère harbored the heliotrope van twice daily. Our neighbor was in the movement; where was he? At this point the Financial Expert appeared on his front lawn in a state of evident agitation. On questioning, he said that by way of dessert he had ordered café parfait for his immediate family, but had unhappily omitted to order one for the household assistant, who accordingly had given notice. Which goes to show that even cooked food will not work unless it is taken wholeheartedly and without mental reservations of any sort. In a prospect of cooked food the household assistant is out of the picture.

At this moment the Social Revolution again rattled round our corner and a neatly liveried black reclaimed the glittering can from which the Financial Expert's family had dined.

The Middle West and the Peace

THE Middle West has read the peace terms, as they have been cabled to us in an abstract, and has found them good. To be sure, there are individual differences of opinion. An old friend of mine who long has preached a gospel of sweetness and light took me aside the other day and in his uncertainty referred to the injunction to forgive our enemies even when they had multiplied their injuries unto seven times seven. But even he would not abate one jot the utter sinfulness of German bloodguilt. There are some differences of opinion, but these are inconsiderable and it may be said that with practical unanimity the portion of our country between the Alleghanies and the Rockies, where agriculture is the chief industry, where differences in race, creed, and wealth are by a perfectly rational process gradually being reduced to a minimum, welcomes the terms of peace as fixing a deserved penalty upon a member of international society that had placed its heel upon the law.

And this unanimity is what one would expect who has studied the Middle West. There is a curious pragmatic idealism here which is quite unknown in the industrial and more self-critical East and in the self-assured West. We went into the war on trust, for we then had not learned to look far beyond our own business and cornfields. We examined the cause for which we were fighting while we were exchanging our first blows with the enemy, and found that the cause was good. With quite unexpected unanimity we threw our whole souls into the conflict. The record of the spirit of the States between the Great Lakes and the Ohio, the Alleghanies and the Rockies, was not unlike that of the same region during the Civil War. The cheerful optimism with which they obeyed food injunctions, bought liberty bonds, fell in with the draft, was quite consistent with the spirit of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and even Iowa and Wisconsin in 1861.

The people of the Middle West were pragmatic idealists before the war. It was for this very reason that they were a little slow in seeing why they should enter upon a quarrel in which they had no obvious interest, especially after having been abundantly assured that war itself was the greatest of evils. They were pragmatic idealists during the war, for when convinced that their destiny was inseparably bound up in the issues of the war, and that the roots of the war lay in the old conflict against evil, they threw every ounce of their energy into the struggle. And they are now pragmatic idealists when the issues of the war have been finally decided, for they insist that the terms of peace shall be such that there may be permitted no shuffling, no ambiguity, no compromise with evil. The Middle West is not speculating on whether there shall be or there shall not be wars in the future, in the abstract. They have a measure of hope in the League of Nations, for their pragmatism tempers their idealism. But they will have no potential dangers from a Germany that has not shown signs of repentance—the names of those who are still in power have unpleasant connotations. If there is any complaint with the peace terms, so far as regards Germany, if there is any criticism, it is on the ground that they are not drastic enough.

The real sentiment of the Middle West is not to be found in megalopolitan centres like Chicago, St. Louis, or even Cincinnati. For in these large industrial centres, there lives a people scarcely different from the inhabitants of Manhattan or New London. To run true to type a Middle Westerner should live in Des Moines, Iowa, Lincoln, Nebraska, or any of a thousand small cities. And it is from the editorials of the journals which these towns read that one should form one's judgment of what the Middle West is thinking.

I select at random four. All of these papers before the war were classed as pacifistic, one was even blatant in its refusal to see any cause which could drag us into a European conflict. All at one time supported the McLemore Resolution. On domestic questions they differed, but on the question of war or peace, in January and February, 1917, they spoke for peace. By the end of June, 1917, they, like their communities, had had their eyes opened. What they are now thinking let these editorials indicate:

This is no time to debate with Germany's representatives her responsibility for the war. The peace terms offered her fix the guilt so far as is necessary at this time. She was the chief offender in the distillation of the militarism and imperialism that poisoned the air of Europe for half a century, and now she must pay, pay. Her spokesmen seek to excuse her cruelty and vengefulness by saying that they were committed in the heat of struggle and defense of national existence, but people with consciences do not do that, as evidenced by the actions of our boys. The one task apparently necessary to-day is to make Germany impotent for future harm, as in that way lies the one present assurance of peace.

An arrangement, doubtless containing many defects but remarkable for its general excellence, has been agreed to.

All that remains is for the defeated nation to accept and the United States to ratify. Here it is decided whether the world war is to end in world order or in world chaos. It is hard to believe that any people or any politicians could be capable of dashing the world hope now so near to fulfillment. During the next thirty or sixty days this is finally to be determined. They are to be momentous days.

The armistice was signed in November. That is just six months ago. The peace conference met in January. Its actual work covered but four months. In that period it has reshaped the politics of the world and wrought out a peace adjustment remarkable for its justice—stern justice but yet justice. No group of men in all history had faced so extensive a task. Yet the work is done in less time than it usually takes an American congress to enact a tariff law.

There are people, some of them Americans, who know they could have settled the whole business by the day after Christmas. Maybe they could. Perhaps these same could have created the universe in one day instead of taking six, as the Creator is reputed to have done. Evidently, men of such miraculous powers have never had the luck to be on peace commissions. Much less do they seem to have had places on the peace commissions of the past than upon the peace commission of the present.

The corruption of Nietzsche sown in Germany has been reaped in corruption . . . Nietzsche died in a madhouse. The country he corrupted is facing a similar fate.

It is the almost Biblical and prophetic strain of this last that gives a significant hint. There is a strange consanguinity between the average citizen of the Middle West and the Puritan of New England and the ancient Crusader. The uncompromising zest with which the good business man of Iowa or Kansas launches himself into some social or economic reform because he fancies that in his opponent he has discovered, not an economic problem, but a limb of Satan, is mutatis mutandis not unlike the spirit of the merchants of Marblehead who hanged the "pyrat" Quelch for the glory of God, while they quietly went about their dealings in the merchandise fetched home by others who were lucky enough to steer clear of the law; or of the Crusader who grimly battled on the plains of Ascalon to rescue the Holy Sepulchre, and brought home in sincere thrift the wealth of the Orient to deck his homes and churches.

There are idealists in the Middle West, like the old Puritans, like the ancient children of Israel, who smote Amalek and Agag because they worshipped strange gods. Their creed is usually simple—the line between good and evil is always rather sharply drawn. They live close to the times of the early pioneers when, in the simple problem for existence, things that were untoward, whether Indians or the processes of nature, must be faced with a simple resoluteness which never admitted any wavering or shuffling. Things were good or bad—the hazy line which to many people marks the delimitations of good and evil was to them unknown. And their children have inherited this same simple statement, and this same simple solution, of the problem.

So they have attacked the problem of the saloon, by stating it in such simple and bold terms as admit of but one answer. The fact that many disagree with them weighs not a whit in their sense of responsibility to themselves and to the country at large. For in many of these matters their appeal is to the conscience, whether it agrees with their judgment or not. Matters are either morally right or morally wrong; and it is rather the civic conscience than the private conscience by which they judge. Curiously enough, the Middle West has gone a long way in the matter of standardizing conscience. Perhaps that phrase, as much as any other, will describe the great Middle West. It has a fairly well standardized conscience; and according to its dictates, it idealizes and condemns. It dislikes eccentricity of any kind, for any departure from the normal may involve moral turpitude; it abhors vagaries which sin on the side of excess, because these as certainly display a potential laxity of moral standards.

Hence, the Middle West is no friend to compromise when a principle seems at stake. In so purely an economic matter as that of moving a State capitol or county courthouse from one town to another, the moral question was raised—the legislators or county officials in the one place would be under more moral influences than at the other. There can be no compromise with Sunday amusements, with prohibition. It is a question of right or wrong. There can be no middle ground.

But the Middle West is pragmatic as well in its philosophy. The eternal conflict of right and wrong does not keep it from seeing clearly its own interests, and it will contrive that the right which has been chosen shall justify itself by its fruits. The Middle West is rich, exceedingly rich; once it was so poor that people even doubted if it could ever be self-sustaining; and it has determined that it shall never see again the lean years when in a last hope it set up an idol of Silver and offered the incense of Populism. Now it has seen that it can feed a world and profit exceedingly in the undertaking. It is and has been generous, it has cast its bread upon the waters, even where submarines abounded; and it has seen to it that the venture should be returned and immediately, bearing much interest.

The same generous but canny philanthropism is seen in the way the Middle West has taken to prohibition. It rescues from the drunkard's grave, and it counts the dollars the community gains by barter in articles that make for decency; so much beer and whiskey diverted and metamorphosed into shoes, stockings, and respectable dresses instead of gingham; and so many more hours and so many more persons saved for lucrative labor.

So, now that the peace terms to Germany have been finally dictated, to be accepted or rejected, the Middle West as a whole approves. It had come, slowly to be sure, to recognize Germany to be the common enemy of mankind. It had learned to speak respectfully, almost religiously, of our ideal of democracy—a thing which before had been taken for granted. Though we recognized the worth of our allies and displayed on every possible occasion their flags, there was no peculiar warmth of sentiment for the personal wrongs of France or Great Britain or Italy. These nations were too distant to be raised far above the level of the abstract. We ourselves had suffered too little to have the war brought home to our own firesides; and our sons and brothers who went forth, went forth, it seemed, on an adventure to whose deadly nature we had closed our eyes. It might almost seem as though we of these Middle States could have had no great interests in the Peace Conference, or in the measure of the punishment to be meted out to the offender. Some even prophesied that in our sentimental natures we might have large room for forgiveness for a defeated and reorganized and partly democratic enemy.

Had the people of these States of the Mississippi Valley been wholly idealists, they might have been tricked by the German revolution to wish the new Government easier terms. There are some softer natures who see monstrous wrongs bound up in any possible punishment, and who can not reconcile the spirit that could curse the false leaders of Jerusalem with the spirit that said to the repentant sinner, "Go in peace and sin no more." But these people of the prairies detect a difference between the sinner who has harmed only herself and the one who made Israel to sin. They see through the mask of the revolution and catch the lineaments of the chief offender. They have not seen the spirit that would bring forth fruits meet for repentance. And hence they will exact such punishment as will make a repetition of the crime impossible. It is the same people speaking now that applauded the act of justice in the matter of Panama Canal tolls and the remission of the Boxer indemnity.

In the same way, they are ready to support the League of Nations, or any alliance with good Powers against the potentially evil. They are not oversanguine, for they realize, what they did not realize a trifle over two years ago, the essential instability of all institutions; but they will welcome any act that tends to some order in a world which so recently was reeling over chaos. It will go hard with any Middle Western Senator or Representative who deliberately attempts to make the way hard for the Treaty by spurning at the League.

They have certain reservations. Perhaps it is because the whole matter is not yet presented. They have a real fear that somehow, somewhere, there has been juggling in the matter of Japan. The moral justice which was urged so inflexibly upon Italy had an orthodox ring, though the point in dispute might be obscure; but why, to another question which appeared to have so many points in common, should the answer be so palpably according to another formula? This difficulty, which may turn out to be not so slight after all, has troubled the Middle West, as doubtless it has the whole country.

Finally, there is approval of the terms because there appears in them the promise of a continuation, on an ever larger scale, of good business. The chief business of peace, they argue, is prosperity, and in the reconstruction that is to follow upon the signing of the terms they see a still greater development of this country's resources. They will feed Germany with wheat at two-fifty a bushel while Germany regains her feet and repairs the ravages in Belgium and France.

PHILO M. BUCK, JR.

Dance of Death

For though my ryme be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rayne-beaten,
Rusty and moth-eaten,
If ye take well therewith,
It hath in it some pith.

Quod Skelton Laureatus.

Proheme

Wherein is set forth the nature and purpose of the poem called the Dance of Death.

This book oweth its form to a desire to set the things of to-day at a remove and view them, as it were, in a perspective, to which end they have been transported and set down in the afar-off time of the early sixteenth century, that we may see them the more plainly by reason of the distance. To help in this the author has employed some of the old words, though not many, that were in use in the days of the laureate Skelton and the Morality plays. The meter, too, may appear harsh and displeasing to some by reason of its irregularity, but so it was used in those days and may not inappropriately be used in these for the mocking or satyric sort of poetry that is here attempted; which if the reader will declaim it aloud and rapidly he shall not miss the effect intended, which is of a torrent now fretted and hindered by the rocks, now tumbling headlong, but always going forward with a kind of resistless and exultant energy.

The Dance of Death is pictured on the walls of many churchly buildings in France and England, Germany and Switzerland, with verses beneath setting forth how Death summons in turn each and every sort of man, much as is described in Death's second speech in this poem. Such verses were written in English by Dan John Lydgate, monk of Bury, for the pictures in old St. Paul's of London. But the best pictures were made by Johannes Holbein and may be seen in many books to-day.

Mors

Oh, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho!
I am Death!
I dance and all follow,
All come at my hollo,
My mary-bones clank,
My chaps they are lank,
And my eye-sockets hollow.
Oh, ho! O, ho!
Musty, rusty, fusty, dusty,
Charnal, gibbet, and chains!
Oh, ho!
Come, dance! come!
To the dub-a-dub-dub of my maniac drum!

Mors imperat regibus

Maximis

Minimis

Denique omnibus.

So, stands it thus?
In this field full of folk
Doth none fear my stroke
And tremble at my decree?
Will no one cry out,
Not one of this rout,
"Timor mortis conturbat me?"
Is the world grown so bold
As to flout me? Behold,
I will make ye to shudder at me as of old!
We shall see!

Quod Death.

Pope and kayser I wont to call,
King eke and cardinal.
My lord the abbot,
The monk in his habit,
The bride at the altar,
The thief in his halter,
The fool and the wise,
The beggar sans eyes,
The rich from his lands
And the child in his hands.
With my glass I pass,
With my drum I come.
With harp and pipe and symphonie
I make my merry minstrelsie.
But the world goes astray;
It is not ordered after the old way.
'Tis true, I am fed:
Man lies him down in his bed,
And lo, daily I am full.
But his thought of me is dull;
He does not gibber and squeak,
And always of Death speak.
He goes about his affairs
And little for Death cares.
He is fat and at ease
And hath learned himself to please.
I, who was once king,
Am now but a sorry thing.
Lo, I will rouse me,
I will carouse me

In a mighty slaughter.
I will wade in blood like water,
Till I am feared once more
And honored as in days of yore.
I will gain awe-strucken praise
As in former days.
I will find a way.

Quod Death.

Mors et Imperator

Death: Wilhelm!
Wilhelm: Wer bist du?
Death: Todt!
Wilhelm: Es helfe mir Gott in meiner Noth!
Für mich?
Death: Nein, Wilhelm, noch nicht.
Wilhelm: Was willst du? Der Todt deutsch spricht!

Death: Ja, natürlich! Thou knowest, if thou art wise,
That High Deutsch was the speech of Paradise.*

Lucifer, my good friend,
With it did gain his end
When he tempted thy mother Eve.
He always speaks it, and by your leave,
Merely out of whim,
I learned it of him.

Wilhelm: Ja, kultur is full old.
And if Nimrod had not been bold
To build Babel Tower,
Would not at this hour
Deutsch be the speech
Of all and each
In the wide world?

Death: Thou hast right.
But his tower was down hurl'd.
Wilhelm: Then that work of Nimrod I rue.

Death: He hath left something for thee to do.

Wilhelm: So?
Death: Rome, Wilhelm, was a tall town;
A kayser wore its crown,
(Cæsar and kayser in Latin be all one)
And he had a full fair place in the sun.

(Here are some few matters omitted for this present.)

Wilhelm: Nothing I suggest.
Others shall force me, that were best.
Unwillingly I shall be led,
Reluctant the path I shall tread.
I shall weep when I behold
The slaughter of young and of old.
I shall have pity on the ruined town;
Myself in tears shall I drown.

For women raped I shall not sleep.
Death: Ay, marry, I shall not weep.

Quod Death.

Wilhelm: Nor I, long. Short and sharp
That is the tune I harp.
Fear carries the day
In the good German way.
Of the good German sword they shall have a taste

*Seriously contended by a German professor of former days.

And the world will be all German or all waste.

Death: Will your Germans go through to the end, I wonder?

Wilhelm: What German would not face even thee for plunder?

Death: What else?

Wilhelm: I will hold a draught of salt water to the world's lips;
I will sink some of their tall ships.

Death: Good, I will sell the tickets myself!

Quod Death.

Wilhelm: Here for us both is honor and pelf.

Strike hands, bony claw and mailed fist!

So, Death and Might have kissed.
If we fail——

Death: I fail not;

Nor thou if thou quail not.

But if she prove too strong——

Wilhelm: Who?

Death: Fortune, who hurls kings head-long.

If, I say, she prove our match,
I have a trick, Wilhelm, will snatch Victory from defeat.

Go we now, I and thou, and drink deep and full eat.

Quod Death.

Explicit pars prima

Incipit pars secunda

Fortuna

Fortune men me call.
I turn on my ball,
I am never still,
Doing God's will.
I am ever fair;
But let those aloft beware;
For when they are grown too great,
And like a god in their state,
Then I turn my wheel
And my might they feel.
The golden crown
Comes tumbling down;
Low in the dust
It beggeth a crust.
Lucifer I hurled from the skies
And Adam from Paradise.
Nimrod that built so high,
Not a stone on its fellow doth lie.
Samson and Hercules so strong
Withsaid not my power long.
Alexander the Great hath got
But six feet of earth to his lot.
Julius Cæsar the emperor
How hath he less or more?
I let them strut their brave hour,
Then is their sweet turned to sour.
Trust me a moment and I turn
Laughing my blind wooers to scorn.
The wretched, too, I will lift up
And fill the measure of their cup.
Let them once taste the pride of rule,
And I will make them eke my fool.
I make a king of the clown
And then as blithely hurl him down.

At tyrants aim I, all and any,
Have they one head, have they many.

Cantus Fortunæ

Turning, turning, ever turning,
Turning, turning, late or soon;
I'll not stay for all thy yearning,
I'll not go for all thy spurning,
Nothing stable here discerning,
Here beneath the journeying moon.
Take thy hour, 'tis all I offer;
Do not hoard my gold in coffer;
Wait not for a fairer proffer.
Once I go there's no returning,
Once I come there's no sojourning;
At my will I grant my boon.
Whither go I? That I know not.
Comes the time when that I go not?
Read my riddle if thou can!
Get thee wisdom, get thee learning,
Get thee beauty of thine earning,
Only thus, ere his inurning,
Comes the answer unto man.

Mors et Imperator

Death: Wilhelm!
Wilhelm: Art thou at last come again?
To see thee I am full fain.
This same Fortune is a jade;
I had my hand laid
On her garment's hem, but she escape made
Quite out of my reach,
And, "Lo, this will thee teach!"
She gave me a shrewd box on the ear.
Behold, I am here!
We have failed. In vain on thee did I cry.
Death: Thou hast failed, not I.
I have supped full. Much thanks.
Wilhelm: I would none of thy pranks.
Thou hast a promise made
At the last to give me aid.
Death: Ay, once more I will thee befriend
Now at the end.
Thou shalt not die in thy bed
But at thine army's head.
That, Wilhelm, were fine
And worthy of thy noble line.
There together we shall make play
Will be remembered many a day.
Wilhelm: Nein, nein, nein, nein! not yet!
Like a pig for dread I sweat.
Something we may yet save;
Death, thy help I crave.
My counsellors were fools everyone,
My generals have wofully misdome.
But for nothing I greatly care,
So, Death, thou wilt me spare.
Death: Well, Wilhelm, I will not take thee yet;
From thee little credit could I get.
Thou would'st make both of us,
No doubt, at the last ridiculous.
I will swallow thee when Thy turn comes amid the common ruck of men.

I will swallow thee, sword and sheath;
A bit of grit between my teeth,
(Mayhap the spike of thy helm)
Faugh, that was Wilhelm!
Wilhelm: But, Death, thou hadst yet another device.
Thou couldst change all in a trice.
Destroy me my foes
Who against me rose,
Who sought to overwhelm
My peace-loving realm.
Death: Ay, it had clean gone from my head.
I am well nigh surfeited.
Still, I will put it in proof,
But it shall not be for thy behoof.
I shall have no need of thee.
Wilhelm: Not me? Then whither shall I flee?
Death: Whither thee likes thou mayst depart.
Thou hast worthily done thy part.
Get thee to Holland, Hell, or Spain,
What matters it? Auf wiedersehen!
Booh!
Who-o-o-oh!
Harrú!
Be off, ere my dart I cast.
Whither so fast?
Wilhelm: Anywhere! Holland! Safety!
I ask not much!
Death: Wilt learn, Wilhelm, to sing in Low Dutch?
High, low,
Wilhelm must go,
And nobody cares if he never comes back!
O, ho, ho, ho, ho!
Explicit pars secunda.
Incipit pars tertia.

Mors et Fortuna

Fortune: A, ha, ha, ha, ha!
I have seen them all.
But this was the sorriest fall
That ever a prince made.
I grow weary of my trade.
Death, what of thy new plan?
Death: I will speak with yon laboring man.
Come, form all in a row,
And merrily on we shall go.
Heartily take breath
For the new Dance of Death
O, ho, ho, ho, ho, ho!
Yoick, hallaloo!
Who'll begin it? Who?
Here, fellow, wouldst be king?
Quod Death.

Mors et Operarius

Laborer: What have I to do with such a thing?
I work at my trade,
And for that I am well paid.
House and land I own;
My half-acre is ploughed and sown.
I have books to read
Or a show to see instead.

I have wine and beer
To make me cheer.
My children are in school.
I were worse than a fool
To wish to be king.
Death: Here's one skills not in our reckoning.
Here, thou other fellow, wouldst be king?
Quod Death.

Secundus Operarius

Second Laborer: Ay, that were a fine thing.
Now it is ill-done:
The knaves have the money, good fellows none.
I shall have all the pretty wenchens;
We shall not sit on benches,
But lie soft in a fine house
And there carouse.
Seven loaves will I sell for a penny
And the rich shall not have any.
I will dethrone this old god Mammon;
Everything shall be in common,
Save what I reserve for myself.
He who hath aught on the shelf
Is rich;
He may lie in a ditch.
And he who can write his name
May do the same.
When I am king the world will be well bestead.
But first there is a deal of blood to be shed
And a long account to settle.
Death: This fellow hath some mettle.
Without reason he can rime,
Though it were mouldy in Jack Cade's time.
But he is too rude,
His thought is crude.
Who'll begin the new Dance of Death?
Hearken to what this peasant saith.
Quod Death.

Rusticus

Peasant: Give me land, give me food!
More it is not good.
The strong rob me of all I get;
Too long a slave have I sweat.
I will do what I can:
I would no longer be a beast but a man.
Would any show me the way
I might win to a better day;
Else I would it were all at end.
Death: Meseems he alone of all would welcome me as a friend.
Yet is he most apt
If it so happed
That he were cunningly led.
Quod Death.

Bolchevicus

Bolshevik: I am a Red.
With consuming love of mankind I burn;
For universal brotherhood I yearn

I would destroy the old earth
That a better may have birth,
Without nation, army, or fleet,
And all shall be fair and sweet.
Neither rich nor any poor,
Nor shall a man bar his door.
But those who withstand me I destroy.
Come, moujik, my bully boy,
Burn and spill
To your heart's fill;
Plunder and kill
As ye will.
'Tis a bitter pill
To purge the world of its old ill.
When these throes are o'erpast
There shall be born at last
A world of peace that knows not the sword,
And I, even I, shall be its lord!
Death: Yoick! this grows to it.
Mark how he goes to it!
I have not been thus entertained
Since my friend Terror reigned
In the days of that dainty queen
My lady Guillotine.
But these things they manage even better than France.
Gup, rogues, who's next in the Dance?
Quod Death.

Germanus

German: Here is my best chance.
They have broken my lance,
And I have forgiven them all;
A Democrat I myself call.
But if me they mock
And too hard they knock,
If my escape they block,
I will give them a shock
I will threaten to run amok.
I will pull down England and France
And the rest. I say, on with this Dance!
Death: O ho, ho, ho, ho, ho! I laugh!
Old Wilhelm gave me half,
But this is the best,
His dear people will give me the rest!
Come, who'll help?
Yelp, ye dogs, yelp!
Quod Death.

Internationalist *

Internationalist: I am Internationalist known;
I love all lands but my own.
My country is always wrong,
That is the burden of my song.
Ill said of others I hold to be lies.
I will not believe what is before my eyes,
I will believe only what is in my heart.
Death: Here's one hath with me lot and part.
Neither do I know
High nor low,
Nation nor creed,

*Here faileth the author's slender store of Latin. The Roman tongue liketh not vague and indefinite terms.

All will not surfeit my greed
For Adam's seed.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Humanitarian

Humanitarian: I am thrilled to my heart's core!
What could one wish more?
A world remade!
I am blissfully almost afraid!
What matters a little damage by the way
So the underdog have his day?
Whither we go none may say,
But our joyous feet are set in the way.
Grant man's noble instinct free play
And the world will keep high holiday.
Death: Here's one needs no spur.
In me he beholds the great Leveller.
My way is plain and flat;
Death is the world's first Democrat.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Puella

Thoughtful Damsel: I am a gentle maid;
I will lend my aid.
I will scratch and I will bite
And always for the vote fight.
Kindly and much will I speak
Of the gentle Bolshevik.
Of my wealth will I give
That these beautiful thoughts may thrive.
Death: Here's one will us grace.
Welcome to a high place.
Since Eve's days
I have admired many of thy pretty ways.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Corrector Morum

Reformer: Loudly did they bewail
When I said there should be no more cakes and ale.
Having set our hand to the plough
Who would turn back now?
One demon we have scotched;
To stop now were to leave the business botched.
Many dragons are there left to fight
For the white-plumed knight.
The world is not worth an old shoe
Till it doth do all as I do.
Death: Here's one will help at a witch's brew.
Not I alone take my pleasures oddly;
Small choice 'twixt me and some of the godly.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Magister

Professor: Youth by me is led.
I stand all things on their head.
We laugh together at them
And I say, Ahem! ahem!
And the facts blink,
With a sly wink,
Till my pupils are quite sure they think,
And learn to despise
Whom the world thought wise
And hold as naught
What the world thought.
Come, my children, all in a row,
Hippety skippety, over we go!
Death: Here's one comes not alone.
Much fruit from the seed he hath sown.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Actorum Editor

Journalist: What I write to-day the world thinks the next.
I have a care to keep it sadly perplexed.
I say that it not knows
Who are its real foes.
I say that we do worse
Than they whom we curse.
I say that it should hear all sides
Or ere it decides
And that the other side
Is not as black as it's cried.
Or else my venom I spew
And make a great to-do
'Gainst all who think not as I do.
I know not what I desire,
But I set the pot on the fire
And keep all in a stir
And a whirl,
And a blur,
With a "To the Editor: Sir,"
In hope that something may come of it
That will be good—some of it.
Death: Here's one we'd do ill without.
Loud and well shall he tout
For this my folly rout,
For the Dance, ho! of Death
Well shall he spend his breath.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Dives

Profiteer: Well, why not join in?
Heads or tails, lose or win!
A short life and a merry,
One bite of the cherry.
Make hay with the sun,
Harvest's soon done.
Skim the cream as it rises,
Life's full of surprises.
Take the profits in cash,
Soon comes the crash,
And the profits are—well—huge;
After me come the deluge!
Death: Here's one of the best!

He dances with zest
And whips on the rest.
Welcome, right welcome to the Dance;
Thou wilt it much advance.
Quod Death.

Civis

Plain citizen: I know not why I am here;
To me all is not clear.
Mayhap had I taken thought
I would not thus be caught.
But "Had-I-wist" is a poor phrase;
Best dance in these piping days.
It is noyous to think it out.
I will join the rout.

Mors

Death: That fills out the line.
Now are they all mine.
Come, louder music and more!
Is not this a merry dancing-floor?
With good intentions 'tis paved o'er.
Round about,
In and out,
Weave the measure, raise the shout;
Dance we now a merry bout.
Quod Death.

Goes it not well,
Sooth to tell?
Here are brave playfellows for you, I vow!
Who art thou?
HATE!
Thou comest not late!
And thou?
GREED!
Good speed, good speed!
Thou?
ENVY!
Hie thee, hie!
Thou?
WRATH!
Work here thy scath!
Thou?
LUST!
Thou comest just!
Thou?
HUNGER!
Wax stronger!
Thou?
WAR!
More and more!
Thou?
IGNORANCE!
Dance! dance!
And I?
DEATH!
Quod Death.

Mors et Fortuna

Fortune: This is as merry a crew
Of Fools as ever I knew.
The Land of Cockayne they think to have found,
But it is to Narragonia they are bound.
However they speed
They must reckon with me at need.

'Twill be a merry fall
When down comes all.
Death: Gup, jades, dance,
Merrily prance
With a gay countenance
After thy master Death.
And hearken to what he saith:
"When finished is this work
I am both sexton and clerk;
Good women all and men,
In manus meas, et caetera. Amen!"
Quod Death.
Explicit chorea machabaeorum.
Cy finist la danse macabre.
Here hath ending the dance of death.
Sed nondum erit finis.
Numerus stultorum est infinitus.
By St. Mary Gypsey,
Quod scripsi, scripsi.
Quod Skelton laureatus.
HARRY AYRES

Correspondence

Progress Based Upon Reason

To the EDITORS OF THE REVIEW:
Ever since seeing, some weeks ago, the preliminary notice of your proposed publication, I have been looking forward with impatience to its appearance. There never was so great a need for the kind of thing THE REVIEW proposes to undertake as now, for, with our whole social and economic order shaken to its very foundations, there has never been so broad and so fertile a field for the demagogue and the hawkler of poisonous political nostrums.

One clear ringing voice urging progress based upon reason and the lessons of experience among the maunderings and shriekings of sentimental or venomous radicalism may reach many who otherwise might be caught up and carried along in the current of destruction. Your statement of purposes, together with the names of those chosen to carry them out, gives every promise that the shallow and specious reasonings of visionaries are to be met with the deep and sound teachings of men of vision.

WILLIAM HOWARD DOUGHTY, JR.,
Professor in Government,
Williams College
Williamstown, Mass., May 10

The Opportunity for Sane Journalism

To the EDITORS OF THE REVIEW:
My occupation is that of a stenographer, and most of my associates are working women, ranging in occupations from chambermaids to bookkeepers. I have a good opportunity to know what they think by what they say. This is the class of people that is most in need of wholesome, nourishing, and sustaining mental food.

For some years I have tried to impress upon public-spirited men and women of my acquaintance the great need of wholesome journalism; but the answer to my argument has usually been that people are given what they want. Even if that is true, which I doubt, it is just like saying that a large family of children should be continuously and everlastingly fed on pickles and candy, simply because that is what they want.

When people are fed—daily, weekly, and monthly—on a highly seasoned, adulterated mental diet, their minds become poisoned and the effect is serious indeed.

I am watching and waiting for the fulfillment of my long-cherished hope, namely, a sane, just, and logical journalism. The work of the Rockefeller medical research institution pales into almost insignificance when compared with the great good that could be accomplished by the wholesome nourishment of the mind. So much impressed am I by this fact that gladly would I give a tenth of my income the rest of my life to be applied toward the establishment of such a type of journalism, conducted upon just as sincere and energetic lines as those upon which our vast medical research institutions are conducted.

FRANCES COOK
Los Angeles, Cal., May 9

Universal Brotherhood

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:
I am sending you my subscription to THE REVIEW as a patriotic duty on this anniversary of Patriots' Day. With it go my devout wishes for success in a loyal service to our country.

Your reference to the universal brotherhood that will "somehow emerge" leads me to hope that you will sometime set forth the forgotten fact that Christianity in its representative churches has never taught universal brotherhood. It has taught the exact contrary—the brotherhood of the faithful who have renounced the ways of the sinful and devoted themselves to a better life. Its principle is aristocratic in that sense, and it will not do to saddle on Christianity the sickly conception of indiscriminate love for criminals, brutes of vicious instincts, and all the pathological crew of degenerates. Admission to citizenship, civil or religious, must be earned, and must be maintained by discipline, obedience to law, loyalty to the point of self-sacrifice. Democratic in that its appeal is to all, it must be aristocratic in its selection—its rule the rule of the best. At least that is the ideal, for it has an ideal.

A. H. MORTON
Williamstown, Mass., April 19

Book Reviews

Germany's Former Ascendency

BISMARCK. By C. Grant Robertson, M.A., C.V.O. (Makers of the Nineteenth Century, edited by Basil Williams.) New York: Henry Holt and Company.

BEFORE the war English and American writers never thoroughly understood Bismarck. They never grasped the full significance of the forces at work in his creation of an empire. Even after 1864 and 1866 they remained blind to his extraordinary achievements in that decade—the patient manipulation of the new Bundesrat, the remorseless assimilation of the annexed provinces by the Prussian civil service, the solid concrete of science, research, and political thought laid by the intellectuals of National Liberalism and by the flower of the professoriate. The apostle of sweetness and light, Matthew Arnold, though praising Germany, because like the Italian Renaissance it strove to combine the humanities with science, believed the French army in 1870 would smash the Prussian. Carlyle's "Frederick," which appeared between 1858 and 1865, was a noble and brilliant contribution to historical literature, but the connection between the Frederick portrayed by Carlyle and the Prussia of the Age of Bismarck was not grasped by the generation that read Carlyle. Aside from the brief volumes by Headlam and Munroe Smith, all the biographies of Bismarck in English are essentially mediocre and entirely negligible; and Headlam wrote too soon after 1890 to appreciate Bismarck's later influence, which indeed he treats but scantily; while Munroe Smith was content merely to sketch in the outline without painting in the background and color.

So there was a fair field of opportunity open to Mr. Grant Robertson. Brilliantly has he embraced it. To be sure, he takes it for granted that his reader knows something of German history. He accordingly allows himself, in interpreting Bismarck, a wealth of stimulating allusions, brilliant metaphors, and sudden jumps in chronology. For this reason it was with some misgivings that the reviewer assigned the early chapters to a class of khaki-clad college boys just returned from France. A few days later one of them stopped after the lecture to exclaim with genuine and unusual enthusiasm: "Robertson doesn't just hand out the old stuff about Metternich and the Carlsbad Decrees. He makes Bismarck a live wire and makes me realize the problems he had to face as a young man." That apparently was the verdict of the whole class from the sophomores, who were shaken out of indifference, to the graduate students, who quarreled for possession of a single copy.

Bismarck surely played as big a part in nineteenth century politics as did Gladstone or Disraeli. Mr. Robertson might have felt justified in filling three volumes, as did M. Paul Matter in his admirable "Bismarck et son Temps." We are glad he refrained, for fewer people would have read such an opus. Yet that there is less thought or less research in his single volume than in the tomes of Morley or Monypenny we greatly doubt. For part of the solid value of Mr. Robertson's book lies in the very sane and acute, but condensed, conclusions and judgments with which it bristles and to which he has given years of study and thought. It was virtually completed before 1914, and is, therefore, free from the warping effects of the war. His general attitude is well expressed in his comment at the conclusion of the Franco-Prussian War: "We may both detest and admire the achievement of Germany, but it is only ignorance that fails to recognize the solidity of the work on which German ascendency was based, and the futility of impeaching it except by a superiority in toil, in concentrated purpose, and sacrifice" (p. 302).

Only in one matter of importance does the author need correction. He gropes somewhat uncertainly in regard to Bismarck's Eastern policy in the '80s, and is unaware of the very secret "reinsurance treaty" of 1881, the triple alliance against radicalism and democracy represented by the autocrats of the German, Russian, and Austrian Empires. Bismarck himself in the spitefulness of retirement at Friedrichsruhe hinted in 1896 at a reinsurance treaty of 1884. But the original treaty of 1881 remained entirely unsuspected until the publication of extracts from Sabourov's papers in the Nineteenth Century (Dec., 1917) and until the Bolshevik revelations from the Russian archives made possible Goriainov's able article "The End of the Alliance of the Emperors" in the American Historical Review (Jan., 1918). He shows in detail how the treaty of 1881 originated and how the headstrong young Kaiser failed to renew it when dropping the pilot in 1890. William II thus removed the corner stone on which Bismarck's system rested; he caused the thing which Bismarck had always sought to prevent: an alliance between Russia and France.

Mr. Robertson rightly regards Bismarck's own statements in the Reichstag and especially in his later "Gedanken und Erinnerungen" with the greatest caution. He doubts, for instance, the veracity of the Chancellor's assertion that the Prussian militarists alone were responsible for the retention of Metz after 1870—that he himself would have been content with Alsace and a strip of "German" Lorraine. "The contemporary evidence points to a wholly different conclusion. Bismarck was just as remorseless as the most truculent militarist at Headquarters" (p. 188). Neither will Mr. Robertson accept Bismarck's later disclaimers of responsibility for the cruel and unwise legislation in the Kulturkampf: "A scapegoat had to be found, and Falk, the hero of the National Liberals and the Radicals, served the convenient purpose of exculpating the Chancellor and affronting the parties with which Bismarck broke between 1878 and 1879. . . . As for the May Laws and Falk, as Bismarck said to Augustenburg in 1864, 'We can always wring the necks of the chickens we have ourselves hatched'" (pp. 329, 336). Of his dominating personality in general he writes: "In 1871 men felt what Goethe said of Napoleon I, 'You cannot beat him, the man is too strong for you.' Personal intercourse with the man heightened the hypnotism that Bismarck exercised. His personal diplomacy was a marvellous mixture of brutality, arrogance, and geniality, of patrician grandeur aided by the tricks of the card-sharper. A stab in the back came as easily from his vindictive rancour, as the great stroke that achieved a long-matured ideal" (p. 342).

The Mad English

EMINENT VICTORIANS. By Lytton Strachey. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

THE true principles of portrait painting were laid down by Cromwell in his cautions to Lely; and these Mr. Strachey has adopted in his pen portraits of four Victorian celebrities, Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale, Arnold of Rugby, and Chinese Gordon. Some may think that he has exaggerated the warts and wrinkles until the true likeness is lost, and that the result is sheer caricature. Others will welcome them with Teufelsdröckh's cri de coeur, "Truth! though the Heavens crush me for following her: no Falsehood! though a whole celestial Lubberland were the price of apostasy." Four complex, rich, but vaguely-known personalities are here dissected with the careful skill of a demonstrator in spiritual anatomy, with the astounding result that these three men and one woman seem not dead but alive, even undying, and incapable of death.

Beyond the writer's own interest in them, no reason can be assigned for grouping together such a diversity of creatures as a soldier, a head master, a woman reformer, and a Roman cardinal. Yet they have a common term. According to their light, they took Christianity literally and applied its principles to their lives. All have a singular intensity of character, the driving power of great convictions. "Allah created the English mad." The madness of these English was essentially religious, working itself out in various ways. Gordon is, of course, the most striking example; the others differed in degree, not in kind.

Unrelieved brilliancy is the note of the method and the style. The authorities in each case have been thoroughly assimilated. The completed study existed, one would say, in the author's brain, before his pen had written a word. It is all of one piece, poured at one casting into the predestined mould. Great pains must have been spent in burnishing, but the labor of the file is nowhere evident. The writing is distinctly "of the centre," polished, witty, ironic, luminous. With faith in any shape the author can have little sympathy; the inexhaustible material of Christianity gives him also scope for the solemn or covert sneer. His attitude towards his subjects is scientifically aloof. He is blind to none of their failings; he will gloss over none of their weaknesses; he will see them steadily and see them whole. It is the attitude of a modern Puck cynically concerned with the various folly of mortal men.

Failings they had in plenty. Manning was ambitious and intriguing, with an eye always to the main chance. Florence Nightingale had a vixenish temper. Gordon was insubordinate and half mad; in the solitudes of the tropics he consoled himself with brandy, as well as with the Bible. Arnold was a snobbish, limited thinker. There are warts and wrinkles in every face Mr. Strachey draws, but the artist well knew that these give the likeness of life. The smooth, retouched, conventional pictures of the impeccable prelate, the saintly Lady with the Lamp, the inspiring preacher of righteousness, the Christian hero dead in the far Soudan give place to Rembrandt-like portraits of recognizable, faulty, remarkable human beings.

Sentimental, one imagines, is Mr. Strachey's extreme of condemnation; enthusiasm of any sort his pet aversion. Yet in each of his characters there is something that compels his reluctant admiration. Before the stage of their achievements he sits an interested spectator, once or twice betrayed into moderate kid-gloved applause. Manning in his last days, swaying the dock laborers as the wind sways the weeds, Florence Nightingale bringing some human order out of the unspeakable horrors of Scutari, Arnold in Rugby Chapel, Gordon dying like so many of his clan, sword in hand in the city he could not save stir the reader's pulses even if they left the author cold.

Much more than the lives of these four comes into the saga. There are admirable thumbnail sketches of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Hartington, Sir Evelyn Baring, John Henry Newman, Hurrell Froude, Wilfrid Ward, Sidney Herbert, Arthur Clough, Lord Panmure. Greater matters are exposed with perfect clearness—the political aspect of the Catholic university for Ireland, the general course of the Oxford Movement, the conflicting currents in the Government which first sent Gordon to Khartoum, decided to let him stay there or escape as best he could, and then determined, too late, to rescue him. No people are more unsparing critics of themselves than the English. It is another manifestation of the national "madness," as it appears to foreigners. When Mr. Strachey quotes Arthur Rimbaud to the effect that the British policy in the Soudan wrought worse ruin than the Egyptians or the Turks, that Gordon was an idiot, and Wolseley an ass, he nowhere suggests disagreement with the verdict. But calm acceptance of such criticism suggests infinite reserves of national strength. It is not a sign of national weakness.

Guidance, light, truth is what the world needs. All readers of this fascinating book will hope that Mr. Strachey will continue his work, and furnish forth a whole gallery of such historical portraits.

The Bull-Fight

BLOOD AND SAND. (Sangre y Arena.) By Vicente Blasco Ibañez. Translated from the Spanish by Mrs. W. A. Gillespie, with an Introduction by Isaac Goldberg. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

O ¡LÉ los mozos valientes! Viva España!

At last the American reading public has a translation—and a very excellent one it is—of "Sangre y Arena." Published just ten years ago, its almost reckless courage in striking openly at the sacrosanct traditions of taumachy in its native land at once commanded general attention at home and abroad, in almost every civilized country, indeed, save ours. Here it required the stimulus of actuality in the great war novel, "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," to attract our attention to the extensive production of one who, a full decade ago, was classed with the best of that Spanish school of novelists who were doing for their country in letters what Sorolla and Zuloaga were doing on canvas. To be made free of the company of Galdós, Clarín, Pío Baroja, Padre Coloma, Valdés, Pardo-Bazán—not to recall Pereda and Valera who had died only shortly before—is a certificate of high merit. How high, it is regrettable that there has been so little opportunity for American readers to know. When the study of Spanish with a view to selling adding-machines and cod liver oil in South America shall have thoroughly permeated our High School systems there may be a greater number of us who will want to turn not only to Cervantes but also to the group of which Blasco Ibañez is one.

"Blood and Sand" is a study in the psychology of the bull-fighter or, more exactly, of the bull-fight itself. True, we have considerable minute information in regard to the corridos from classic sources. In George Ticknor's "Life and Journal" may be found a very complete account, sent in 1818 to his parents in Boston, which was afterwards expanded into an article for the North American Review of July, 1825. Théophile Gautier in his "Voyage en Espagne," 1840, familiar through repeated translations, has given a characteristically vivid account of the national sport; who could forget the epic figure of El picador Sevilla—and of the dying horse! The realist Prosper Mérimée in his turn left a detailed recital as clear and cold as any of his tales, while more recently the late John Hay, in that delightful book, "Castilian Days," has given us a chapter which well deserves another reading. On the psychology of the bull-fight one may consult with satisfaction the fine essays of Georges Lecompte in his volume "Espagne" (Paris, 1896). And they are not all. But all these accounts give the view from without. And however much one's reason, ethics, and education may protest, one is nevertheless under the spell of one's author; swayed by his argument and description, one is apt to palliate what one can not personally deny. To Gautier "une course de taureaux est un des plus beaux spectacles que l'homme puisse imaginer," and so for the majority of foreign writers it has continued to be—picturesque, barbaric, strange as the dance of the Seises (the altar boys) before the high altar in the cathedral of Seville on Corpus Christi, probably the most brilliant and dramatic spectacle this world has still to offer. Cosas de España!

With some of the toreros, the toreadors of Spanish as she is spoke, books or chance visits to the arena have brought us some sort of acquaintance. Pepe-Illo, a tauromatistic man of letters as well as a proficient espada, the friend of the Duchess of Alba and of Goya who etched his death, died with his boots—or rather slippers—on in the last great battle with a bull as famous as himself. Then there was Martinche who awaited the bull's charge seated, with shackled feet, upon a chair. There was the celebrated lady picador, Cereguela, and the master Montes. Some of us still remember Bomba and Fuentes in the flesh, while more still may have seen the youthful Bombita, the idol of the last generation. Yet all this, again, is from the spectators' gallery. "Blood and Sand," however, admits us, as it were, behind the scenes, or, in the vernacular, entre bastidores.

The story—a sort of pseudo-biography based, in part at least, upon the career of a certain Frascuelo—carries the popular espada Juan Gallardo from the heyday of his triumphs, when he "kills everything they throw out to him," "putting the bulls into his pocket," to the time when, weakened by wounds and dissipation, fear has gradually taken possession of his very soul—a fear as cold and ghastly as any ever conceived by Maupassant—making his arm unsteady and his will "to lean up against them" weak. But his professional pride, the verguenza torera, holds him to his work despite the jeering and cursing of the crowd. The bull's horn—thus he dies. The plot is almost negligible. The action moves rapidly in a series of great tableaux—a sort of "torero's progress, à la Goya. The milieu, abounding in magnificent descriptions, every detail true to the fact, is sumptuous enough to have satisfied even Gautier. Yet its truth needs to be defended against those who exclaim, "Exaggeration! caricature! mentira!" It is but too true. Not primarily for the faithful were excursions run annually from Paris and the north for the Holy Week celebrations at Seville.

The author's serious purpose appears in the interview between the successful and dissolute Gallardo and the bandit Plumitas.

"Everybody knows his own business, Señor Juan," Plumitas continued as if he guessed the matador's thoughts. "We both live by killing: you kill bulls and I kill men. The only difference is that you are rich and carry off the palms and beautiful women while I often rage with hunger. . . . I believe that we have come too late into this world. What things men of valor and enterprise like ourselves might have done in former days! You would not have been killing bulls, neither should I have been wandering over the country hunted like a wild beast. We might have been viceroys, archipampanos or something great across the seas. Have you ever heard of Pizarro, Señor Juan? . . . I repeat, we were born too late. The gates are closed upon poor men; the Spaniard does not know where to go or what to do. All the places where he might have spread have been appropriated by the English or other countries. I who might have been a king in America or elsewhere am proclaimed an outlaw, and they even call me a thief. You, who are a brave man, kill bulls and carry off the palms, still I know many who look upon the torero's profession as a low one."

Gallardo is to appear in his native town at the great performance of the year, la corrida de la Resurrección. He is knocked down and trampled by the bull and only saved from death by the devoted courage of his friend the banderellero, El Nacional. It is a splendid passage. Consternation fills the land; newspapers get out special editions; guards are hurriedly placed about the Plaza to keep the crowd, anxious for news, from storming the infirmary. But he recovers, slowly. And as he lies upon his bed of suffering he listens to a long conversation on the history and ethics of taumachy between his doctor, Ruiz, and El Nacional, who, despite the fact that he works mechanically at his job, scorns the calling and sees in it only another evidence of his country's degeneracy. This passage has been excised by the translator, perhaps at the command of the publishers. It is of prime importance, however, as showing exactly what Ibañez thinks of the bullfight. Not to give it is to refuse to listen to the author in his most earnest moments, when in return for the entertainment he offers he asks for a few minutes of serious thought from his public.

When it is all over and the chulos bear away the mangled body, untenanted by its despairing spirit, we hear the yelling of the crowd demanding that the sport go on. "It was the roaring of the wild beast, the true and only one." It helps, perhaps, in understanding the courage of Blasco Ibañez in thus attacking the cherished atrocity of his native land, to look at his almost heroic portrait by Sorolla in the Hispanic Museum. The book and the picture complement and explain each other.

Olé los hombres valientes! Viva España!

The Lot of American Wives

HIS WIFE'S JOB. By Grace Sartwell Mason. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

DIVERGING ROADS. By Rose Wilder Lane. New York: The Century Company.

THE SEE-SAW. By Sophie Kerr. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

OUR women novelists continue to be very busy with the lot of American wives, especially the wives of the hustling young business men, the makers and spenders. Anne Henderson in "His Wife's Job" is presented frankly as a type: "All over the country there were hundreds, yes, thousands like her, wives of high-salaried young men who were neither of the overworked laboring class nor of the equally overworked moneyed world. They were born and spent all their days in the temperate zone of human endeavor. They went from a father's providing hand to a husband's protection, and the winds were tempered to them from the cradle to the grave." Sleek parasites, childless and carefully "groomed" darlings of the matinée and the bridge-party: one would think they might have learned to see and despise themselves in the mirror of current fiction. Alas, the novelists and our own observation show them to be pretty numerous still. What shall they do to be saved? They have been told often enough. They must make themselves of some use in the world. As to the means, authorities differ. We have the old-fashioned counsel of writers like Kathleen Norris, who urge a return to nature, to motherhood and housewifery, and we have the fresher and somewhat shriller exhortations of story-tellers like Gertrude Atherton, who are all for "economic independence" and the lure of the job, both as something to do and by way of hint to the lord of the harem as to "where he gets off." A favorite solution of late has been the development of some sort of partnership in labor between the married pair. Miss Mason employs it in "His Wife's Job," the war proving a godsend, as with most recent stories, in the working-out of the plot. Anne is the silly pretty girl-wife, whose husband has married her with the avowed purpose of spoiling her and has made a thorough success of it. She spends as fast as he earns, so that when after seven years his chance comes to pass from salaried man to partner in a thriving business, the bit of capital necessary is lacking. This is unpleasant for Roger, and for once he allows it to be unpleasant for Anne. He spends a night "walking around his House of Life." It is in a sad mess; but what to do?—Ha! There is a war on, come to think of it. On with the war! With Roger comforting his soul at the front, Anne has her problem still to settle. According to the latest recipe, to be sure, she would follow Roger's example, don a Red Cross costume, and presently find Roger, not too gravely damaged, in a hospital somewhere "over there." Not so Anne: her escape is to be by way of another popular exit, "economic independence." That is the cause to which, being alone and bored, she is impelled to devote herself. After a fiasco as an amateur shop-keeper (an enterprise financed, not without precedent, by an elderly rake of a millionaire), she finds a humble place with her husband's former employers; "makes good" there, and becomes her husband's business partner in an important after-the-war enterprise. "His partner! She felt, as she walked along beside him, as if they had discovered the secret rhythm of the world, and were moving joyously in touch with it." They still have no children and no thoughts of them unless as potential intruders, one supposes, who might well interfere with that newer source of wedded rhythm, a business partnership.

There appear to be three "Diverging Roads" in the novel of that title, all of which beckon the Helen Davies of the tale. They may be called Pleasure, Shelter, and Independence. Helen is the sufficiently nice girl in the hopelessly humdrum small town—California happens to contain it, but any other of our States might, in so far as it concerns us. A decent, plodding lad of the town attracts her, in the name of his youth and sex. But she has no intention of waiting for his slow fortunes in her poor home. She aspires to a job, studies telegraphy, becomes a hotel operator in San Francisco, falls in with a gay vulgar crowd which offers her pleasure: meets and is carried off by a magnetic male, a promoter. They go through the marriage ceremony, but none the less her position is that of his mistress. After some years, he duly deserts her, whereupon she becomes, in fairly short order, a successful business woman. Meanwhile the plodding lover of her youth has moved upward; he is still faithful and, jaded by her effort and moved by real affection for him, she promises to be his wife. Here, according to the standards of the woman's magazine—a quaint fact for those who have begun to doubt the eternal feminine—the story should end. Home! Home and peace and children for the woman worn with passion and with toil. However, our author does not see it in that way. The third road is still open. Already to employ her energies, after her voluntary retirement from business, she has turned her hand to journalism and even "made good" at it, in a preliminary way. She joins a group of "newspaper girls" and other skirted bachelors of aggressive independence. We leave her embarking for the Far East, as a newspaper correspondent in war-time. Is she getting her cake at last? Or leaving it behind? She seems hardly to know. On the whole, she believes the plodding one has really loved not her, but the girl she used to be. He will find some one to fit that memory, with herself out of the way: "That's why it hurt me so!" she thought with sudden illumination. "Not because I wanted him, but because I wanted to be all that I had been, and to have all that I have missed and never will have. Marriage and home and children. No, I can't ever fit into it now. But—there's all the world, all the world outside, waiting for me!" Her thoughts turned forward to it.

Not for naught is the author of "The See-Saw" managing editor of the Woman's Home Companion. She knows that nothing is so dear to the heart of the new woman (and her consort) as the old one; that however fashions may change, the Amelia Sedleys will never be strange and brilliant chances to be be out of date; and that though there won in "the story-writing game," the one "sure bet" is the story based upon sweet woman suffering at the caprice of masterful man. Marcia Crossey is yet another modern Griselda who wins to her final reward by sheer meekness and waiting. Otherwise the Amelia analogy is better; for Harleth Crossey is little more than an Osborne Americanized and commercialized, while his Leila is a highly colored Becky of the tango period (and Marcia's absurd faithful Jennings is nothing if not a Dobbin). Harleth "goes the pace," a brilliant money-maker, a feverish hunter for pleasure, the type of man to be bored with a good and beautiful wife, and an easy dupe for the Leilas. Leila happens to be his step-mother, but a pair of divorces take care of all that. Harleth soon learns what a fool he has been and, fortunately for him, Leila is sufficiently a bad one to take herself off his hands presently, for the sake of a richer man. The rest is easy. All Harleth has to do is to find Marcia, to tell her that she is the only woman he has ever really loved, and to groan, "If you've changed—then there's nothing steady in the world." . . . "She could not deny him. What was there in the world without her, he had asked. And what was there in the world for her without him? . . . She leaned toward him and stretched out her hands to him, tenderly, loyally: 'I haven't changed,' she said. 'I haven't changed. I'm your wife—always.'" Let us not affect to laugh at this. Marcia is a real type and this is a true situation. The perennial tale is well if not subtly retold. Harleth is a stumbling-block to the male reader. Why does the woman novelist of choice take a cad for hero? Because she does not know a cad when she sees one, as we males allege? Or because all males are really cads, and only woman is man enough to admit it?

H. W. BOYNTON

An Object-Lesson for Socialists

BOLSHEVISM. By John Spargo. New York: Harper and Brothers.

MR. SPARGO'S account of Bolshevism is a useful book in these days. It has caused much commotion among our "little groups of serious thinkers" who have made "parlor Bolshevism" so popular a fad in New York this year. Mr. Spargo may justly claim to share with "Babushka" the distinction of excommunication from the company of truly "forward looking" and "socially minded" folk. "Babushka's" age may perhaps excuse her somewhat, but what excuse shall Mr. Spargo find?

It is a useful book because it contains the facts concerning Bolshevik Russia stated in an orderly way and is reasonably well documented. It is doubly useful because it is written by a Socialist of the orthodox type and therefore will reach many and convince many who would not read such a book if it were written by a "bourgeois" person. It is a highly significant book in these times, for it shows how the wind blows and does it in a manner that leaves no room for doubt.

Mr. Spargo has shown in his writings on Socialism a very keen sense for the weak spots in the Socialist platform. He has been among the American group of writers the nearest to a "trimmer" that Socialist literature reveals. His "Marxian Socialism and Religion" is unique among Socialist books for its frantic attempts to reconcile the unreconcilable, and compromise contraries. This makes the more interesting his vigorous effort to detach Bolshevism from Socialism and to clear the skirts of the latter from the excesses of the former—also to rescue orthodox Socialism from the fate that he evidently apprehends for Bolshevism.

The argument is well arranged and Mr. Spargo has no difficulty in showing how completely Bolshevism is at war with "Democracy." But to one who has read Mr. Spargo's own books on Socialism and the books of other orthodox writers of the party it is easy to see that between the present condition of things in Russia and the principles of Marx there is very little real difference. The rule of the proletariat, as Lenin and Trotsky see it, is only necessary in order to establish the "classless" commonwealth. As soon as all the people are proletarian workers, all will vote, and then the community will be "democratic." Abolition of class, according to the Marxian creed, is an indispensable preliminary to the final stage of human society; while class persists, there is class struggle, and the famous Hegelian process is still short of its final synthesis—the coöperative Commonwealth. Messrs. Lenin and Trotsky are merely helping along the Hegelian process! One cannot avoid feeling that Mr. Spargo's concern over Bolshevism—apart, of course, from a natural and proper aversion on his part to its criminal excesses and cruelties—is that it is furnishing a very dangerous object-lesson as to Socialism itself and what we might expect Socialism to be in action or, at least, in getting into action!

However, as we have said, it is an interesting book and well worth while, quite apart from its esoteric significance, and we are glad to be able to recommend it to the public. The reactions that it is exciting among our long-haired intelligenzia are good testimony to its merits as a statement of facts.

The Run of the Shelves

IN a book by a college president, which undertakes among other things to sketch the outlines of the future American college, we can not forbear to linger over a little vignette describing past conditions which we are earnestly invited to abjure.

Thus, the early Middle Ages conceived education as ability to read and write the ancient languages, because this power gave to the clergy their exalted position above the masses, a tradition which has persisted in a measure until to-day.

Concerning so pretty a formula, so commodious a basis on which to found the educational structure of the future, it seems almost a pity to remark that it comes about as near the truth as some statement to the effect that the twentieth century American gentleman habitually wears a full suit of chain mail, both to protect himself against the arrows of the Indians and to exhibit his superiority to the proletariat, who are clothed only in leather jerkins. Any one to whom the Middle Ages is something more than a catchword for the dark backward and abysm of time may amuse himself with a picture of John of Salisbury, to name one of the most enlightened of thirteenth century clerics, solemnly spouting Sophocles to the gaping "lewd". The thing is grotesquely impossible. If for "ancient languages" our modern educational authority had said merely "Latin" he would have been measurably nearer the truth, for doubtless the mediæval preacher, when he could be got to preach, did sometimes saffron his discourse with tags of Latin to the edification of the vulgar. But the ordinary arts course in the mediæval university, and by no means all the real scholars were members of a university, did not consist of the unrelieved study of Latin texts directed toward the attainment of some superior sort of culture. The mediæval clerk learned enough colloquial Latin in the grammar school to enable him to move about in the cosmopolitan society of the university where Latin was of necessity the only common medium. Once at the university we may be sure he proceeded to "drop Latin" as a study and went hard at what he regarded his proper business, dialectic, medicine, law, more rarely theology. How to meet a drift toward the practical, the immediately remunerative, was as much a problem then as now.

In a recent series of thoughtful war essays, "Volleys from a Non-Combatant," Mr. William Roscoe Thayer has inserted two of his war lyrics, "France: 1916" and "Let Foch Decide." The practice of mixing prose and verse from the same hand in a single volume seems natural and blameless. Why is it so rare? There is Boethius, doubtless, with his proses and metres, and there is Dante with his alternations in the "Vita Nuova." There are Elizabethan transitions where prose blossoms into poetry like Aaron's rod or poetry shrivels into prose like the withering fig-tree. But, in a broad view, verse and prose have held aloof from each other almost as distrustfully as artists and bourgeois. In complete editions of masters in both forms, we break chronology, even in these days when chronology is sacred, to save prose and verse from the embarrassment of propinquity.

But the notion that a volume from one hand should be wholly prose or wholly verse has no hold upon our reason at all proportional to its grip on our habits and feelings. Is the partition warranted? Would not poetry, in particular, gain by interspersed with prose? If, as people say, poems are concentrations, should not these concentrations be spaced and distributed rather than massed? Isn't Mr. Thayer sound in his departure?

Mr. George Pierce Baker, of Harvard University, has recently published a manual of "Dramatic Technique." The book will be reviewed later; for the moment it suggests a remark or two on the duplication of labor in manuals. A few years ago Mr. William Archer published an excellent treatise on "Play-Making." Let us suppose provisionally that Mr. Baker's book is quite as good as Mr. Archer's. Why two books? I am not blaming Mr. Baker in the least. Mr. Archer's priority can not invest him with any rights or impose upon Mr. Baker any obligations. I speak in the interest of the world which numbers both Mr. Archer and Mr. Baker among its servants. In civic and private life, when a job has been well done, we wait for time to undo it before we undertake to re-do it. A householder who has slated his roof does not re-slate it till time has proved the inefficiency or worn out the efficiency of the first labor.

The principle scarcely applies to sciences like physics or chemistry where the advance of knowledge outruns and disables the text-book. There can be no permanent chart of a shifting frontier. But dramatic technique belongs to a different class. It is a branch of rhetoric, and rhetoric is prevalently stationary. Although no science, in our own time, is more fickle and volatile in its text-books, in this point it possibly resembles the man, who, unable to rebuild his house like his neighbors, should repaint it every year to produce the appearance of novelty. Where is the need of two competent manuals of whist or chess or arithmetic or fencing or dramatic technique? There will be differences, of course, but differences must be subsidiary, since the teaching of a practical art rests on the assumption that practice is uniform and ascertainable.

Mr. Francis W. Kelsey, in a fresh edition of Cæsar's "Commentaries," refers aptly enough to the novel interest which the world-war confers upon that martial classic. Schoolboys once fought their way inch by inch through the barbed-wire entanglement of its involved and baffling syntax. Some of them have learned since what it meant to fight their way almost foot by foot on Cæsar's battlefields through difficulties which made the prowess of Rome seem almost as boyish as their own wrestlings with the Latin tongue. The contrasts, like the analogies, are striking. Cæsar fought like America against Germans, but he fought for empire, for militant and arrogant organization, the spirit which the modern Cæsar (or Kaiser) embodied no less clearly in the forms of his policy than in the syllables of his name. The difference lay in the fact that Cæsar was greater than his side or his part; the present Kaiser has been less.

Drama

Peninsular and Oriental— Benavente and Kalidasa

NEW YORK, the manifold, becomes a particle of Cathay in the presentation of Shakuntala at the Greenwich Village Theatre. I brought fresh if untrained eyes to its succinct auditorium, and found my pleasure in the warmth of its curtains a little cooled by the bleakness of its woodwork. At 8.40 two stage curtains went up, and from the solemn folds of a third, in which duns and purples met like asceticisms and carnalities in an Oriental cultus, the first hermit stepped forth to deliver the initial prayer in tones of unrivaled modulation. The story is enswathed with prologues almost as effectually as the stage with curtains. The stage-manager now appears in person in desultory converse with an actress-cantatrice—a device which Goethe, who reveled in "Shakuntala," may have distantly repeated in the Director-Poet prologue of his "Faust." From this point onward, spectacle, often if not always beautiful, dominates the play. The points that enrich the memory are the forest scene of Act I, the parable rather than the replica of a vine-hung Eastern wood, and the precipice or abyss of sky which supplies a vivid background to the court scenes of Act III. The word "spectacle" is too narrow for the truth. The ear is courted by devious and dreamy melodies mostly off-stage, and even the nostril is proffered the blandishment of incense.

Meanwhile, the story, the drama, becomes, in this American representation at least, a sort of background to the picture. There are penalties and barter in these things. When picture, as in "Shakuntala," becomes half articulate, speech may become a decorative tracery or fresco. Tone usurps the place of words; the words, indeed, in the celerity of packed and eager utterance, were often hardly distinguishable. "Shakuntala" has been described in the advertisements as the "Romeo and Juliet" of the Hindoos. As read, it partly justifies this praise, but what we get in the Greenwich Theatre is not so much the fire of love as the beautiful, hand-painted screen which protects our vision from that fire. The story, at best, is slight. Shakuntala, informally wedded to King Dushyanta, sets out to seek her royal consort with the sign of their wedlock on her finger and its fruit in her womb. The monarch is all loyalty and bounty, but a vindictive priest-enchanter, whom some one has omitted to welcome, has blurred his eyesight and darkened his memory. Shakuntala has lost the ring which should dispel misunderstanding, and happiness is for the moment blocked; but a chain of circumstances, in which a fish with an appetite for rings, a breadwinner whose quest is fish, and two police officers whose prey is fishermen, are the agreeable, if somewhat improbable, links, restores memory to Dushyanta and honor to Shakuntala. The text of the play is not before me, but I should say from memory that the acting version rejects half of the original. So fearless an abridgment should straighten out a meandering plan, but excisions made in the interest of spectacle can not insure the solidarity of drama. Reduction may even bring out disparity, as an uncongenial trio is less at ease than an ill-assorted group of twelve or twenty persons. For example, the beautiful but absurdly misplaced dance of Miss Grace Cristie in the second scene of Act IV would be less glaringly irrelevant in a larger and more loosely comprehensive drama in which the jungle of episodes would as jungle partly justify itself.

The best acting is perhaps that of Mr. Geoffrey Stein in the part of the jester. Years ago, in reading "Shakuntala," I found the same surprise and joy in the discovery of racy humor in this voluptuous Hindoo idyl that I should have had in cutting an Indian palm and finding that it exuded the tars and pitches of our northern woods. The other night I felt the humor less in the text itself than in the richly tinted burlesque of Mr. Stein's expertly varied tones. Mr. Joseph Macaulay makes a very acceptable King Dushyanta, though he acts the paragon too evidently, and his saccharine facial expression is repeated in the conserve of his speech. With Miss Beatrice Prentice as Shakuntala my contentment was not absolute. She crept and drooped and coiled and clung, as if she were acting, not a woman, but the jasmin to which she was so perseveringly compared. The other parts were competent; the actors are trained elocutionists. Their elocution is good, except where they have been overtrained, and their silences are masterly.

The "Bonds of Interest" purports to tell how a nominal servant, whose relation to his nominal master is partly that of Phormio to Antipho in Terence or of Iago to Roderigo in Shakespeare, secures a fortune and a beauty for this master by yoking the self-interest of other persons to his designs. But the fellow, like Iago, is as much jester and philosopher as rogue, and the roguery is so close to sport that neither Benavente nor Crispin (the servant) has tasked himself to make the tricks ingenious. Indeed, the poor Crispin is made a pauper even in brains by the acceptance of an alms from fortuity in the form of a previous acquaintance with the iniquities of Polichinelle. The insouciance of both author and trickster has its danger; the farce that becomes its own butt may become its own enemy.

Beneath all these levities is a serious idea, which may be roughly formulated thus: Knave and good fellow are not divisions of mankind, but compartments in every individual; or, if you please, a rogue lurks in every gentleman, as a gentleman hides in every rogue. Such a dictum is no doubt as demoralizing to rogues as it is sanative for gentlemen, but, taken broadly, its truth and modernity are hardly questionable; it is almost the flower of our age's insight. But Benavente has not dramatized his theme. The moral is not stirred in, to borrow a phrase from cookery, but forms a clot or curd of doctrine, apparent chiefly in two notable but intruded speeches, that of Silvia in the conclusion, and that of Crispin to Columbine in Act II. In these intrusions the play really culminates. The situation is peculiar; a play that culminates in its excrescences might almost as well culminate between the acts.

I have still a third quarrel with the conduct of the drama. Benavente tells us that his characters are puppets unearthed from the fading repertory of the grotesque "commedia dell'arte." Now a dramatist may stage puppets, if he likes, just as a painter may paint shadows. He may even stage puppets and realities in the same play, as a painter may include trees and shadows of trees in the same picture. But I disown the painter who so paints trees and shadows that I can not tell where tree ends and shadow begins, and I reject the dramatist in whom the line between puppets and actualities is undiscernible. That is Benavente's fault. We are introduced to the half-world, the artistic demi-monde. The whole play is shifting and equivocal. The anomaly extends to Crispin himself, who figures sometimes as the most agile of the puppets, sometimes as showman.

I am bound perhaps to try to reconcile the unflinching and eager acceptance which this play finds among Spaniards and their kin with my own sense of its dramatic futility. The following may serve at least as makeshift. The Spaniards are divided between the romantic extravagance of their dreams or ideals and the cynicism of their perceptions. The contrast shows itself in other races; but in other races the two elements form an understanding; they confer, they negotiate, they sign a protocol, if not a peace. In the Spaniard the separation of these elements is complete; Don Quixote and Sancho Panza shout helplessly at each other from opposite sides of an indestructible and impenetrable wall. Now I do not think that Benavente broke down this partition; he merely hacked at it with an ax. But that partition has been for so many centuries a bewilderment and torment to the race that the sight of any effort to break it down is an inspiration and delight to every Spaniard.

The Theatre Guild in the Garrick Theatre gave a studious and shapely, if here and there somewhat overstressed, performance of the Benavente play. Mr. Augustine Duncan as Crispin owes his colleagues an apology for the oblivion in which they are swept by the vitality and resourcefulness of his portrayal. I think his playing better than his part, better by a wide margin than the play. Indeed the play is to him what Leander is to Crispin, a feeble thing transfused at moments with the glow of an imparted vigor. I thought at first that it was Mr. Duncan's office to give us gusto in horse-play, and I prepared myself to savor the gusto while I deprecated the horse-play. But as the drama went on and the calls upon Mr. Duncan became more varied, more delicate, and more exacting, I rejoiced increasingly in the versatility and perspicacity of his response. His Crispin finally became what for me, at least, Benavente's Crispin had never been, the embodiment of Nature herself, Nature entremetteuse, midwife, and stewardess, sly, jovial, audacious, unscrupulous, humoring man with toy idealism and gimcrack sentiment while guiding him steadily to those material issues on which her heart is set. Man's law may be other and higher; I am speaking now of Nature's.

This review would shirk a duty and miss a pleasure if it omitted a cordial reference to the able if unequal work of Mr. Rollo Peters as designer of settings. The mushroom landscape of the first act pleased me less than the slightly cloying charm of the background in Act II, and far less than the noble interior scene of Act III, satisfying the eye like the rich sobriety of antique vellum.

O. W. FIRKINS

Jazz

THIS word, so compact in form, yet with a world of suggestion held within its four letters, has but recently been admitted to full membership in our language. The events of the last two years have given so great an introduction and impetus to the little symbol that it has won its way to almost universal recognition by the sheer force of its expressive quality. The special phenomenon which it so succinctly denotes is not new in the world, but new to us in the United States, and through us, to at least two of our great allies, Great Britain and France. I have just read in the New York Times, in a short article telling of the death of one of its most famous exponents, Lieutenant "Jimmy" Europe, that General Gouraud, according to rumor, would travel a hundred miles, risking a military defeat by his absence from headquarters, in order to hear Europe's "Jazz Band." A new phenomenon with an appeal so potent as to produce even this hearsay surely deserves analysis.

Just what is jazz? In striving to answer this query, I can not hope to imitate the admirable brevity of the word. Jazz is ordered and calculated noise. It is a compound of qualities, both rhythmic and melodic. It seeks, and with absolute success be it said, to sweep from our minds all simultaneous consideration of other things, and to focus our attention upon its own mad, whirling, involved self. Herein lies a large part of its compelling force and appeal. It may well be that General Gouraud could find the hideous load of responsibility lightened, perhaps even put aside for the moment, as he listened to Europe's jazzing, and that he felt his pulse responding to the virile rhythm, and his emotions joining in the rush of the humorous care-free mood. Certain it is that our doughboys, fresh from the trenches, with days and weeks of grim endeavor and physical strain behind them, turned to the jazz furnished by their bands and found in it relaxation and solace and cheer which enabled them to forget what was past and to abandon themselves wholeheartedly to the joyous hilarity of the present moment.

There is not the slightest doubt that in this maelstrom of rhythm there abides a powerful tonic effect. Through the medium of the physical, it reaches and influences the psychological attitude. I have been convinced of the truth of this fact by personal experience, undergone not once but many times. Exhibit A, in my own case, might perhaps be my Victrola's rendering of the record of Joseph Smith's Orchestra, playing the "Havanola" fox-trot. While naturally of an optimistic temperament, I am not immune to the raids of mental and physical exhaustion. Scores of times I have been reanimated by the "Havanola," even when I seemed to be going down for the third time. Now, compared to a jazz band, my disk is as a violet to a sunflower. Its effect is, however, out of all proportion to its size.

The component elements of jazz are rhythm, melody, and a certain modicum of contrapuntal inner voices. But the greatest of these is rhythm. The right jazz band starts out to "get you" and leaves nothing to chance. It is fairly well established that only an oyster can resist the appeal of syncopated rhythm when it is performed with masterful abandon—abandon which absolutely controls dynamic gradations and vital accents.

The howitzers of the jazz band's artillery are stationed in the "traps." Under this heading we find all the instruments of percussion, such as the big drum, the snare drum, cymbals, triangle, wooden blocks played upon with drumsticks, xylophone, cowbells, rattles, whistles for the production of various weird noises, and a host of other implements, often the personal conceptions of individual players of the traps. The trombones may represent field guns, while the clarinets, oboes, saxophones, alto horns, and cornets furnish the rapid-fire batteries. The range being point-blank, it is easy to see why the effect of the "drum-fire" is complete!

The melody will always be borne by sufficient instruments to ensure its "getting over." Then, in the inner voices of the band, will take place a combination of effects which adds enormously to the total drive of the number. Here are certain of the contrapuntal features which are mentioned above. They consist of a variety of hilarious effects, produced by trombones or saxophones, attained by a curious sliding from note to note. This creates an extremely comical result. This characteristic and droll portamento has become so well known and so popular that it has achieved a specific name—"blues," a humorously apt designation. A striking contrast is made by the mournful sighing of the trombones in the midst of the joyous riot of the rest of the band. Sharp rhythmic ejaculations arise from out the welter of sound, and over the whole tumult the traps-player spreads his array of dazzling accents, brought forth with absolute virtuosity from his motley army of noise producers. It almost seems, at times, like a case of "each for himself and the devil take the hindmost." But it is not so, and there is definite purpose and ordered means in it all.

I feel that I need, perhaps, to justify my statement that jazz is not new in the world. In the summer of 1914, I was visiting at Céligny, on the shore of Lake Geneva, with Ernest Schelling. On the night of the 31st of July, a Chinese festival was held at Morges, at Mr. Paderewski's château, in honor of his birthday. Mr. Schelling and I had arranged all the music for the Fête of the Dragon. He had four records of native Siamese orchestras taken in Siam by the European Victor Talking Machine Company, as I recollect. When I first heard them played, I was astounded, for there in this Siamese music, in spite of the strange Oriental idioms, from an Occidental's harmonic standpoint, was the very essence of—jazz! The music was like nothing that my ears had ever heard, and uncouth to the point of absolute unintelligibility. But there were the insistent rhythm, the demoniac energy, the fantastic riot of accents from the drums and other percussion instruments, and a humorous mood which made me laugh long and loud. It seemed humorous to me. I have often wondered what that mood really was—in Siamese. There is no room for doubt when we hear our own jazz! Wholehearted, boisterous, rough, but the very soul of kindly good humor and care-free merriment.

HOWARD BROCKWAY

Books Received

- Cerf, B. Alsace-Lorraine since 1870. Macmillan. $1.50.
 Democracy To-day. Edited by C. Gauss. Late English Classics. Scott, Foresman.
 Field, W. T. Reading from English and American Literature. Ginn.
 Fitzpatrick, E. A. Experts in City Government. Appleton. $2.25 net.
 Harris, Garrard. The Redemption of the Disabled. Appleton. $2.00 net.
 Kolbe, P. R. The Colleges in War Time and After. Appleton. $2.00.
 Stevenson, R. L. An Inland Voyage and Travels with a Donkey. Edited by James Cloyd Bowman. Allyn & Bacon.
 The Short Story. Introduction and Notes by W. P. Atkinson. Allyn & Bacon.
 Thurber, Samuel, Jr. Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice". The Academy Classics. Allyn & Bacon.
 Watkins, D. E., and Williams, R. E. The Forum of Democracy. Allyn & Bacon.
 West, A. F. The War and Education. Princeton University Press. $1.00.
 Woodburn, J. A., and Moran, T. F. The Citizen and the Republic. Longmans, Green. $1.50.
 World War Issues and Ideals. Edited by M. E. Speare and W. B. Norris. Ginn. $1.40.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 3

New York, Saturday, May 31, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	47
Editorial Articles:
Protests, German and Other	50
Free Discussion in the Schools	51
Court-Martial Reform	52
Homer on an S. P.	53
Omsk and Washington. By Jerome Landfield	54
An Executive Budget. By John T. Pratt	55
Walt Whitman. By O. W. Firkins	56
Correspondence	58
Book Reviews:
Self-Determination and Sovereignty. By W. W. Willoughby	59
"The Latest Conrad." By H. W. Boynton	61
From Ripe Experience	62
Who's Who in English Politics	63
The Run of the Shelves	64
Plain "Mr." By Archibald MacMechan	65
French Art at the Fogg Museum	66
The Phillips Collection	66

Copyright, 1919, by The National Weekly Corporation.

SENATOR BORAH demands that the League of Nations be made a party issue. As he states it, the demand is a perfectly honest one. It has no taint of mere manoeuvring for party advantage. But whether the demand is a sound one is an entirely different question. Mr. Borah scores a point when he declares that whatever be the case as to the Republicans, the Democrats—despite a few special exceptions—are taking their stand for the League as a party and not merely as individuals. But there is no resemblance between the two cases. The Democratic party naturally follows its leader, who is the head of the Government and whose whole policy it would have to repudiate if it did not stand by him on this issue. Among the Republican leaders, on the other hand, every shade of opinion on the League is represented, from enthusiastic approval to absolute condemnation. Obviously, the party can not rightly take a stand against the League until its merits have been thoroughly threshed out. When that process has been completed, Senator Borah's demand that opposition to the League be made a party principle may conceivably be justified. To take that stand at the present moment would be wrong, for it would be a rash and hasty decision on a question of the highest possible moment; and it would be as impolitic as it would be wrong, for it would be interpreted by the country as an alignment dictated not by deliberate conviction, but by the mere desire to oppose the course for which the President and his party are responsible.

IT is a dark picture of Europe which Mr. Vanderlip draws on his return from an extensive tour of several months, every moment of which, we may be sure, was energetically utilized. One shrinks from accepting the picture even from such a source, so far does it go beyond our familiar thoughts on the subject, grave as these have been. Mr. Vanderlip lays stress not on the black ruin of the devastated regions, but on the disorganization of industry everywhere. This disorganization we have none of us been unaware of; it was an inevitable outcome of the war. What is brought out by Mr. Vanderlip—and we venture to hope that his view is somewhat beyond the reality—is the tremendous difficulties that intervene between the disorganization and its possible cure. Be that as it may, his recommendation as to the part which it is at once the duty and the privilege of our own country to play in the situation is put none too strongly, and we trust will be effectively heeded. The one instrumentality by which the process of recovery for diseased Europe can be promoted upon a scale somewhat commensurate with the need is the supply of credit for the resumption of business enterprise. Humanity and self-interest alike demand that we do our utmost in this direction. If the great financial leaders of the country place themselves singlemindedly in the position outlined by Mr. Vanderlip, they have it in their power to influence not only the policies, but—what is even more important—the spirit behind the policies, of American business and the American Government. And our country may once more supply, out of its unparalleled resources, what is necessary to save the world from imminent peril.

IN a dispatch by Karl H. von Wiegand, the staff correspondent of the Sun at Berlin, we read:

The report that new documentary evidence has been found in Vienna, throwing a more favorable light on the action of Beth-mann-Hollweg and Von Jagow with respect to Austria's ultimatum to Serbia, proves to have been without foundation.

If anybody is surprised at this intelligence the nature of his mental constitution would be an interesting subject for study. All the evidence, documentary and other, necessary for conclusive judgment on this subject was in hand in August, 1914. There are some questions in which a minute study of details is essential to the formation of a just conclusion; there are others upon which the essential elements, accessible and known from the beginning, present a case that justifies a feeling of moral certainty. Never was there a clearer instance of this than was furnished by the character of the Austrian ultimatum and the subsequent passages between the European governments which culminated in the great war and were set forth in the first British White Book. Skepticism in the face of this evidence was not the mark of a scrupulous but of a weak mind. No other explanation than the deliberate desire of Germany to bring on the war was possible in August, 1914, and if the passage of time may be said to have confirmed the conclusion it is only in the sense that nothing has happened to disturb it. Additional evidence may have been a satisfaction to get, but has been really superfluous. In America, in particular, nobody whose opinion is worth counting has at any time been neutral in thought as to the immediate responsibility for the war, whatever differences there may have been in regard to the remoter causes.

AN oddity of the peace negotiations is the suggestion to set up the Sick Man of the East at Constantinople as chief of Islam. Details are lacking. Apparently the Sultan is to exercise spiritual jurisdiction at Stamboul as the Pope does at Rome. The plan comes from England as a concession to Moslem feeling in India. We can hardly believe the proposal will be seriously entertained at Versailles. It is of the essence of the peace settlement that Islam, whether as power or religious idea, belongs, and properly has belonged always, not in Europe but in Asia. To yield to sentimentality at Constantinople as it yielded to power at Kiaochow would be sad evidence of moral staleness at Versailles. But we probably have to do with a vagary of the discussion exaggerated by journalists too long starved of sensations.

THE President has been blamed in some quarters as evading responsibility concerning the enforcement of the provisions of the war-time prohibition act which take effect July first. In the elegant language of the day, he is accused of "passing the buck." There is no justice whatever in the charge, for the act provides that prohibition shall be effective from July 1, 1919, "until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States." No one can pretend that the "termination of demobilization" has taken place, and a proclamation of the President to that effect would be the proclamation of a falsehood. It is not the President but Congress that is lacking in courage, and how notoriously Congress has failed to display that quality in all its dealings with the prohibition question is too generally understood to require any comment. In view of the impending régime of national prohibition under the Eighteenth Amendment, interest in the whole matter is of a secondary character; yet if Congress wished to be honest it would recognize that whatever justification for its alleged purpose there may have been in the war-time prohibition act when it was passed exists no longer, and would act accordingly.

THERE is one and only one way to relieve the housing situation in New York, and that is by increasing the supply of housing. So long as there is a shortage, no attempt to reduce rents can be effective on a large scale. If there are people ready and anxious to get accommodations at a given price, landlords as a rule will get that price. Moreover, in so far as any prohibition of "profiteering" might actually be effective, it would tend to remove such stimulus as does exist for new building. In spite of high rents the cost of new construction makes the outlook for profit precarious, and it is for this reason that more building does not take place. There is, however, one direction in which relief is practicable, and in that direction a hopeful beginning has been made. If a sufficient amount of capital is offered for the purpose by persons actuated chiefly by public spirit and ready to take small profit, or none if necessary, a great addition to the housing capacity of New York can be made. There is no assignable limit to what can be done in this way. An interesting development is the response of the City and Suburban Homes Company—whose dividends are limited to five per cent—to the plea of Governor Smith's reconstruction Commission for the prompt construction of homes. This company, which was founded by the late E. R. L. Gould, is starting a stock-selling campaign which ought to attract widespread attention. And there ought to be other enterprises of the same general nature. In these days of enormous contributions for public objects there is no reason why investments in such undertakings should not run high up into the millions.

IT was to be expected that the War should rectify some of our national traditions by correcting certain of our long-established major premises. For decades the name "England" has been a sort of political catchword or "symbol"; it has often been enough to damn a policy to whisper, with some degree of plausibility, the suggestion that "England" was behind it. School texts have in general taken their fall out of the British, and irresponsible talkers have been prating of wars and rumors of wars. But now the British are our allies and friends, and we are snuggling up to them in complacent amity. And now, at length, also the school texts begin to reflect our more dispassionate attitude. Mr. C. H. Ward has re-edited Burke's "Conciliation," with an introduction that lays stress upon the responsibility of the German king, George III, for many of the unpleasantnesses of the Revolutionary period that were formerly charged forthwith to "England." The author makes a very plausible case, backed by trustworthy authorities. Whether or not his positions may be accepted in toto, his treatment is refreshingly free from the old hackneyed charges, many of which historians have long known to be untrue. Naturally this new angle of approach is a product of its age, and we may very likely come to be as unjust to our late enemies as we have been to the British; but, at all events, the pendulum is at present, judged by Mr. Ward's performance, swinging nearer to the arc of truth than for many decades past.

IN the conduct of a war, governments make so many unavoidable big mistakes, that it almost seems as if the irritating little mistakes might be omitted by way of compensation. One of the worst of these irritating little mistakes is the present system of service chevrons in the army. As things now stand, every officer and enlisted man wears on his left sleeve a chevron for every six months of service since we entered the war. So far so good; but now comes the discrimination which has made all the trouble; for there are two kinds of chevrons—gold for overseas, and silver for home service. Right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable, the gold overseas chevron is regarded as an invariable badge of honor, while the silver home-service chevron has come to be looked upon as a more or less ignoble advertisement of the fact that a man was out of luck. This is very bad and very unfair. There were many thousands of officers and men in the United States eating their hearts out for a chance to get overseas, and there were many thousands in France in the Service of Supply, in Depot Divisions and in other non-combatant jobs: and the officers and men in those jobs were exposed to no greater hardship or danger than their brothers at home. Yet the man who held down a desk job in Paris or Tours, and lived on the war equivalent of the fat of the land, wears gold chevrons, while the man who fought influenza in a pest-rotten camp at home is forced further to advertise his ill-fortune by displaying the hated silver stripes. To make the fact of crossing the Atlantic—which was the safest place in Europe or America last summer—a basis of distinction, is quite silly and wholly artificial. There is no objection to making distinctions for different kinds of service, but such distinctions should be based on the character of service, and not on the place where the service was rendered. The whole scheme ought to be changed before the army is entirely mustered out. There should be one kind of service stripe for each six months of service, irrespective of where that service was rendered. There should be another kind of stripe for those who were in action; and a third kind for those who were wounded. Those were the only really different stages of a soldier's career; he served, or he served and fought, or he served and fought and was wounded. They are sound distinctions, and they are based not on geography but on the degree of danger to which a soldier was exposed.

IF ever two men deserved well of Fate, it is Hawker and Grieve; for once Fate recognizes the obligation before it is too late, and hands them back to an astonished and delighted world. By all the laws of aviation and of chance, these splendid fools were dead men ten days ago. The chances against their reaching Ireland were a hundred to one, and a thousand to one against their rescue if they failed to reach Ireland. But they seized the one chance in a thousand, cheated death, confounded the wise-aces, landed in England—and have spent the rest of their time dodging crowds and explaining that a Rolls-Royce engine will run though it is red hot. The mechanician rises superior to the hero; Hawker shows less human satisfaction at his escape than professional disgust at a drop of solder in a feed-pipe. He has proved an uncanny ability to harness luck to technique in a formidable combination that would make us chary of betting against him on his next venture, no matter how great the apparent odds. America, momentarily oblivious of her own transatlantic achievement, vies with England in doing honor to an Englishman and an Australian.

MOST of the news which one reads in the papers about airplanes has to do with accidents or sensational flights; flying has become so humdrum that air-men can break into print only through the catastrophe route or by attempting the hitherto impossible. With the dangerous side of air navigation so constantly emphasized, it comes as a surprise to learn how relatively safe ordinary every-day flying has been made. Airplane insurance is actually being written, and the experts tell us that in a year or so it will be as easy and as cheap to insure your plane as it now is to insure your car. The chief factor in this reduction of danger is the increased stability and airworthiness of the machines themselves. A few years ago about sixty per cent of the accidents were due to defects in workmanship, design or material; to-day that percentage has been cut down to three, and the personal equation—beginners' inexperience chiefly—accounts for the largest number of accidents. Flying will never be made fool-proof, any more than driving a racing car, navigating a vessel, or riding a steeplechase can be made safe; but the mechanical means of flying—the machines themselves—will gradually be made as dependable and fool-proof as any human contrivance can be that is designed to operate two or three miles up in the air.

WHEN the great machine known as the A. E. F. began to take stock a few days after the armistice, one of the first things they decided upon was the organization of a comprehensive programme of sport among the officers and enlisted personnel. "If the men can't fight any longer," said G. H. Q., "they must be allowed to work off their fighting edge in competitive sport." And forthwith began a series of elimination contests in every company and regiment—football, baseball, basketball, boxing, wrestling, golf, track-athletics, tennis—almost every known form of outdoor sport was instituted, culminating in a series of final tournaments and carnivals at Paris and Nice. G. H. Q. was right: the best way to keep an army out of mischief when there is no fighting to do, is to turn its surplus energies towards sport; and the same thing is true, though in lesser degree, of a country. Now that the big shindy is over, America, with healthy Anglo-Saxon instinct, returns to sport. Professional baseball in full swing again, college crews and nines on every river and diamond, and the cinder track again feeling the touch of the tight-gloved foot: country clubs with full memberships and waiting lists, grounds committees busy and happy—and the good old "Divots must be replaced" rule in full force just as before the war!

Apparently the only form of pre-war sport which has not got under way again is yacht-racing; and the reasons for this omission are just as commendable to the spirit of the country as are the reasons for the return to other sports—for some of the great yacht clubs have decided that big boat racing is too elaborate and too costly a game to inaugurate during the period of reconstruction. Yes, it is a healthy sign when a country turns instinctively to sport, for it indicates a people with steam enough to fight, and with sanity enough to let off that steam in peace time. We used to hear a good deal about the biological necessity of war—this was before the Treitschke-von Bernhardt school of thought was somewhat definitely discredited by Marshal Foch November 11th last—but there is an element of verity in the idea: war (in the military sense) is not necessary, but strife—competition—in some form or other, is essential to virile life. The success of the American as an individual, and of America as a nation, is based on the spirit of competition. When our T. B. M. relaxes and picks up his bag of clubs, he merely substitutes the physical competition of the game for the intellectual competition of his office—but he never loses the spiritual stimulus of competition. That is where he has it over his father, and that is where America of to-day has it over the America of a generation ago when sport was not universal.

THE new revenue act imposes a tax of ten per cent upon "sculpture, paintings, statuary, art porcelains, and bronzes" sold by any person other than the artist. Such tax is collected by the seller, who makes monthly reports of sales. At first blush nothing could be simpler than such a luxury tax. When it comes to actual application difficulties thicken, and we already have a considerable body of interpretative regulations. "Art porcelains," for example, seem easy of definition as "vitrified or semi-vitrified ware." On the other hand, "that which is commonly or commercially known as porcelain" (Art. 14) is rather matter of opinion than of fact. Let us suppose the dealer has on his shelves three jars each worth a thousand dollars. One is a vase from the Sèvres factory; that unquestionably is porcelain. The second is a piece of old Chinese stoneware. Is or isn't it semi-vitrified? is or isn't it "commonly and commercially known as porcelain"? Delicate questions. The third is a fine old piece of Italian majolica.

It plainly isn't porcelain but, technically, pottery. Unless it is "commonly and commercially" called porcelain, it escapes the tax. But hold, it may be sculpture. Article 11 tells us that whatever is "cut or carved by hand" out of any material for purposes of decoration is sculpture, especially "vases, flower jars or holders, jardinières, brackets, fountains, sundials," etc. Apparently the majolica jar, which certainly was hand-made, pays the tax for sculpture. Or is an object turned on the potter's wheel "cut or carved by hand"? We need more interpretation.

Under the act a painting is taxable but a drawing is not. That seems clear. But is the line really easy to draw? We have side by side a painting by Rembrandt and his brush sketch for it in sepia; both are very valuable. The painting is taxed. The drawing—Article 13 comes to the rescue—"the term drawings as used in this article shall include only pictures, images, likenesses, scenes, designs, or sketches produced by means of lines." Are those broad brush strokes in the Rembrandt sketch lines or masses? A ticklish matter to decide offhand. But the monthly report must be made under heavy penalties. On the other hand, a pastel seems to be unconditionally a drawing, hence free from tax. But is a drawing touched with pastel a pastel or not? These are not quibbles but serious problems for every dealer in works of art and naturally for every collector. We bring them forward to show the confusion that results from badly conceived tax laws. A crude desire to tax luxuries leads to a sort of impersonation of objects of art as enemies of the state. Art porcelain is as odious as a fancy waistcoat or what is commonly and commercially so called. Only trouble comes from such a conception of taxation. How much simpler and more decent the Italian plan of taxing the art dealer on his gross returns, leaving the subtler discriminations of his stock where they belong; with himself and his patrons.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

RODMAN GILDER,
Business Manager

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Protests, German and Other

THE reply of the allied and associated Powers to Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau's note protesting against the hardness of the peace terms is vigorous and effective. Some of the statements in that note are shown to be extravagant, and some illogical; and in regard to those which are correct in themselves it is sternly pointed out that if the things complained of are hard, they are no harder than in view of the facts they naturally must be. The logical fallacy that is exposed is that of confusing loss of territory with deprivation of the products derived from that territory. The note represented the population of Germany as threatened with something like starvation because of the transfer of large areas of wheat and potato land to Polish jurisdiction; but "there is nothing in the peace treaty," says the reply, "to prevent the continued production of those commodities in the areas in question, or their importation into Germany," and for a period of three years the treaty even provides that such importation shall be free of duty. A similar remark is made in regard to iron ore and zinc. The case of coal is somewhat different and more complicated. Here the German note exaggerates the hardship to be suffered by actual deprivation of coal-supplies from the transferred districts, in that it overlooks the practicability of greatly augmenting the supply from the non-transferred districts, which was rapidly increasing before the war; but apart from this the Germans are reminded that whatever hardship they may suffer in this regard is only the just and necessary consequence of the savagery with which they deliberately obliterated the entire coal-mining industry in Northern France. As for the four million tons of shipping of which the treaty demands the transfer, this is less than one-third of the tonnage of the world's merchant shipping criminally destroyed by the Germans during the war.

But the protest of von Brockdorff-Rantzau is mild in comparison with that made by those who had looked forward to a treaty which should usher in a new era of international good-will, and make war forever impossible through the sheer absence of causes of strife. That is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but there has never been any ground for expecting it. Granting that there is some basis for the claim that the terms embodied in the armistice have not been scrupulously fulfilled—that the Fourteen Points have in some respects suffered a strained interpretation, in others actual violation—the difference between what has been done and what would have been entirely justified under the armistice terms is of no vital consequence as regards the appeasement of Germany. Alsace-Lorraine and Poland had to be given up; and full reparation for injury to civilians and their property had to be provided. "Restitution, reparation and guarantees"—this has been, from the beginning, the demand of the nations against which Germany launched her war of frightfulness; and if this was to be provided, something like the terms now imposed upon her was bound to come. But anything even distantly approaching these terms would expose the treaty to just such damnation as it is now receiving at the hands of those who had hoped for a settlement that would leave Germany unburdened with a heavy load of responsibility for her unparalleled devastations. If reparation was to be real, it must be enormous; and its effective imposition could be accomplished only by a combination of large levies in kind and of a considerable measure of administrative control during the period covered by the payments, whether in kind or in money.

The protest of the idealists, it must be clearly understood, is different in essence, and not merely in degree, from those being issued by the representatives of the German government. Von Brockdorff-Rantzau complains of specific features which might conceivably be altered while leaving the general character of the settlement unaffected. The spokesmen of the idealists do indeed dwell on the harsher features of the settlement, but this is merely by way of emphasizing their profound and irremovable hostility to the character of the treaty as a whole. The New Republic in its issue for May 24 gives eloquent and voluminous expression to the idealists' protest. But it is clear that no modification of the terms of peace which would leave practical provision for reparation, restitution and guarantees would in any material degree lessen the intensity of that protest. "The treaty proposes the exploitation of the German people," says the New Republic, and "an international organization whose chief object it is to profit by the exploitation of a subject people can survive only through the exploitation and deception of its own workers." Let us pass by the grotesque exaggeration of the assertion that the exploitation of the German people is the "chief object of the international organization" which is being effected; the point we wish to enforce is that any conceivable softening of the terms which still held in view their avowed object of just and reasonable reparation would remain exposed to precisely the same condemnation. Any peace that measurably satisfied the peoples that have suffered devastation and agony at the hands of the Germans would be denounced as "defying the community of interest and the feeling of brotherhood which unites the socially alert workers of all the European peoples," as "a treaty of peace which renders peace impossible"—in a word, as being that sum of all villainies which the New Republic regards the pending treaty as embodying.

Of the sincerity of the New Republic in thus giving vent to its feelings there can be no possible doubt. Somewhat less clear is the question of the action which it would advise as an outcome of those feelings. Less clear, because although positive action is in one or two passages plainly recommended, the note of the whole is rather that of moral protest than of outright rejection. It appears to be with some degree of timidity that such rejection is proposed, since it is barely mentioned instead of being, as might naturally be expected, insisted upon. Yet we find one article closing with the words: "This above all others is the time and the occasion to repudiate the idea of peace at any price, to reject immediate peace at the price of permanent moral and economic warfare." It will be interesting to see whether our contemporary, in the course of the crucial weeks about to come, will squarely assume the responsibility of urging the country "to reject immediate peace." Whether it does so or not, the natural effect of its utterances will be to promote any effort that may be made in that direction. Its position clearly is that it would be far better for the world to smash the whole result of the six months' deliberations and negotiations at Paris than to have the war end with a peace which it regards as at once monstrously wicked and utterly incapable of enduring.

But we see no sign of any attempt to face the question of what would actually happen if the peace were rejected—what France would do, what Germany would do, what would take place in Russia, by what means any new settlement might possibly be effected, what would be the condition of all the peoples of the world while the attempt to remake the treaty was in process. That is the kind of thing which the idealists habitually shirk; that is the kind of thing to which they closed their eyes throughout the war when they were constantly clamoring for an exact statement of the terms upon which the Allies would make peace. They discussed every possible element of the issue except the one which was at the heart of the whole situation. Many things were doubtful; one thing was certain. It was certain that any discussion of the terms of peace which went into exact particulars would develop serious divergences between the various countries engaged in fighting Germany.

It was certain that these divergences would weaken the strength of the Allies; it was quite possible that that weakening would be fatal. Whether it resulted in any overt division between the Allies or not, it was sure vastly to augment the danger, which existed in every democratic country, of the weakening of morale by the encouragement of dissenting and discontented elements. In the meanwhile Germany, with its autocratic and militaristic organization, would have prosecuted the war with unimpaired efficiency. Men whose minds were centered not upon abstractions, but upon the consequences actually to be expected from any given line of action, saw that to attempt to do more than had already been done in the way of definition would be to invite not only the possibility but the probability of a military victory for Germany; but those who in season and out of season advocated such definition seem to have felt no obligation to take account of this obvious and overshadowing danger.

One and only one possible justification could be pleaded for the ignoring of that danger. If it was more desirable that Germany should win the war than that the Allies should win it without distinctly pinning themselves to the exact terms of peace, then, and only then, the objection to the clamor for definition would fall to the ground. It is needless to say that this justification was never pleaded. To charge the idealists with pro-Germanism would be a cheap accusation; we are far from wishing to make it. Their fault lay deeper. They were not pro-Germans; they did not wish Germany to win. But they were so lacking in intellectual responsibility that they never faced the question which to sound-minded men was the one question that transcended all others. Because they wished a certain thing to happen, and thought doubtless that all good men and women wished the same, they felt themselves justified in insisting that it should happen. What would come of that insistence if it were actually heeded, what effect it would have upon the course of the war, they either did not consider, or they considered it in the light of an utterly imaginary computation of the forces at work. Their mistake, while infinitely more respectable, and in degree incomparably smaller, was in kind the same as that which inspired the fatu-ous expedition of Henry Ford and the enthusiasts who with him tried to "get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas." The Ford escapade was from the beginning rendered innocuous by its manifest absurdity. The clamor for terms, because it was infinitely more rational, constituted throughout the war a serious danger. But it, too, was rendered innocuous by the verdict which practical common sense persistently passed upon it.

The present outcry against the settlement has for its background something which should serve as a warning of the danger of unthinking sentimentalism. A thousand times we were told, while the war was still in progress, that unless at its close the world would be found completely regenerated, the war would have been fought in vain. Not only must there no longer be jealousies or enmities between nations, but within the nations there must be a sudden idealization of all the conditions of life. To have said that we must strive for these things, to have resolved to strive earnestly for them, would have been harmless; but a falsehood is seldom harmless. The war was fought because it had to be fought, because the world was menaced by a thing of which the triumph would have been unendurable to freemen—destructive not of hopes of a millennium to come, but of what had been won for freedom and humanity in generations of progress. To make this fatal result impossible was the object of the war; if more could be accomplished by all means let more be accomplished, but this must be accomplished at all hazards. To a sense of triumph, of rejoicing over our rescue from unspeakable evil, over the vindication of right against wrong, the world is entitled as some solace for its stupendous sacrifices. That can not be if we fix our minds on objects which, besides being unattainable, were not in fact those that drove nation after nation into the struggle against the German peril. This in itself would be a serious loss; but it becomes a source of grave danger if, leaving the domain of sentimentality, it obtrudes itself into that of practical action. If the disappointment of visionary hopes is to be made an obstacle to the only peace attainable, the world will be paying a monstrous price for what might otherwise be dismissed as a harmless bit of emotional indulgence.

rule. Yet there are some points which, if they do not settle the question, may at least serve as guides in its settlement.

In the first place it should be clearly recognized that the question at issue—the discussion of controversial subjects in politics, economics, or morals in the public schools—whether by the pupils themselves or by the direct instruction of the teacher, is wholly different from two other questions with which it is apt to be confounded. The general right of free speech is not involved; for the question is not whether a person shall have the right to say what he thinks but whether the public school is the place for him to say it. And that special and highly important prerogative of the teacher to which the name of "academic freedom" has been attached, is likewise not involved; for the teacher in the public schools, unlike the university professor, is not appointed as a scholar having special authority in a particular domain, nor is he addressing students intensively pursuing studies in that domain. There are many reasons why the professor's freedom of teaching should be guarded with jealous care; and not the least important of those reasons is that unless this be done the very foundation of confidence in the judgments he expresses must be undermined. Of this relation between the teacher and the controversial themes that he may have to touch upon, or between the teacher and his hearers, there is no trace in the public school; and not even the most extreme advocates of unrestricted freedom in the schools profess any desire that the teacher should play the part which in a university professor is not only permissible but requisite.

What we have to deal with, then, is neither the maintenance of fundamental rights nor the upholding of high standards of teaching. The question is, what are the limits within which discussion in the public schools should be confined? That there are some limits almost everybody, we fancy, will admit. It is true that an official pamphlet of the Teachers' Union of New York announces that "modern psychology teaches that books in themselves can not be objectionable; . . . as the saying goes 'to the pure all is pure.'" Yet it is safe to say that some books could be named which no member of that Union would find it desirable to place in the hands of children—not even that interesting specimen of the modern teacher who in a printed pamphlet recommended for boys' reading a book of Dreiser's bearing as its sub-title "The Hidden Springs of Sex and Desire." But as soon as you grant that there are any limits at all, the question of what limits should be observed becomes a matter of good sense and responsible judgment. Is it wise to raise questions which can by no possibility be

Free Discussion in the Schools

THE relation of the public school system to the burning questions of the day has recently become an acute issue in New York and in Washington. As usual in all such cases, controversy rages not only over the principles involved but over almost every allegation of fact that has been made on either side. The determination of the exact facts must, for the present at least, be left to those whose duty it is to investigate them; and even as to principles no sober thinker can profess to be able to lay down any simple and comprehensive adequately treated, upon which the pupil has neither the knowledge, the experience, nor the maturity of mind to think with effect, and with which there is no reason to suppose that the teacher himself is especially qualified to deal? Into the general mass of what all are agreed is necessary to the intellectual equipment of the child is it desirable to inject a foreign substance too small in content to add anything valuable, and yet of such nature as to be capable of breeding a great deal of trouble? Surely to these questions sensible men can make but one answer.

That the subject whose intrusion has given rise to the clashes between teachers and school boards is of the character described is equally evident; and the same is true of subjects far less charged with the passions of the day than is that of Bolshevism or the Bolshevist régime in Russia. If it be regarded as incumbent on the schools to provide a children's forum for the debating of "the controversial questions which naturally arise" in classes in current events, then, to be sure, the merits of the Bolshevist theory and the facts of Bolshevist practice must unquestionably be brought up for discussion at this time; but so must the question of single tax or of free silver when that is in the limelight. But neither on Bolshevism, nor on free silver, nor on the single tax, can the pupil do any thinking of his own except in the most superficial way; and to demand of the teacher that he be both competent and neutral is to demand an impossibility. It is true that, without being neutral, he might be impartial in his exposition and his criticisms; but this, while not so utterly impossible as the requirement of neutrality, assumes the possession of qualities far beyond those to be expected in any large body of men or women. In exceptional instances a little good may come of the thing; but even then only a little, because, granting that the teacher is all that can be imagined, there remains the enormous discrepancy between the profound difficulties of the subject and the limited capacities of the child.

The wise course, the only sensible course, is to avoid all subjects of this kind—a kind which it is difficult, perhaps, to define but which it is necessary to recognize. A cowardly course, our radical friends will say; and it would be idle to quote, for them, so old-fashioned a maxim as that discretion is the better part of valor. If to be open-minded is the one aim of life, and the pursuit of that aim is the indefeasible demand of education from the earliest age, then they are right in throwing down all bars and taking all consequences. But apparently they, too, have a certain amount of discretion. For we have not observed that any of them demand for the children more than the barest modicum of their just dues. Surely if it is a natural right of the children to be put into a position to judge of the questions that are shaking the world, much more is necessary for the satisfaction of that right than the answering of a question or two which chance may bring before them. The mere assertion of the abstract rights of the children may be very interesting to our little groups of serious thinkers, but it does not do much for the children themselves. If our radical friends had the courage of their convictions they would insist that the children have a solid loaf of "new thought" instead of being put off with a few stray crumbs.

Court-Martial Reform

THERE is a sharp and perfectly honest difference of opinion in army circles as to the need of reforming the court-martial system. Col. Wigmore, with, we imagine, a strong majority of the regular officers, believes the code is good, but has been badly administered. Col. Ansell, with a considerable following among the reserve officers, believes the code is thoroughly bad and should be radically revised. In this view he has won the weighty support of Senator Chamberlain, who has sponsored a bill introducing the novelty that enlisted men may sit on court-martial boards. We have a modification of the jury system filtering into military laws. This bill, which is drawn by Col. Ansell, carries the weight of his indignation against gross miscarriages of justice. As head of the Army Clemency Board, he has seen remission, complete or partial, of nine-tenths of the sentences reviewed, in all nearly 3,000 cases. Sentences averaging seven years and six months of imprisonment have been reduced by the Clemency Board to an average of one year and eight months. Such facts speak their own story, and it is with the weight of complete knowledge of a shocking situation that the Ansell-Chamberlain bill comes before Congress.

The abuse of court-martial powers has been so glaring that there is danger of treating the situation hurriedly. It is really not quite easy to locate the fault. That it lies with the court-martial system itself is by no means to be taken for granted. Let us recall that the code of court martial was very carefully overhauled as recently as 1917. The revision retained the principles which had held for over a century, and which had generally worked for justice and discipline. It is worth noting, too, that the Navy Code is virtually identical with that of the Army, and it has worked admirably during the war. Nobody is reducing the Navy sentences by eighty per cent, and nobody is suggesting that the peccant "gob" ordinarily got less than justice from his officers sitting as court-martial. Again the action of the Army Clemency Board is not to be viewed mathematically. It doesn't follow because a deserter's sentence may be rightfully reduced to two years in time of peace that he was wrongfully sentenced to seven years in time of war. There have been grievous miscarriages of justice in the Army, but the case is not so black as it looks on the face of the records of the Clemency Board.

The fact seems to be that a good code was badly administered by anxious and inexperienced officers. For the humblest private the present code provides the amplest safeguards. But these depend on a commander who knows when a court-martial is necessary, and on a judge advocate and counsel who know the laws of evidence. Let us suppose that all the police justices and judges of the criminal courts in New York were suddenly replaced by laymen, while the lawyers were substituted by engineers and bank clerks. Suppose this improvised judicial organization had to cope with an epidemic of crime. What would happen? Precisely what happened in the Army. Thousands of ordinary police court cases would go to the criminal courts, defendants would be browbeaten, juries would be improperly charged, and the general confusion and excitement would express itself in maximum sentences. This is just about what happened in the Army.

A worried and inexperienced captain draws court-martial charges for insubordination, having duly consulted first his nerves and next his manual. The case is one that an experienced company commander would settle in the company. But the new officer has a dozen such cases in sight and fears his authority is crumbling. He has probably threatened the offender with court martial. To fail to sustain the captain is awkward. Meantime Private McCarthy, Einstein, or Brioschi fully expresses his opinion of his captain and of the court-martial code in the company street. New specifications are added to the old "In that Private X did," etc. What was at most a case for summary court martial with its strictly limited sentences—a police-court case—has become matter for the highest military court, a general court martial. The G. C. M. itself is run in a slovenly fashion by young officers who have been wrestling with the manual. A green judge advocate with well-meaning ignorance overbears and irritates the prisoner, who makes a deplorable impression on a nervous court. The case is clearly one of the gravest army offence, insubordination. Since it is war time the power of the G. C. M. is unlimited. Private X gets seven years at hard labor in military penitentiary with a prospective dishonorable discharge. This is about the picture that a discerning mind will draw of the actual happenings.

It is clear that about ten times too many General Courts Martial were ordered in the Army. Under normal conditions, an enlisted man rarely comes before this highest tribunal. Even of the most serious offences the great majority never get beyond special court martial, with sentences strictly limited. The great run of exceptional offences are normally handled by summary court martial, consisting of a single officer with powers approximating those of a police judge. Ordinary breaches of discipline should be settled within the company. A capable officer very rarely needs to have recourse to court martial of any sort. He knows how to handle even the worst men. Such knowledge can be got only through experience, and can not be got in a hurry. The lamentable working of the Army court-martial system was merely a feature of our general unpreparedness. Whoever was responsible for neglecting to put our military house in order in the early years of the great war is quite directly answerable for the court-martial mess.

The defect was not of methods but of men. The same code that worked miserably in the Army worked satisfactorily in the Navy. The Navy had a smaller percentage of raw officers, a greater initial advantage in the morale of the enlisted force, and an easier situation because it comprised no conscripts. Relatively few General Courts Martial were ordered, and their verdicts, by and large, will stand. With the same persons executing it, the proposed new code would work just as badly as the code of 1917. Indeed it would presumably work far worse. The delays interposed for the protection of the enlisted man would affect the exemplary swiftness of military punishment most disastrously, while not affording much real safeguard to the enlisted man. If he ultimately falls into the hands of an inexperienced counsel, of a judge advocate ignorant of his duties and limitations, and a court equally unacquainted with the code and with the common sense of Army discipline, then that private is in his own language "out of luck." It won't much help matters for him that he comes more gradually to his ill luck, and that he finally is judged by his peers.

An equally serious defect of the Chamberlain bill is that the idea of judgment by one's peers is wholly subversive of real military discipline. The relation of officer to private is, in the nature of the case, paternal; no really democratic relation between the two is conceivable. A good officer is a reëmbodiment of the patriarch of old,—commander, counselor, judge. No army morale is possible except in the confidence that the officer in or out of court martial means to do justice to the private and generally does it. To include privates on the boards of General Courts Martial would impair the authority of all officers and go far to undermine discipline.

We can only conclude that Col. Ansell, whose ability and good faith in this matter are beyond cavil, has never seen the present court-martial system in orderly execution by a proper personnel. His notion that the court-martial code can be made "fool proof" is more hopeful than convincing. Normally no officer who has not had years of personal command should be ordered to sit on a court martial. This is the prime essential, but it can't be written into any code. Chagrin at the unhappy working of the Army courts will be tempered for veteran officers by wonder and delight that the situation is no worse. What actually happened, we believe, would have happened under whatever system. The remedy is not new codes, but more experienced officers.

Homer on an S. P.

IT was evening mess on Scout Patrol I X. The captain and the junior watch officer were facing each other across an unsteady table, while Paul, the Greek mess-boy, balanced cautiously near the companion way. There was a broken sea running with dashes of November drizzle, as the little ship wallowed up and down her patrol station off Sandy Hook. The captain was rubicund, genial, and about fifty. Tropical fever had early taken his top hair. The newest ensign was of similar port and age. His top hair had yielded more gradually to studies in comparative literature. For forty years the captain had dealt with all manner of men and craft in all climes, and for nearly as long the ensign had dealt with books. It was one of those unusual and profitable associations which the "Trick Navy" furnished in abundance. By contrast with the nastiness outside, the talk had worked over to the smiling Mediterranean. The ensign had inquired as to the feasibility of amateur yachting in the Ionian and Aegean seas. "There was nothing to it," said the captain. "There were plenty of fine harbors, for example, Ithaca." "Where Ulysses lived," ventured the ensign. "Odysseus," corrected the captain.

Concerning Odysseus the captain had heard from a Greek foremasthand, at Ithaca, and particularly concerning his tragic death. "I always supposed that was uncertain," said the former delver in comparative literature. "It was this way," said the captain, "Odysseus was long wandering on the sea, when at last his son—('Telemachus,' prompted the ensign)—Yes, Telemachus began hunting for him through the Levant. At length Telemachus reached Egypt, where there was civil war in which he took sides. In a great battle he drew his bow against the bravest chief in the enemy ranks, who was clad in golden armor. The arrow pierced the golden armor from front to back, and when Telemachus raised the helmet he saw the face of his father." The mess boy's eyes brightened as the tale was told, and the ensign asked, "Paul, was it so Odysseus died?" Paul, in the captain's presence, was respectfully non-committal. There were other stories, he intimated. Had he heard anything like this? and the ensign told the familiar stern story of Dante and Tennyson—how Ulysses chafed at the dulness of Ithaca, set sail with his old shipmates for a marvellous mountain in the unknown south, and perished in the mad adventure. Yes, Paul had heard it at school.

He knew also of another hero named Achilléus. Encouraged by the captain, Paul took up the Homeric theme, in a mixture of excellent school English and New Yorkese: "Achilléus was very brave, but must die young, so his mother sent him to live with some 'goils' who were daughters of a king. Then the Greeks were going to fight Troy. They knew Achilléus was brave, and wanted him, so they sent a peddler, a very sly man, to find Achilléus among the goils. First the peddler he showed shirtwaists and ribbons in a box. The goils jumped at the box; but Achilléus, he paid no attention. Then the peddler opened another box. In it there was a gun, with ammunition. Achilléus he grabbed it. So they knew it was he and took him to Troy, where he was killed. The sly peddler was Odysseus."

It was time for the junior watch officer to take the bridge. As he slipped into his slicker, it occurred to him that his books were much more alive than he had supposed. The story of Odysseus' death which the captain had from a Greek foremasthand at Ithaca, was the same that Guido delle Colonne, judge of Messina, had picked up somewhere about the year 1280 and put into his famous History of the Destruction of Troy. Where Dante got the rival story of the mad dash for the South Pole, is uncertain. At least the splendid tale was alive, not as comparative literature, but among Greek schoolboys and volunteer mess attendants. Through the whole conference had run a thin but unmistakable strain of old Homer himself. As the junior watch officer hauled himself up the companion way to face two more hours of blinding drizzle and menacing fog horns, it cheered him to reflect that after all the classics are less dead than they are reputed to be.

Omsk and Washington

HAD there been a political seismograph in Washington, it would have recorded some noteworthy rumblings in Siberia the week before last; possibly they were recorded and filed for reference. In any case the public press has taken little notice of them.

On May 17, the Associated Press telegraphed that Mr. Ivan Sukin, Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, had requested Major-General Graves, the American commander in Siberia, not to send any troops further into the interior, and indicated that the object of the request was to avoid jeopardizing the existing friendly relations with America, which, in view of the American Government's undefined stand on Bolshevism, might otherwise be threatened.

In the words of Minister Sukin, "The attitude of the Washington Government is being used by certain political groups to create disorder among the Russian people and thus weaken the Government. Up to this time the results of such efforts have been confined to the Far East and constitute an entirely local situation, which, much as we deplore it, we can not help. We did not wish the contagion to spread nearer the seat of the Government and therefore made the request. It ought to be said once more that every Russian is concerning himself with the question of the attitude of Americans towards Bolshevism, and it is the democratic element of the people here that is opposed to the troops advancing further."

And then Minister Sukin added a somewhat cryptic remark to the effect that a certain government was seeking to convince the Russians that Great Britain and the United States were so under the influence of Bolshevism that the wisest course for the Omsk Government would be to ally itself with an imperialistic nation, "which stands rock-like against Bolshevism." He further declared that his Government was not influenced by this, in view of the continued assurances of sympathy and support from France and Great Britain.

It is quite possible that Minister Sukin was not quoted quite correctly, and the word "imperialistic," in the scarcely veiled reference to Japan, is evidently a misquotation or a mistranslation, but the purport of the announcement is unmistakable. Mr. Sukin is an able and clever man and does not use his words lightly. The correspondent states that the request was made in the most friendly terms, but the fact that such a request was made indicates the confidence which the Omsk Government feels in its own stability, and it also reflects the strong feeling of the mass of Russians who are behind it.

There is no doubt that the feeling against America among Russians has developed rapidly and that the traditional Russian-American friendship is gravely threatened. It is not a matter to be regarded carelessly, for its bearing both upon the mutual economic relations of the two countries and upon international relations generally can scarcely be overestimated. The first instinctive feeling is that Russia is a long way off and how Russians feel towards us matters little. The second reaction is that the Russians are to blame. But is this true? Is it not wise to hold up the mirror and see if the fault does not lie largely on our side?

We have had no Russian policy, or, if we have had one, no one has been able to discover it. Last summer we made a gesture as if to send to Russia an economic mission. Hosts of Americans sought to be appointed on it, but no one ever was. We wafted many kind words across to Russia. The treatment accorded to Russia was to be the acid test. Heaven save us from that test! We said that we "would stand by Russia," and we are still standing.

Finally we were shamed into action. The Czechoslovaks were carrying on one of the most gallant struggles of the war, fighting against our German enemies and resisting the treacherous attempt of the German-inspired and German-directed Bolsheviks to exterminate them, after they had been solemnly guaranteed safe transport across Siberia. Fifteen thousand had succeeded in reaching Vladivostok, but armed German and Hungarian prisoners-of-war held the line from Irkutsk to the Manchurian frontier, and the remaining forty thousand were cut off. Then we sent some nine thousand troops to Vladivostok to guard the rear of the Czechoslovaks! As if to shame our dilatory efforts, the Czechoslovaks, by their heroic efforts saved themselves.

But they did more than this. They gave the terrorized population of Siberia the opportunity to throw off the hated Bolshevik yoke and to make patriotic plans for the recovery and restoration of their country. The difficulties were enormous. Out of local provisional governments was evolved a central authority, which after many vicissitudes took the form of the present Omsk Government. For a time they held the line of the Volga against the German-led forces. A little timely aid, even of rifles, clothing, and medical supplies, would have saved the situation there, but we stood in the way. At least a million lives would have been spared and untold suffering averted. But instead of giving assistance where it was so much needed we let our enemies, Lenin and Trotsky, work their will on our loyal allies without interference.

Meanwhile, our American troops remained snugly in Vladivostok, and Russians, seeing that all the work and all the danger were reserved for the worn-out Czechoslovaks and a handful of British and French, were forced to the conclusion that our only object in sending troops was to guard the great stores at Vladivostok, in which we had a financial interest. Also, we seemed several times on the point of recognizing the Soviet Government, an attitude which hampered the efforts of the patriots at Omsk to bring order out of chaos. Had we definitely set out to harass Russia, we could not have pursued a more consistent course. To cap the climax the Prinkipo Conference was proposed, apparently at the suggestion of George D. Herron. This was an insult that no loyal Russian will soon forget or forgive.

When we finally sent troops to Vladivostok, it was only after protracted negotiations with the Japanese. To the onlooker, and especially to the Russian onlooker, it was very evident that we distrusted the Japanese and that, whether this distrust was justified or not, we played the diplomatic game in a way which could only injure the Russians without benefiting ourselves. As Japan was not interested in seeing a strong government set up in Siberia, at least not until she should have acquired economic control over the region east of Lake Baikal, she made use of her occupation of the railroad and of the bands of Semenov and Kalmykov to hamper the efforts of the government at Omsk. Still it struggled on, hoping against hope that the eyes of the Allies and America would be opened before the cause was lost.

In the meanwhile, one of the leading men of Russia, a powerful personality, had escaped from Bolshevik Russia by way of Baku and Persia. He was the bearer of a reasoned project from four great generals of Russia, true patriots, devoted to their native land. Foch, Clemenceau, Lloyd George, all approved the programme, subject to the acceptance of President Wilson. It was simple and practical, and did not involve the sending of a single soldier to Russia. But he was unable to see the President. So he went on to Siberia and let the authorities at Omsk know that they had nothing to expect from America, and that their only hope in their extremity was to make the best terms they could with Japan, and pay the price. We do not know what the price was, but no Russian begrudges it. Immediately the road was opened and supplies began to go through. Semenov and Kalmykov were called off, and Admiral Kolchak was free to undertake his western campaign, which has progressed so brilliantly.

But all this has resulted in an intense feeling of bitterness towards America. After having led the Russians to expect much, we abandoned them. They felt that as allies they were entitled to sympathy and assistance in their efforts to restore Russia, and they saw us flirting with the alien Bolsheviks, who were coöperating with the Germans in reducing their beloved country to ruin and chaos. To-day they have surmounted many of their greatest obstacles and their way lies clear before them. They feel their strength and they know that nothing can stop Russia from again becoming a great nation, perhaps the most powerful in Europe. They treasure up nothing against Japan, even though the bargain was a hard one, for Japan never professed any lofty altruistic sentiments towards them. But from America they expected much, and were sorely disappointed.

It is high time that we adopted a definite policy towards Russia, based upon the plain facts of the situation. We can not afford to lose the friendship of the Russian people, nor is it wise to leave them xenophobe, or in the hands of Germans. A start has been made by Senator King, who introduced a resolution calling for the recognition of the Omsk Government. If this is followed by a generous participation of American capital and brains in the tasks of Russian reconstruction, a participation mutually advantageous, we may be able to save intact the threatened bond of Russian-American friendship.

JEROME LANDFIELD

An Executive Budget

PEOPLE in this country are not generally aware of the confusion that results, on the one hand, from too much separation of executive and legislative functions under our Constitution, and, on the other hand, from too little recognition of this separation by Congress. For example, nearly every appropriation bill specifies to the last detail where and how the work shall be done, and the money expended; sites for new buildings, to take one instance, being selected by the dictates of some Congressman or Senator who has been able to bring political pressure to bear. The design and materials to be used, the number and salary of clerks and assistants are usually specified in the bill. In other words, the executive department, whose officers have studied the problem and who are responsible for making the necessary contracts and for seeing that the work is properly done, are so restricted by the terms of the appropriation bills that all initiative and incentive to save is deadened.

Retrenchment is possible by first ascertaining from accurate estimates the amount of the annual revenues and expenditures. The responsibility for obtaining such estimates rests solely on the officer exercising executive power—the President. But to raise and spend some three billion dollars a year should require a large amount of careful, precise calculation. The President personally can not attend to it. He must therefore delegate the work. This raises the first question for consideration—to whom shall he delegate the work of preparing annual, accurate estimates of the revenue and expenditures of the Government?

The bulk of our national expenditures goes to pay for the light, heat, repairs, clerical help, salaries and incidentals connected with administering the regular current business of the Government. These matters are purely administrative in nature, and have nothing in them that is inherently political. All the rest of our national expenditures, such as appropriations for maintaining the army, building of vessels for the navy, the maintenance of labor exchanges, or the purchase of wheat from the farmers, involve political issues. In the first instance, it is the function of the President, under the Constitution, to define the political policy involved in such expenditures. The task of incorporating such expenditures in the Budget, however, calls for no political affiliation. The President should, therefore, delegate the work of preparing the annual estimates, and all deficiency and supplementary estimates, to a permanent, non-partisan staff, or board, of able and courageous men.

Retrenchment is based first on knowledge of the facts: knowledge of the facts can come only through proper system; and the first step in such system is the creation by Congress of a Budget Staff, or board, to enable the President to fulfill his Constitutional obligations.

The next step in a scientific Budget System requires a changed conception of the functions of Congress in regard to financial matters, and the adoption of the necessary changes in its rules of procedure. Congress has no authority under the Constitution to exercise executive power. If the President presents a consolidated Budget of the financial operations for the next fiscal year, Congress should consider it as a whole. If properly prepared, every item of revenue and expenditure will have been carefully considered, and each inserted in relation to the document as a whole. For Congress properly to fulfill its functions as critic, it must ultimately consider the President's Budget as a whole. Whether the various committees first consider the portion of the Budget in which they are particularly interested, or whether the Budget be considered by one or two committees, in place of the fourteen now in the House and the fifteen in the Senate, is of little moment so long as the whole Budget is before Congress at the time revenue and appropriation bills are voted upon.

The practice in Congress of initiating appropriation bills, without reference to the plans and desires of the administration, is practically a usurpation of the executive power of the President. Congress must say Yea or Nay to what the administration has suggested in the Budget as the governmental policy; but no money bill should be introduced until after the Budget has been passed, and then only as a single and definite item. In no other way can the people know whether the responsibility for extravagance is chargeable to the President or to Congress.

What then are the functions of Congress in financial matters? They are, first, to determine the question whether Congress finds itself in agreement with the public policy expressed in the items contained in the Budget. Congress should then satisfy itself on the propriety and necessity of the details contained in the estimates. It should then weigh the reports of its committees on the Budget with the Budget itself, and after such deliberation pass the revenue and appropriation bills. If the Budget omits anything Congress considers necessary, the matter should be taken up with the proper executive department. If the President will not insert such an item in a supplementary Budget, Congress should vote on the question in the form of a single bill.

After the revenue and appropriation bills are passed, the third step in a Budget System, and one of the most important, is yet to be made. Congress must follow the expenditures of public money by the Administration. There are eleven committees on expenditures now in the House, one for each of the main departments. These committees, at present, do practically nothing, save in a case of open departmental scandal. They should either be consolidated, or the committees on accounts and on audit should be strengthened, so that Congress may have a comprehensive annual statement showing how the Administration has expended the money that has been granted.

Nothing less than these three steps in a complete Budget System can bring about retrenchment or economy in our national Government. Possibly the three steps will not be taken at one time. But some day, when there has been more reflection upon diminishing incomes and increasing taxes, Congress will adopt them and will thus instal sound financial methods.

JOHN T. PRATT

Walt Whitman

WALT Whitman, born in 1819, dying in 1892, might be said to have glided, almost sidled, through life but for two marked events that gave feature and color to his days. One of these was his service for twenty months as volunteer nurse in Washington during the last half of the Civil War. The other was the publication, in 1855, of "Leaves of Grass," to the horror of one class, the mirth of a second, and the rapture of a third—a book of which it may be summarily declared that neither horror, mirth, nor rapture is the clue to the unravelling of its perplexities. For the rest, Whitman's life was unbraced, but not unbridled, shifting rather than shiftless, always poor, somewhat idle, fearless yet pacific, slipshod but respectable, avid of contacts, but averse to ties, shelving responsibility, eschewing marriage. His cleanliness was Dutch; his soberness was Quaker-like.

In ethics, take him in the mass, he was—ordinary. He was not a very good man. He was not a bad man. He was kindly and unscrupulous. His vanity was restive and imperious, and he could stoop to meanness in its service. The pleasantest things in him, with a single exception, were not high. One very likable trait was an aptitude for quiet and effortless pleasure, a plant-like gift for the leisurely extraction of the syrups out of familiar and neighborly things, features of landscape, labors and sports, animals, and common men and women. He liked his kind as other men like dogs and horses. Their savor and nearness was refreshing to him. Affections of this sort are naturally comprehensive, and the comprehensive is the indiscriminate. Whitman stroked the race. He liked anybody, with stress on the "any" and stress on the "body." In his 508 pages of verse hardly a proper name occurs, except two or three of firmamental compass like Washington and Lincoln. Altogether the only best thing in him, and the only spiritual trait that he possessed, was an exalted moral courage answering to a high mental independence. In that particular he touched greatness.

Whitman's vogue among English notabilities, of which his American fame was partly the rebound, had roots in the expectations which Englishmen had formed of our country. They had been disappointed in America. They had looked to America for sensations, and America had responded with proprieties. This defeat of expectation arose, as I think, out of a rather foolish and needless confusion between America as land and America as people. To suppose that an old people in a new land would produce a literature moulded on its oceans and mountain-chains was about as sensible as to imagine that a pigeon which had moved into an empty hawk's nest would lay hawk's eggs. Rational or not, the expectation was there, and Whitman, rather perhaps as the pledge and symptom of its fulfillment than as the fulfillment itself, became the object of admiring interest to men like Dowden, Stevenson, and Symonds.

The poet in Whitman naturally first attracts us, and the first point of interest in the poetry is its extraordinary vehicle. After a recent and prolonged exposure to its seductions, I avow myself unsexed. To me it is a vehicle without springs. I admit its possession of runners, but runners are quite as prone to grate on sand as to glide on snow, and a tendency to run into sand impresses me as a main characteristic of the Whitman sledge. Here is a chance line, the first line my eye fell on in opening the book: "The real or fancied indifference of some man or woman I love." The reader can quote better lines, and so can I. I can quote good lines. "Deep in the forest, in the piney woods, turpentine and tar dropping from the incisions in the trees." The trouble is that we have no securities; we have none, because Whitman has none. I think his vehicle bears no comparison in grace or sensitiveness with the unrhymed verse of Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer or of Miss Hilda Doolittle, or with the polyphonic prose of Miss Amy Lowell's "Can Grande's Castle." No doubt he blazed a trail, but that trail has not yet led us to the Sierras or the Rockies.

I face with perfect tranquillity the many solecisms of Whitman; they are, so to speak, in the pact. Grammar in Whitman would have been meretricious. I find it harder to excuse the use of "trottoirs" for "sidewalks" or "libertad" for "liberty." I do not think a man who says "duds" for clothes should say "élèves" for "pupils." That is not in the pact. It is difficult to respect a man to whom the admiration of the people who consume these elegancies was valuable. But let us not hasten to condemn; Whitman can not be measured by particulars.

Was Whitman, finally, a poet? To this let me give at once the partial reply that his possession of what may be called the poetic throb is undeniable. He is a poet when he speaks of the "slumbering and liquid trees," of the "tender and growing Night," of a "gray, discouraged sky," of the "crooked, inviting fingers" of the sea, of "lilac blooming perennial, and drooping star in the west," of "words loosed to the eddies of the wind."

These phrases are unmistakably poetic. Are they the cry of untutored nature?

John Burroughs, for whom Whitman is superhuman, remarks that "in his poetry he seems as untouched by our modern sophistications and the over-refinements of modern culture as any of the Biblical writers." I open the text at random, and my eye is caught by the phrase, "far-swooping elbowed Earth." Now the authors of Genesis and Matthew do not talk about the "far-swooping elbowed Earth." That is a studious, even a studied, phrase. The famous and deservedly famous "I loaf and invite my Soul" is another example of this far-sought and adeptly found combination. The "barbaric yawp" is very fine, but the born yawper would never have defined himself with so imaginative and felicitous an exactness. So far as mere language goes, Whitman may blunder like a backwoodsman, but he succeeds like a virtuoso.

Whitman, being uncritical, could not tell his successes from his blunders, and as he has the diabolic gift of destroying the faculty of criticism in all who approach him, admirers and enemies alike, he is indiscriminately praised. The "vitreous pour of the full moon just tinged with blue" has been lauded to the empyrean, but I confess that to "vitreous pours" my mind is watertight. Even in his veritable sublimities he is slipshod, as in the moving line, "Cycles ferried my cradle, rowing and rowing like cheerful boatmen," where a ferryman, in his narrow and self-repeating course, is a most inapt symbol for the limitless scope and unbroken continuity of a cycle.

In my examples of poetical quality I have quoted only phrases. Speaking broadly, there is nothing else to quote. Poetry in Whitman is granular, not to say atomic. He was a carpenter by ancestry and intermittent practice, but I doubt if history can show another man of letters so destitute of joinery in the literary sense. He can not dramatize; he can hardly narrate. He can put the right touches in, but he can not keep the wrong touches out; he builds and unbuilds in the same breath. I shall be reminded of "My Captain," but "My Captain," which is so unlike Whitman's other poems that its beauty is almost an indictment of the rest, is rather picture than narrative, and is seamed with flaws forgivable only to its true tenderness and high solemnity. When we reach the word "object" in the last stanza, "From fearful trip, the victor ship, comes in with object won," the poem seems only just saved from the fate of its hero, that of downfall in victory. "Drum-Taps" consists of taps—mere taps.

This point for me is crucial. Whitman felt like a poet. But the mere deposition of feeling will not make poems. Poems are fabrics; the poet is a fashioner or maker. Verse is not the outcome of mere spontaneities any more than of mere restraints; it is the outcome of the equipoise between restraints and spontaneities. It is a mistake to suppose that delicate and refined effects, like invalids, require care, whereas bold and rough effects, like athletes, may be left to the exercise of their pleasure. Football men, in fact, are watched like invalids in the period of training; and bold and rough effects must be guarded by care and vigilance from the intrusion of alien and thwarting forces. Whitman could not sustain himself, maintain the pace, even in ruggedness or insolence.

One last remark may close this topic. Whitman loved words, gloated on them, fondled them in the very act of utterance. Nevertheless, he aspired to write, in some unfathomed way, not words, but objects. In genuine writing the object should walk into the reader's mind. The view has its kernel of truth, but Whitman hardly penetrated to the kernel. He sought to impart to words the robustness of things by delivering them like things in crates or panniers. Piles of words, he hoped, might produce the effect of piles of objects. I need hardly comment on the success of the undertaking.

Summing up results in the dictum that Whitman was poetic, but not a poet, I pass now to a brief survey of his message. His teachings may be presented under three heads: the equations, the optimisms, and the selfhoods. The equations run about as follows:

One man is as good as another. "In all people I see myself—none more, and not one a barley corn less."

Woman is as good as man.

The Now is as good as anything in the Future or the Past.

The lower forms of existence are as good as the higher forms. The grain of sand is as perfect as the egg of the wren.

The body is as good as the soul. "I have said that the Soul is not more than the body, and I have said that the body is not more than the Soul."

("Soul" capitalized, "body" not, in the affirmation of equality.)

One part of the body is as good as another. This belief has pungent sequels.

Man is as good as God. "Nothing, not God, is greater to one than one's self is."

The bad is as good as the good. I quote word for word: "What is called good is perfect, and what is called bad is just as perfect."

Satan is as good as God. This is incidental, but explicit. In "Chanting the Square Deific," Satan is added to the triune God of Christianity, making the Trinity quadrangular. The experiment of reforming the criminal by adding him to the police force is tried for the first time in orthodox theology.

After all this, why not rescind inequality from the bottom up, and proclaim difference to be imaginary? I feel that Whitman benefits mankind in these allegations no less and no more than King George V would benefit England if he raised all his subjects to the peerage. The point of view from which dicta of this sort are—let us not say demonstrable—but even imaginable is purely speculative. Are the bad and good alike? From the top of Everest or Cheops, possibly yes. At the base of Everest or Cheops, no. Did Whitman find one cook or one physician or one critic as good as another?

The optimisms are fewer than the equations, but even more important. I quote: "There is no imperfection in male or female, or in the earth, or in the present—and can be none in the future." Again: "Each moment, and whatever happens, thrills me with joy." Again: "Every inch of space is a miracle." He tells us that everything is foreseen and foreordained to good ends. He is secure of immortality. "No array of terms can say how much I am at peace about God and about death."

On this doctrine comment must be brief. Optimism is respectable in proportion to the extent of sorrow and evil for which it has found harborage and warrant in its estimate of man and life. To the reasoner the optimism of the blood is as worthless as the pessimism of the nerves. Neither the pessimism of seventy-five nor the optimism of seventeen proves much. I might value the laugh of a child as a fact, even as a symptom, but I should not respect it as a critique of the universe. Whitman's optimisms, which are mostly early, before he had learned as nurse and invalid the full poignancies of anguish, seem to me the prolongation or repercussion of the laugh of the child.

Last of all come the selfhoods. The self is divine, its impulses are holy, and the rankness of those impulses, being merely the excess and projection of its quality, is delightful like the rankness of the scent of tropical flowers. Roughness, fleshliness, turbulence, insolence, disdain—these are nothing but the sportiveness and agility of its virtue.

I can sum up the Credo of Whitman in a sentence—perfection with selfhood as its basis, and equality as the guarantor of its distribution through time, space, humanity, and the unfolding evolutionary types. His historical position may be put thus: Emerson gave us the optimisms and the self-reliances, with a part at least of the equations; only in Emerson they had the sky for a background: Whitman put earth for sky. The self in Emerson reverences and aspires; the self in Whitman embraces, enjoys, extols, its present actuality.

The success of this gospel, after its first hardships, was very great; it suited the time. The equations thrived in a democratic period; the optimisms sunned themselves in the removal of religious fears and the hope of evolutionary progress; the selfhoods came out to bask in the relaxing tension of the moral and the social law. Its appeal, especially in its support of instinct, was strongest to the most advanced and delicate minds; the apostle of the plain, untutored man recruited his following from the intellectual noblesse. There was reason in the paradox. Civilization, in one sense, is trestle-work, and, like trestle-work, is relatively fragile. In a self-conscious age the masters of arts and letters have often perhaps the feelings of a man hanging a picture on tiptoe on the uppermost step of a reeling step-ladder. A burly fellow, shaking the ladder derisively from the safety of his station on the floor, might be envied by a picture-hanger with a love of stability and a sense of humor.

Gravitation is finally master even of picture-hangers, and literature and philosophy and religion are largely subject to the primal instincts. But literature and philosophy and most of all religion are scant in the acknowledgment of this subjection, because they feel the power to be excessive and dangerous, and they will not increase the danger by adding homage to obedience. Hence the discomfort of suppression; hence the eagerness for avowal. After enforced silence, to say that we want what we want, or even to hear it said for us by a braver mouth becomes the most sensible of comforts. Whitman did not confute the argument for silence; he simply spoke. An age morally and mentally overtaken drew a long breath. That breath was Whitman. What does a good workman do who has drawn a long breath? He expels the air and resumes his labor.

Whitman stands for a mode of life. A man may serve a state of life or being in three ways. He may body it forth; that is, he may simply be it, like a child or a bird. He may draw it like an artist. He may uphold it like a teacher. The trouble with Whitman is that he has done no one of these things sharply. The art-method is excluded from the outset; there is practically no objective portraiture in Whitman. Exposition might have been timely. If Whitman could have re-appraised self and sex, giving them new places and higher ratings in the equipoise of a system which could be just and generous to rival values, the service to his time would have been large. But the words, "system" and "equipoise," in relation to Whitman, are diverting.

There remains the third and final option. Does Whitman personify, does he embody, the instincts he upholds? That very word, "upholds," is a partial answer to the question. Every child, every animal, is a truer incarnation of Whitmanism than Whitman himself, because it is less self-conscious. The conscious reliance on instinct is the reverse of instinctive. Egotism is artless, but not the cult of egotism. Part of Whitman's relation to the instincts may be summed up in the phrase that the instincts are his clients. He can not make a plea, but he holds a brief. The final outcome is the most curious and non-descript mixture of dictum and dithyramb, lyricism and dogmatism, proclamation and exclamation, manifesto and rhapsody. Either nature or wisdom might have served us. Nature is sound, if partial; wisdom is catholic, if austere. But between nature and wisdom, what camp, what halting-place? There is the plight, the infirmity, of Whitman; he is more than natural, and less than wise.

O. W. FIRKINS

Correspondence

"The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson"

To the EDITORS OF THE REVIEW:

Your admirable article, in the issue of May 24, on "The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson" leads me to say that further intensive study of the President's doctrines is, I think, desirable. The writer is inclined to think that some of his leading doctrines must encourage political disintegration. I pass the inviting inquiry as to whether his views on the relations of labor and capital do not tend to undermine the present social order and our whole industrial system. The points of Wilson's doctrine which I have in mind are briefly self-determinism and internationalism.

The right of peoples to self-determination, stated abstractly and without qualifications, is un-American and tends directly to the splitting up of existing political units, throughout the world. In the American Revolution, the doctrine that governments derived their just powers from consent of the governed, was limited by the circumstances of the time so as to mean that the British Parliament might not justly tax the Colonies, which were denied right of representation in the Parliament. Before and during the Civil War self-determination took the form in the State where Woodrow Wilson was born, and throughout the South, of States rights or State sovereignty. The victory of the North destroyed the dogma in America.

In Russia Lenin and Trotsky, probably at the instigation of Germany, adopted the doctrine in its broadest form with the result that Russia crumbled into fragments almost overnight. President Wilson, expressing definite sympathies with the Russian point of view, also adopted it, apparently for two reasons. He wanted, at first, to arrange a peace without victory, by encouraging Germany to look for peace without loss of territory, except Alsace and Lorraine, and to restrain the desires of the Allies for conquest. He also used the doctrine as a war weapon against Austria-Hungary, with such success that no sooner was the armistice signed than the country split up into fragments. Unhappily the disintegrating effect of self-determinism did not stop here. It spread to Korea, India, and Egypt, where it caused civil war, and to Ireland where it threatens war. Who can be sure that this fire has reached all combustible materials? What are the limits which can be set to this splitting-up process, and when will it stop?

If the President's advocacy of self-determinism tends to weaken existing political units, by encouraging particularist and separationist movements, his internationalism, as set forth in the League of Nations constitution, does the same thing in a different way. At first sight, Article X, with its political and territorial guarantees, appears likely to stabilize present arrangements, although at the expense of involving America in disputes all over the world. As a matter of fact, the Covenant appears to me to have a disintegrating and revolutionary effect. If American citizens in some foreign country should be subjected to political outrage, or American property be destroyed or confiscated, through the acts or omissions of a foreign government, our recourse would be an application to the council at Geneva. So, too, if we desired, after agreeing to a limitation of armament, to increase it, for the purpose even of maintaining domestic order, when a general strike threatened our security, or when Bolshevism, dangerously organized, appeared in America, our only recourse would be an appeal to the league council. In either of these cases, we should be obliged to secure a unanimous vote in order to have our petition granted. Now, it is not inconceivable that at least one vote might be cast against us. Japan or Italy might for the time being be cherishing a grievance against us. Brazil might feel a dread of our advance towards the south, if the dispute were with Mexico, or some Central or South American country. But an even greater danger would be the pressure which the British Labor Party, the French or Italian Socialists, acting upon the suggestion of American I. W. W., might bring to bear upon the governments of their respective countries to oppose the increase of our army for the preservation of domestic order. The League Covenant, therefore, places a powerful instrument in the hands of European Bolsheviks and Socialists, to interfere in our internal affairs and weaken the authority of our national Government. It also gives the power of blackmail to any member state who might wish us ill, bringing discredit and inevitable loss of power and prestige upon a government which had voluntarily abdicated some of its powers for the protection of the life and property of its citizens in foreign countries.

Thus President Wilson's self-determinism and internationalism are both directed towards the weakening of our Government. That this is not unjust is shown by his recent speech in Paris, where he said that in a sense national law is played out. National law is national authority, nothing more and nothing less. To say that national authority is in a sense played out, and that the relations between states will be of more importance in the future than internal national development is a clear proclamation in favor of weakening our national Government. If this be true, a tolerant attitude towards the League of Nations, in its present form, is inconsistent with the policy which declares war on Bolshevism.

AUGUSTUS LYNCH MASON

Indianapolis, Ind., May 24

If Prohibition, Why Not Socialism?

To the EDITORS OF THE REVIEW:

Men are coming to forbid themselves all use of the foremost bodily intoxicant, alcohol. The wine that maketh glad the heart of man seems a beneficent invention; but its use proves fearfully maleficent to the many. Let us have done with it, say the Prohibitionists. Much hardship ensues. Can men well support the wear and tear of life without this ancient means of easing it? The question is not asked by the Teetotalers, men in the Frankenstein mood. Finally hopeless of controlling the invention Drink, they are resolved to destroy it.

For millennia many of the best minds have doubted man's ability to control a greater invention, the universal mental intoxicant wealth. The institution of private property seems beneficent; but its use proves fearfully maleficent to the many. Let us have done with it, say the Socialists. Much hardship would ensue. Can Production be active and well-ordered without it? The new Teetotalers do not ask the question. Finally hopeless of controlling the money power, they are resolved to destroy it. De-lendae sunt divitiae.

Will the Have-nots, the economic Dregs, win against the Haves, the economic Wets? Their victory would accomplish the most far-reaching overturn in human conditions since civilization began. Chaos would come, say all the wise. But if Chaos is not to come, a New Order must.

Socialism is the arbitration of Exchange. For the immemorial duel of buyer and seller, it substitutes decision by the public as referee. The common voice is to determine what every man is to get by his industry and what he is to give for what he gets. Expropriation is to end Extortion. Exit the Trader; exit "buying for sheep and selling for deer." Enter the Government farm and mine and ship and factory and store.

But duelling and decision by a referee are not the only ways of settling disputes. Agreement between the parties is the third way and the best way, leaving all just men masters in their own concerns. Between Drunkenness and Abstinence stands Temperance. In time the world will learn how to use alcohol. So between Extortion and Expropriation stands Fair Dealing. Will the world in time learn how to use money?

A dream, say the Socialists, as the Teetotalers have said before them and won by saying it. Like the passion for alcohol, the love of money can not be mastered and must be starved to death.

Is this true? If true, the love of money assuredly will be starved to death. The new and greater Prohibition wins.

Neither is true. Abstinence and Expropriation are but rude remedies for Drunkenness and Extortion. The goals of civilization are Temperance and Fair Dealing. Like Teetotalism, Socialism is a counsel of despair. But the New Order will be built on hope.

BENJAMIN IVES GILMAN

Boston, Mass., May 23

The Danger of Present-Day Radicalism

To the EDITORS OF THE REVIEW:

How gladly I subscribe! Especially in the last six months, I have become very apprehensive. The colleges and even the high schools have in their teaching force, men and women who, with the highest ideals, are undermining the foundations of this Government. Indiana University allows the Bolshevik New York Nation to be used as a textbook in some English classes. I have no doubt its dangerous doctrines are couched in its usual excellent English but what can a university be thinking of to permit such insidious propaganda among its younger college students?

MRS. LUCIUS B. SWIFT

Indianapolis, Ind., May 23

Book Reviews

Self-Determination and Sovereignty

AUTHORITY IN THE MODERN STATE. By Harold J. Laski. New Haven: Yale University Press.

THE NEW STATE: GROUP ORGANIZATION THE SOLUTION OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT. By M. P. Follett. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

THE fountains of the social and political deep have been stirred by the Great War. Everywhere the foundations of authority, industrial as well as political, are questioned. In the international field the right of self-determination is proclaimed as the complement of the doctrine of the consent of the governed in the constitutional field. In the domain of labor the workmen are asserting an inherent and natural right themselves to control, not only the distribution of their products, but the manner in which and the persons by whom industrial establishments are to be operated. This last demand, which is more loudly voiced in Europe and Great Britain than it is in America, marks a definite break with the older schools of socialism, which have contented themselves with the ideal of a régime under which the instruments of production should be owned and operated and their products distributed by a democratically controlled state.

In itself, this questioning of existing industrial and political institutions and methods can not reasonably be objected to. If, as at present operated, they effect a just and efficient distribution of economic and political power, only good can result from having the fact made clear. If they do not, it is all the more proper that this should be determined, in order that the needed reforms may be indicated and entered upon. Yet there is danger, when questions such as these become the subject of general discussion, that ignorance and prejudice will usurp the place of intelligent and unbiased judgment. It is most important that current social and political theorizing should be continually examined in order to determine whether false premises are assumed or essential distinctions disregarded. This furnishes the justification for the paragraphs which follow, in which it is sought to point out the respects in which false or confused reasoning is employed in dealing with the so-called "right of self-determination" and with the nature of political sovereignty.

Self-Determination. Here the error consists in the ascription of an absolute ethical character to a doctrine which contains a large ingredient of pure expediency or utilitarianism. It is asserted that if a given group of individuals can show that it possesses a distinct unity, especially if it can make good its claim to a racial or ethnic homogeneity, its members have an absolute right to determine what shall be their political relations to other groups—whether they shall set up for themselves an independent government or consent to remain under the sovereignty of another state, and, if so, upon what terms.

It is clear that this doctrine, if pushed to its logical limits, is destructive of all political authority. For, in itself, no greater sacredness can be claimed for nationality than can be claimed for any other physical or psychical factor that serves to bind individuals into distinct groups. If it is held that the doctrine of self-determination states an absolute ethical principle, the way is logically opened to any number of individuals, however small (who deem themselves united by a "consciousness of kind"), to assert the right to set up an independent political household. The fallacy is precisely the one that is committed when it is asserted that the doctrine of the consent of the governed implies that no person may be rightfully constrained by a political authority to which he has not given his individual consent.

The doctrine of the consent of the governed does, indeed, imply the absolute ethical principle that all governments should seek exclusively the welfare of the governed, and that only upon this ground can their existence be justified. It also implies the ethical principle that no person should be denied the enjoyment of either public or private rights upon arbitrary grounds. Further than this the doctrine does not go. These primary ethical conditions having been met, practical expediency then steps in. Exactly so should it be with reference to the right of self-determination as applied to groups of individuals.

Sovereignty. The distinction between legal and ethical right is so clear that there would seem to be no excuse for ignoring it. Equally clear is the difference between ascribing to a sovereign state a supreme and unlimited legal competence and the assertion that it has either the moral right or the actual power to do what it will. Ethical right, legal competence, and physical power have no necessary relation to one another. Legal right—or competence—may be, and often is, exercised in defiance of ethical right. Power may be possessed and employed without regard to law or justice. Ethical right may be present without power to give effect to the acts or ends which it dictates; and legal competence may exist although actual powers of coercion are absent.

It would, perhaps, not be worth while to point out these distinctions were it not that, at the present time, there seems to be an especial tendency to ignore them in argument, and, from the vantage ground of the confusion thus obtained, to deny that sovereignty is an essential legal attribute of the independent state.

It is necessary in discussing problems of public law to start with the premise that all positive law derives its legally binding force from some ultimate legislative source, from some supreme will whose commands the law expresses. This supreme will, or faculty of willing, is termed sovereignty, and is deemed to be possessed, not by the government, but by the state, that is, by the political entity or person that employs the organs of government for the expression and enforcement of its commands. As thus connoting legal supremacy or omnipotence, sovereignty has no relation to one form of government different from that which it has to another; it is as essential to the constitutional jurisprudence of the democratically organized and administered state as it is to the most autocratically governed community. Nor does the recognition of its existence have any bearing upon what commands the state shall issue or upon its actual power to enforce them when issued. Yet we find it asserted that it is the baneful idea of sovereignty which stands in the way of an effective League of Nations and which furnishes support for national selfishness and arrogance. In an equally ignorant manner we hear it declared that to concede sovereignty to the state is to lay the basis for a possible oppression of the people by their own governments.

As regards the first of these indictments, it is of course true that it would not be possible to bring into existence a truly sovereign world state so long as the states now existing were unwilling to part with their own several sovereignties. But there is nothing in the idea of sovereignty to prevent states from covenanting with one another in any way they see fit, or of each of them vesting the common exercise of the broadest kind of powers in organs of their joint creation.

Leaving the matter of sovereignty as a matter of juristic logic, we enter the field of practical politics when we come to consider the governmental machinery or organs through which the will of the state is to be formulated and executed. In all states of any considerable size, it is necessary to develop systems of local government under which more or less autonomous powers are vested in organs representing smaller component areas. In Federally organized States the constituent Commonwealths receive wide discretionary powers, legislative as well as administrative.

And, of course, in imperial systems such as that of the British Empire, the colonies and dependencies enjoy such freedom of political action that in practice the sentiment of allegiance serves as a stronger bond of union than does the formal recognition of the juristic sovereignty of the Empire.

In some quarters, however, there appears to be growing a demand for a division of functions in the modern state which is radically different from all this. The division of powers which is advocated does not rest on a territorial basis. It is purely, or, at least primarily, one of interests, and is applied especially in the field of industry. The laborers in the mines, factories, railways, etc., are regarded as a special class or as special classes which, it is argued, should, through their organizations rather than through the ordinary organs of government, determine the law and public policy governing their special interests. Guilds or unions are to be formed, and these federated into national organizations qualified to express the general will of the producers of the country, just as, through the ordinary or political organs of the government, the public, as consumers, expresses its will. Provision is thus made for two public wills in the same community, in much the same way in which it was for centuries attempted to keep distinct the interests of church and state.

As illustrating this type of thought, take the following statement from the preface to the last edition of a work which has found a wide sale since its first publication in 1913—G. D. H. Cole's "The World of Labor": "Increasingly the events of the war have led those who care for freedom, whether in the Trade Union movement or outside, to have a clearer understanding of the need for a division of the supreme power in Society. They have seen, with fear and mistrust, the overwhelming claims advanced on behalf of even a capitalist State in every sphere of life: and many of them are looking eagerly for some form of social organization capable of holding the State in check. This, under the conditions of modern industrial society, they can find only in the Trade Union movement."

In a manner considerably more subtle, and possibly more philosophical, writers like Duguit in France, Figgis in England, and Laski in America, are attacking the unity of the state, or at least of its sovereignty, by persistently refusing, upon the one hand, to distinguish between the ideas of actual power, legal authority, and ethical right; and, upon the other hand, by seizing upon the idea of the "real personality" of ecclesiastic and lay corporations or other groups of individuals to argue that these should, within the fields of their respective interests, have an authority equal to that enjoyed by the state. This doctrine of political pluralism, as it is called, is being applied especially to occupational groups, but if its premises are accepted, it can be applied equally to all other groups united by special interests. It sets up a principle of self-determination within the group cells of the body politic similar to the self-determination that it claimed in the international field for national units.

In the work of Miss Follett, we have the emphasis thrown upon social psychology, with a considerable admixture of ethics. The present state, she says, is now pretty well discredited. "We have outgrown our political system." "All thinking men are demanding a new State." "Pluralism is the most vital trend in political thought to-day." "The unified State is now discredited in many quarters." "To-day the individual is submerged, smothered, choked by the crowd fallacy, the herd theory." These quotations indicate how serious Miss Follett conceives the situation to be. The problem of popular government and of political liberty she states in terms similar to those of Rousseau: How to obtain a true general will which in no wise destroys or overcomes the wills of the individuals who yield obedience to it. This will, she says, can not be obtained when men reach an agreement by compromise, or by contract, or by waiving their own points of view. A unity of willing must be obtained in which differences are integrated, not annihilated or absorbed. The one essential and efficient means by which this unity—as distinguished from uniformity—may be obtained is through the activities of small neighborhood or possibly also occupational groups, in which true group wills can be found. Then, by the blending of such group wills, a true general will can be obtained. This result can not, Miss Follett declares, be obtained by giving representation to those groups in the national legislative body, for then it will be too late: "The ideas of the groups become too crystallized by the time their representatives get to Parliament, in fact they have often hardened into prejudices. Moreover, the representatives could not go against their constituencies, they would be pledged to specific measures. The different groups would come together each to try to prevail, not to go through the only genuine democratic process, that of trying to integrate their ideas and interests."

Miss Follett does not offer any definite plan as to the actual way in which the small neighborhood or occupational groups can be brought into relation with one another so as to produce the result she desires, any more than she explains how a group will is to be obtained which will not be a result of compromise or concession upon the part of its members.

There is not space to dwell further upon Miss Follett's views, but, despite the essential unity which is her ideal, it is plain that, practically, her book is one that, as the lawyers say, "sounds" in "pluralism," and, as such, its influence can not but be politically disruptive. Only disaster can result from any attempt to divide the supreme authority of the state—to distribute the exercise of its powers into functionally tight compartments. Not only from a logical or juristic standpoint, but, as a matter of practical politics, to divide sovereignty is to destroy it. If the laboring classes, or any other classes, of a community feel that their special interests do not receive due recognition and protection from the government as it exists, it is their right and obligation to use such influence as they are able to exert to change the form or personnel of that government. But to attempt to assume through their own organization functions that properly belong to the political organs, and to divide legislative authority with them, will bring disaster upon themselves as well as upon the rest of the community.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

"The Latest Conrad"

THE ARROW OF GOLD: A STORY BETWEEN TWO NOTES. By Joseph Conrad. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

For the ever-grateful and ever-hopeful reader of Conrad, this tale slips smoothly enough into place beside its immediate predecessors, "Victory" and "The Shadow Line." One would not have "missed" it for a good deal: the expected virtuosity is there, the stippled glamour, the famous atmosphere that can not be inhaled elsewhere at any price. Yet it is with a rueful as well as a lingering finger that one bestows it in its appointed place, with a sense, perhaps, that it is to be so disposed chiefly as another of the set, as "the latest Conrad." What do we lack? Is it that the virtuosity, more dazzling than ever, is now constrained to make us oblivious of a glamour slightly tarnished, an atmosphere from which, insensibly, the old salty magic has departed? Whatever "Conrads" glitter in the press, it is to "Nostromo" and "Lord Jim" and "The Nigger of the Narcissus" that we seem destined still to return for the authentic enchantment.

It has been a wistful enchantment, at best, that of a magician who above all feels himself alone, among fellow-beings who are alone, upon a little planet that whirls and teeters alone somewhere on the forgotten edge of time and eternity. He sees no certain help or sympathy from without, to establish a meaning for human life. "The ethical view of the universe," he has said, "involves us in so many cruel and absurd contradictions, where the last vestiges of faith, hope, charity, and even of reason itself, seem ready to perish, that I have come to suspect that the aim of creation can not be ethical at all. I would fondly believe that its object is purely spectacular." Something worth seeing, to be sure: "Those visions, delicious or poignant, are a moral end in themselves. . . . The unwearied self-forgetful attention to every phase of the living universe reflected in our consciousness may be our appointed task on earth—a task in which fate has perhaps engaged nothing of us except our conscience, gifted with a voice in order to bear true testimony to the visible wonder, the haunting terror, the infinite passion, and the illimitable serenity; to the supreme law and the abiding mystery of the sublime spectacle." As for human life the artist's task, he has said elsewhere, is to snatch up, with faith and tenderness, some phase or morsel of it, and "to hold up unquestionably, without choice and without fear, the rescued fragment before all eyes and in the light of a sincere mood." That the mood cultivated and imparted by this artist is sincere we can not doubt, but why pretend that it does not grow monotonous, as time goes on? For it is, after all, a single mood, and in the later novels it wants the backing of vivid insight and tense emotion which lay behind the visions of the younger Conrad.

There is a characteristic irony in the motto chosen for the present title-page: "Celui qui n'a connu que des hommes polis et raisonnables, ou ne connaît pas l'homme, ou ne le connaît qu'à demi." It is a story of surfaces "polis et raisonnables," under which primitive and all but ungovernable forces are at work, egotism, desire, ambition, jealousy—courage also, and devotion, and honesty of soul. It is the story, once again, of certain lonely beings whose paths meet, seem actually to merge for a time, and presently part forever, not on a note of tragic despair, but with musing recognition of the inevitability of both meeting and parting as not unuseful "fragments" of experience. Henry Allègre is isolated by his wealth and by his genius also; Mills by his reticence; Blunt by his "deliciously absurd" egotism; "Monsieur George" by his boyish sensitiveness: above all Doña Rita by her past and by her inborn quality of enchantress,—hers for good or ill and whether she will or no. The siren type has been greatly struggled with by modern novelists; Doña Rita is not a siren. At worst she is hapless sister to that Helen of Troy who would have had no traffic with ships or towers or men either if the gods had not so willed. She is a peasant girl whom at fourteen, the painter, Allègre, finds in his garden, instructs in books and love and a learned unfaith, and cynically leaves on earth as his unprotected heiress. She is known, by no means dishonorably, to the masculine half of the polite world, but she is not of that world. Don Carlos the Spanish pretender, recently intimate in Allègre's household, succeeds in taking possession of his bewildered heiress—for a time. But she is not a wanton, breaks from him when she finds no real bond of feeling between them—and thereafter extraordinarily devotes herself to the advancement of his cause, both as heiress and as enchantress.

So "Monsieur George" comes on the scene, a typical Conradian figure. He is a young English sea-captain, at a loose end in Marseilles. His fancy is readily caught by the legend of Doña Rita. For her sake rather more than out of sheer recklessness he becomes a gun-runner for the Carlists, to whose cause he is absolutely indifferent. Of his sea-exploits we hear as little as possible. We know what our Conrad might have made of them; but that is not his business here. Marseilles remains the scene of an action purely interhuman, from which at the end we have a glimpse of Monsieur George escaping to his ancient and somehow more homelike battleground of the sea. Meanwhile he and Doña Rita have had their unworldly and, to do them justice, unflinchingly episode of love. Common youth has drawn them together, a youth of the spirit and a singleness of mind and heart which they recognize in each other as a rare possession in a world of Blunts and Thereses. The smooth course of their idyll is broken as a result of Monsieur George's own gallantry; and Doña Rita is too wise, too generous, to let him try to resume and to prolong it. "She may find something in life," says Mills, that stalwart sage whose spirit seems to brood, Marlowe-like, over these pages: "She may! But it won't be love. She has sacrificed that chance to the integrity of your life—heroically." "She was supremely lovable," sighs Monsieur George, from his bed of convalescence.—"And elusive," adds the other. "Some of them are like that. She will never change. Amid all the shames and shadows of that life there will always lie the ray of her perfect honesty. I don't know about your honesty, but yours will be the easier lot. You will always have your . . . other love—your pig-headed enthusiast of the sea." . . . "Then let me go to it," cried the enthusiast. "Let me go to it." And go he does, as soon as he is strong enough "to feel the crushing weight of his loss (or his gain) fully." Years later, the arrow of gold, which she has left him as a token of their love, is lost in a storm at sea: "and he . . . thought that it was well."

Why do we sigh, with Monsieur George, as we lay aside this episode, so artfully conceived, so skilfully chronicled? Because it violates some stupid sense of fitness in us, some Victorian propriety or feeble and vulgar exaction of the "happy ending"? Or because it resists deposit in some handy pigeon-hole of "realism" or "romance." For neither reason, of necessity; rather because, with the best will and the nearest approach to belief, we cannot quite believe in the whole thing. We have, in the end, a sense of something marvelously contrived out of relatively flimsy materials. Monsieur George—are not his petulance and his stupidity a little ridiculous, when we let ourselves look at him? The Carolinian-Parisian Blunt, who "lives by his sword," and his belated butterfly mother who lives by her wits—do they really pull up this side of caricature? Therese, the secretly amatory religieuse—is not she quite recklessly overdrawn? And even Doña Rita herself, the woman who has in her "something of the women of all time," is she only an amazingly clever imaginary portrait, or do we really know her in herself and for good, like Beatrix Esmond or Di Vernon? For one reader at least, the story leaves an impression of elaborate and breathless approach to some infinitely meaning event that never quite—comes off.

H. W. BOYNTON

From Ripe Experience

ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES IN WAR TIME. By Viscount Bryce. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Lord Bryce almost defies analysis. His style is neither trenchant nor discursive, neither bare nor picturesque, and it displays no peculiarities of diction; yet such as it is, it makes him one of the most delightful writers of modern times, quite apart from what he may have to say. Nor is there anything exceptional in the views which he has expressed in a long lifetime on great variety of subjects; yet we never read him without feeling that he tells us precisely what we want to know. Things become real when he talks about them; they acquire a new or a quickened interest for us by the very fact of his talking about them; here, if anywhere, we have a note of authority. Lord Bryce's power obviously springs from his personality, which we easily perceive to be the product of high scholarship and ripe experience interpenetrated by a delicate sense of honor, an unaffected interest in the things pertaining to the common life of mankind, and a genuine zeal for the promotion of human aspirations. Above all, he has the rare faculty of expressing the mind of each of us at its best.

All this is attested by the essays and addresses comprising the volume now before us. These deal in each instance with subjects on which every intelligent mind has dwelt incessantly since 1914, yet we read them with as much relish as if the topics were new. They are likely to prove irresistible even to the war-weary who have sighed for a refuge where rumor of oppression and deceit might never again reach them. For however ephemeral a situation may be, or however repellent in its outward characteristics, Lord Bryce is certain to transmute it into a fit theme for philosophical reflection, and to portray it in a way to tranquilize rather than harass the mind.

The work before us contains three essays written in the first two years of the war to explain to neutral nations the aims, and justify the action, of Great Britain. They are followed by three addresses of a non-political character, treating of war in general, its causes and some of its phenomena, its social effects, its relations to human progress. The last two essays appear for the first time. One of them examines the history and the meaning of what is called the principle of nationality, and sets forth briefly the questions requiring the application of that principle which will arise when and after the peace treaty goes into effect. The last essay deals with the idea of a League of Nations.

In his first essay Lord Bryce considers the German contentions as voiced by General Bernhardt and Professor Treitschke, that war is in itself a good thing and that the State is above morality. No notion, he declares, is more palpably contradicted by history than that "culture"—literary, scientific and artistic—flourishes best in great military states, a cherished theory of the Bernhardt school. The decay of art and literature in the Roman world began just when Rome's military power had made that world one great and ordered state. The opposite view would be much nearer the truth, Lord Bryce thinks; though one must admit that no general theory regarding the relations of art and letters to governments and political conditions has ever yet been proved to be sound.

The world is already too uniform, says Lord Bryce, and is becoming more uniform every day. A few leading languages, a few forms of civilization, a few types of character, are spreading out from the seven or eight great states and extinguishing the weaker languages, forms and types. Although the great states are stronger and more populous, their peoples are not necessarily more gifted, and the extinction of the minor languages and types would be a misfortune for the world's future development.

It is only vulgar minds that mistake bigness for greatness, for greatness is of the soul, and not of the body. In the judgment which history will hereafter pass upon the forty centuries of recorded progress towards civilization that now lie behind us, what are the tests it will apply to determine the greatness of a people? Not population, not territory, not wealth, not military power. Rather will history ask: What examples of lofty character and unselfish devotion to honor and duty has a people given? What has it done to increase the volume of knowledge? What thoughts and ideals of permanent value and unexhausted fertility has it bequeathed to mankind? What works has it produced in poetry, music, and the other arts to be an unfailing source of enjoyment to posterity?

The smaller peoples need not fear the application of such tests. The world advances not, as the Bernhardt school supposed, only or even mainly by fighting. It advances mainly by thinking and by a process of reciprocal teaching and learning, by a continuous and unconscious co-operation of all its strongest and finest minds.

This is no more than any of us could have told himself, no more than many have probably told themselves hundreds of times already, yet, coming from Lord Bryce, the words have an inspiring quality which otherwise they would lack, for in him we have an exponent of the strongest and best minds, one who has himself measurably increased the volume of knowledge and bestowed upon mankind thoughts and ideals of permanent value and unexhausted fertility.

If we had not entertained this view of him before, it would have been forced upon us in reading the essay on "War and Human Progress," where he contrasts the two schools of philosophical thinkers or historians, the one holding to the power of Reason and of those higher and gentler altruistic emotions which Reason or Philosophy tends to evoke and foster, the other basing itself on the less rational elements in man—passion and those self-regarding impulses which attain their ends by physical violence. We can recall no treatise that is more sane, more finely discriminating, more completely filled with the consciousness of the dignity of human nature, more indicative, indeed, of a mind fortunate alike in its natural endowment and its acquired wealth.

The theory that the state is power, that might is right, rests on two main arguments. One is drawn from the realm of animated nature, the other from history. Both lines of argument are meant to show that all progress is achieved by strife. Among animals and plants it is natural selection and the struggle for life that have evolved the higher forms from the lower, destroying the weaker species and replacing them by the stronger. Among men it is the same process of unending conflict that has enabled the higher races and the more civilized states to overcome the lower and less advanced, either extinguishing them altogether or absorbing them and imposing upon such of them as remain the more perfect type of the conquerors. These two lines of argument may be called the biological and the historical.

It is the races that know how to think, not the far more numerous races that excel in fighting, that have led the world. Isolation retards progress while intercourse quickens it. The great creative epochs have been those in which one people of natural vigor received an intellectual impulse from the ideas of another, as happened when Greek culture began to penetrate Italy, and, thirteen centuries later, when the literature of the ancients began to work on the nations of the mediæval world. Such contact with the process of learning which follows from it, may happen in or through war, but it happens far oftener in peace; and it is in peace that men have the time and the taste to profit fully by it. A study of history will show, says Lord Bryce, that we may, with an easy conscience, dismiss the doctrine of Treitschke—that war is a health-giving tonic which Providence must be expected continually to offer to the human race for its own good.

We obtain a characteristic touch of Lord Bryce in his presidential address to the British Academy in 1915, and particularly in the following:

Sometimes one feels as if modern states were growing too huge for the men to whom their fortunes are committed. Mankind increases in volume, and in accumulated knowledge, and in a comprehension of the forces of nature; but the intellects of individual men do not grow. The power of grasping and judging in their entirety the far greater mass of facts to be dealt with, the far more abundant resources at command, the far vaster issues involving the weal or woe of masses of men—this power fails to follow. The disproportion between the individual ruling men with their personal prejudices and proclivities, their selfish interests and their vanities, and the immeasurable consequences which follow their individual volitions, becomes more striking and more tragic. As the stage expands, the figures shrink. There were some advantages in the small city-states of antiquity. A single city might decline or perish, but the nation remained; and another city blossomed forth to replace that which had withered away. But now enormous nations are concentrated under one government and its disasters affect the whole. A great modern state is like a gigantic vessel built without any water-tight compartments, which, if it be unskillfully steered, may perish when it strikes a single rock.

Such words as these are an excellent preparation for Lord Bryce's essay on "The Principle of Nationality and Its Applications," which, with the essay on "A Peace League," deals with the most vital questions now under discussion.

Who's Who in English Politics

UNCENSORED CELEBRITIES. By E. T. Raymond. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

THE events of the last four years have forced all Americans to take a new interest in foreign politics and foreign politicians. The nearest to us in speech and ideas are the English, and perhaps they are the most puzzling. Some map of the British political domain, some chart of the various party currents which rage about it is greatly to be desired. Unconsciously the needful guidance has been furnished by Mr. Raymond in his sheaf of biographical sketches. The thirty or more celebrities he censors are leaders in English politics. Most of the articles appeared in Everyman; but they well deserve collection and preservation. They are not hasty journalistic screeds, but deliberate biographical studies by one who knows. If he has distinctly Liberal leanings and never lets the Tory dogs get the best of it, the personal equation can be kept in mind by the reader and applied when necessary for the elimination of error. "Uncensored" is an ambiguous adjective in this title. It promises no concealment of blunders, faults, regrettable incidents; but, on the other hand, it withholds no judgment on the morals or conduct of the celebrities selected for exhibition. It does not mean "uncensored."

Biography is, of course, the most interesting department of literature; and English literature is particularly rich in biography. These clear, unsparing, ironic studies are no inconsiderable addition to it. How valuable would be such a series dealing with the political figures at the time of the Revolution—Burke and Pitt and Sheridan and also the Parliamentary go-betweens, intriguers, place-hunters, wire-pullers, pamphleteers! Even if delineated from the partisan's point of view, such a series would have great value. How it strikes a contemporary is always an important factor in estimating any historic figure. No burrowing in records can afterwards take its place. In Mr. Raymond's case, his judgments are brought home by a singularly concise and pointed style such as modern journalism demands. He who runs may read, and read with profit. The difficulty is to cease reading.

Illumination flashes from every page. Sir F. E. Smith is not known on this side of the Atlantic, but a single phrase does the office of a full-length portrait,—

"the slim, well-tailored, dandyish young man with the long pale face and arrogant lips." His resemblance to young Osric, the "water-fly" of "Hamlet," is worked out with cruel skill. It is no sympathetic hand which has etched the portrait, but the likeness is undeniable. Again, when we learn that Mr. Arthur Henderson, the Labor leader, was called "Uncle Arthur" by his fellow-trade Unionists, we feel we have picked up a clue to his character. A college joke shows how Lord Curzon was (and is) regarded; also how he regards himself.

My name is George Nathaniel Curzon:
I am a most superior purzon.

To learn that Mr. Walter Long comes of an ancient line of Wiltshire squires, that Sidney Webb is a "Cockney of the Cockneys, sharp as the London sparrow, and mentally as omnivorous," that Mr. McKenna's house, 36, Smith Square, "is so like him . . . solid, efficient, advantageously placed . . . irreproachably British, and a little forbidding in its aggressive freshness" seems to place each of them in a well-marked pigeon-hole.

Americans were puzzled over Lord Lansdowne's letter, as well they might be. The spectacle of a British nobleman trying to persuade his countrymen to abandon a resolved and honorable war for a most base and vile-concluded peace needed much explaining. Mr. Raymond's analysis of his character supplies the key. He is "the unmilitary aristocrat, who has little emotion and much interest, who is too big to take the vulgar view of martial glories, and possibly too little for the only passions that make war respectable. . . . He has every quality appertaining to the wise man except wisdom itself. His moderation is notable where courage is the only currency; he is bold where Danton would step with fear and trembling; outspoken where secrecy is imperative; secretive where a frank word might work wonders. He does everything the wise statesman might except at the right time and in the right place." Unwisdom based on class selfishness explains the Lansdowne letter, according to this critic. But England turned a deaf ear to the evil counsellor in her dark hour.

Even outsiders, like Hughes the Australian and Lord Beaverbrook, otherwise Max Aikin, are weighed in the journalistic scales and found more or less wanting. Sir Auckland Geddes, now President of McGill University, is dealt with faithfully, his career, his character, the disproportion between his talents and his renown. The list of literary vivisections, or perhaps they should be called experiments in vivo, begins with Lloyd George and ends with Mr. Samuel Gompers. The American Labor leader gets off more lightly than the English pilot who weathered the storm. One would think his grateful countrymen would set up for him a statue of pure gold. They seem more inclined to crucify him.

The Run of the Shelves

DEAN WEST'S four addresses in "The War and Education," published by the Princeton University Press, will be welcomed by all prepossessed against modern innovations in education. His sentiments are correct even where his ideas are least clear. At free elective systems, purely vocational training, commercialized science, literature sophisticated with cheap philosophizing, the stern old war-god shakes his head. He stands squarely against the Kaiser and with the French Minister of Public Instruction, whose address on "France and the Classics" is reprinted in the volume, in pure devotion to the traditional disciplinary humane studies. A frugal habit of saying good things several times makes it unlikely that even a careless reader will miss his most telling phrases directed against exclusively national or highly technical or merely interesting or loosely disjointed forms of education.

The world war has evolved out of French a curious sort of "pidgin" or jargon which, if not so well adapted as the pure French of Paris to courts and salons, appears to be immensely useful on the humbler levels of international communication. "Trezz bean" and "toot sweet" are merely among the more widely known of the many expressions that make up this lingua franca. Most marvellous testimony to its vitality, the French themselves, it is said, will on occasion resort to it. It may be many years before these sports of the world's great seed-time will entirely disappear from the linguistic garden. Few such seedlings are more choice than those contained in Kipling's "The Eyes of Asia," recently issued in book form by Doubleday, Page & Company, containing impressions of the war reported by some of England's Indian allies with the aid of the master interpreter of such things. A young trooper from the Punjab writes his mother that he is saluted in the morning with "Zuur mononfahn"; his chota-hazri, his early breakfast of coffee, is announced with the formula, "Wasi lakafeh." He is exhorted to rise and dress himself as follows: "Abil towah mononfahn," which, if the reader misses the first time, he can not fail to get by accenting the second syllable of "towáh." Finally, he is commended to sleep and the blessing of a strange god with with these words: "Dormeh beeahn mon fiz nubliah pahleh Bondihu." "Now this," says he, "is the French language, Mother."

Hard upon the publication of the "Life and Letters of Joel Chandler Harris" by his daughter-in-law, Julia Collier Harris, comes the stout volume by Dr. Wiggins.* Neither renders the other unnecessary; they complement each other by offering quite different things or the same things from quite a different angle. If we had to make literary preparation for the hypothetical desert island, we should probably choose Mrs. Harris's volume in preference to the one before us. Mrs. Harris has the advantage of possessing the letters and an intimate acquaintance with the singularly wholesome family life in the house in the north end of Atlanta, now become a place of affectionate pilgrimage. By these means she is able to build up a picture of "Uncle Remus" as he lived, to admit us to an acquaintance with him in regions from which he rather jealously excluded the world or, rather, which he deeply felt would be ill-lost in exchange for the uncertain glories of a literary life spent on the platform and at public banquets.

In comparison, Dr. Wiggins comes gleaning here and there. There is very little that is new to be found out about Harris and probably nothing that is important. Dr. Wiggins has not spared himself in the task, no doubt often a very pleasant one, of interviewing or corresponding with everyone who might be suspected of treasuring a personal recollection of the man, or, more usually, the boy. It is well enough that the record should be set down in its fullness, for there is scarcely a corner of the globe in which someone can not be found who would like to hear more about the literary creator of Bre'r Rabbit and his world. Whether beyond the line where local pride loses its glow there will be many who will care to go through the youthful literary efforts of Harris, reprints of which make up by far the bulk of Dr. Wiggins's volume, is a question. Harris would himself have vigorously answered it in the negative. He persisted to the end on regarding himself as a "cornfield" journalist and always expressed, and in large part felt, surprise at his growing fame and no little irritation against those who insisted on taking him more seriously than he took himself. But he could not of course remain insensitive to the pleasure he gave others, and if he could be assured concerning the present book, in the words of the children inscribed on his memorial tablet, that "You have made some of us happy," he would gratefully accept it, even though by its very existence it prevents his gracious and wholly American figure from hurrying back into the obscurity which, he thought, fitted him best.

Why should the certainly ingenious theories of Freud produce the dullest of books? Even in a doleful class of literature it is rare that such a dead level of commonplace and bad taste is reached as Albert Mordell maintains in "The Erotic Motive in Literature," which is published by Boni and Liveright. Mr. Mordell's contention is his master's, that life and literary creation are chiefly swayed by the "unconscious," which in turn is largely directed by erotic experiences during babyhood. This comes to saying that our course is determined before we can speak or think, which may be excellent psychoanalysis, but is poor common sense. To prove the case, all later experiences are regarded as symbolic of early sex impressions. If one dreams of flying, it isn't that he has read of the ocean races, but that in some dim past he "repressed" a passion in the infant class. This stuff, which rests on flimsiest hypotheses, is given as so much proven truth. From this point of view Mr. Mordell describes or surmises the erotic life of authors from Homer to Rudyard Kipling. At least half the interpretations are banal. It's easy going to prove that Shelley, Byron, and Ernest Dowson were sex ridden. It requires more imagination to perceive that Browning's "Last Ride" is saturated with sex, but riding is a universal erotic symbol, "How We Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix" is by the same token fraught with erotic implications; it is undeniably about riding. Mr. Mordell's style is as undistinguished, and occasionally as incorrect as his reasoning. His vocabulary lacks "shall's" and his mind certain discriminations that go with a correct use of the future tense. Psychoanalysis describes a certain type of erotic named the "voyeur," in plain English, the peeping Tom. A particularly odious type of "voyeur" is he who squints through keyholes and sees inside nasty things which are not there.

The reader who wishes to be clearly and cheerfully informed as to the present League of Nations and its historic antecedents can do no better than to possess himself of Dwight W. Morrow's "The Society of Free States," published by Harpers. It treats the various schemes for a society of nations from Grotius down. Especially valuable to the layman are the chapters on international organization before the war itself. These illustrate the business side of a League of Nations. The first draft of the Covenant is printed in full, with a perhaps too favorable commentary. In its temper and arrangement it is a model handbook.

*THE LIFE OF JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS. By Robert Lemuel Wiggins, Ph.D., Nashville, Tenn.: Publishing House Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

"Pictures of London by Celebrated Artists" and "Pictures of Paris," both issued by John Lane Company, bring us two thin albums attractively bound in gray cartridge boards with buckram back. Apparently we have to do with the familiar and popular special number of the Studio in a new guise. The cuts are mostly from prints, but drawings in monochrome and watercolors are also represented. The selection has been limited to contemporary artists, with England predominant. Doubtless copyright considerations have imposed further restrictions. Brangwyn, Plowman, Hornby, John Marin, Lepère, are some of the limners in the Paris volume and suggest its quality.

Plain "Mr."

LAST year when the fate of civilization hung in the balance, and it hardly seemed possible that the British Empire could last another twenty-four hours, the fierce egalitarians in the Parliament of Canada spent no little time, not in counselling of peace and war, but in debating whether any more titles of honor should be conferred on Canadians. That patriotic Roman who bought the field of Cannæ when the victorious Carthaginians were encamped upon it, showed not less faith in the future of his country than these impavid republicans of the new world. Titles and honors won by military prowess were exempted, but, in the eyes of these levelers, the acceptance of a title seemed a danger to the State. There was no discussion of the danger of buying votes, of bribing whole constituencies, or of patronage. Such real dangers to honest government were not even mentioned; but the whole fabric of the State seemed about to collapse because some jackdaws wanted to decorate themselves with peacock's feathers.

The newspapers, one and all, backed the Parliament. Among other things, the discussion revealed in the Able Editors a curious aristocratic intolerance for the plebeian origin of some of the Sir Knights. They poured most undemocratic contempt upon "the butchers and bakers and candlestick-makers" who had acquired handles to their names. Squire Raby himself could not have been more scornful of those who "had gone into trade" than these blue-blooded critics of the ex-tinsmiths and ex-carpenters who had become wealthy in business and been included in the honors list.

In Australia, in Great Britain itself, and, of course, in the United States there is the same outcry. And yet there was no outcry against a title far more offensive, upon analysis, than "Sir," and that is plain "Mr." Mister is nothing less than master. In "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the slave, who escapes to Canada by the Underground Railway, rejoices that never more will he have to call any man "master." American democracy emancipated itself long ago from the use of this servile term by adopting the Dutch word baas (boss), which means exactly the same thing. Moreover, the democrat insists on his right to this handle to his name. If, English fashion, the customer were to address his butcher or grocer as "Smith" or "Jones," instead of "Mr. Smith" or "Mr. Jones," the worthy tradesmen would be offended. It is "not done." In England the handle is dropped by the true democrat. In "The Witch of Edmonton," old Carter, a rich yeoman, expressly disclaims the title. Old Thorney says, intending a compliment, "You offer, Master Carter, like a gentleman; I can not find fault with it, 'tis so fair." But Carter will not sail under false colors. "No gentleman I, Master Thorney; spare the mastership, call me by my name, John Carter."

In unchanging England, the distinction still holds. When "Stalky" is emancipated from Westward Ho, he becomes "Mr. Corkoran"; and the soul of the naval cadets, according to "Bartimeus," are lifted up when, on their leaving the training ship, their old seaman attendant addresses them for the first time with some honorific title. On the other hand, a sturdy democrat like Peter Wright, the Labor Leader, who has been touring Canada, refuses to be mistered. Peter is "brother to a Prince and Fellow to a beggar, if he be found worthy."

If the world is to be "made safe," according to the well-known formula, it looks as if we could not stop short of the French sansculottes' logical "citizen" and "citizeness."

Along with the feudal, mediæval "Sir" and the servile, obsequious "Mr.," must go the entirely snobbish "Esq." And yet, considered historically, it should be less offensive to the sensitive democratic conscience than either of the other titles. Like the heroine of Bret Harte's poem, it is harmless enough in its way. When used lawfully, it merely asserts an historical fact, that the user's forebears had the right to bear arms, belonging to the caste scutarius armiger. It is used, of course, by those who have not a shadow of right to the distinction; and it is intentionally employed in the address of letters to flatter the good democratic recipients thereof.

Yet how inescapable is the dead hand of the past! Washington was distinctly scutarius; and his arms form the basis of the national flag. Every State in the Union, every province in the British Empire has its coat of arms, curious parodies, in many cases, of the sham science and "silly business" of the College of Heralds. Paradoxically enough, nowhere is the desire to connect one's self with the armiger caste more intense than in democratic America. This morning's mail brought the catalogue of a dealer in second-hand books. It consists of 131 closely printed pages, and is devoted almost entirely to second-hand works on genealogy. Here are two items:

1579 Page genealogy from 1257 to the present. With brief history and genealogy of the allied families Nash and Peck. By C. N. Page. Clo., 143 pp. Privately printed. Des Moines (1911) coat of arms in colors.

1580 Page descent. Line of descent from Nicholas Page of England to Charles L. Peirson of Boston. Coat of arms. Wrappers, 16 pp. Salem 1915.

This tendency in the leading republic of the world is like the Greeks' abstinence from beer, according to Calverley, "distinctly curious." Chesterton has discovered that the only trouble with democracy is that it is not democratic.

This clinging to the symbol of gentility was ridiculed by Shakespeare. Apparently his opinion of the English landed gentry was one of unmitigated contempt. Mr. Justice Shallow was admired by Cousin Slender because he was "a gentleman born . . . who writes himself armigero; in any bill, warrant, quittance, or obligation, armigero." Then follows the learned discussion on the dozen white louses that become the old coat well. And yet with true human inconsistency Shakespeare paid a thumping fee to the College of Heralds for a fire-new coat of arms backed by a lying legend of ancestral service in the field. Still, plain Mr. must be retained for foreign exchange, so to speak.

Our curious, awkward English anxiety to be polite at all costs, without knowing how, has led us into strange paths. In order to compliment a Frenchman, we refer to him as "Monsieur"; a German is "Herr"; a Spaniard, "Señor"; an Italian, "Signor." So far, so good. But when we wander off these beaten tracks and try to give the Hungarian, the Serbian, the Turk, the Swahili the correct national term of respectful address, we become unintelligible. If we refer to "Pan Jonescu," the reference may excite ridicule. What is to be done?

Once more the logical French have shown us the way out of our impasse. They reduce all foreigners to the Lowest Common measure, which = M. Let us drop our absurd "Monsieurs" and "Herrs," and "Señors" and call all foreigners plain "Mr." The title is sufficiently polite, and it has the merit of simplicity. If weight is needed for the argument, Sam Johnson's irrefutable argument for the English pronunciation of Latin supplies the analogy. "He who travels, if he speaks Latin, may soon learn the sounds which every native gives it, that he need make no provision before his journey; and if strangers visit us, it is their business to practise such conformity to our modes as they expect from us in their own countries."

ARCHIBALD MACMECHAN

French Art at the Fogg Museum

A Retrospective Loan Exhibition of French Art* was held in the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard University, from April 9th to 23d, as a testimonial to the devoted service of French officers at Harvard during the war. It was appropriately opened with an address by Captain André Morize of the French Army, a member of the original military mission from France to the University, and now serving there as Assistant Professor of French Literature. A collection of Mediæval, Renaissance, and Modern French art, mainly of superlative quality, it was most successful in illustrating something of the greatness of the civilization for which France, with her allies, has been fighting. From many other points of view also the exhibition proved to be unusually instructive.

Although it included examples dating from the ninth century to the present day, there was no attempt to make it completely representative of all phases of French art. The aim was rather to limit the examples to those of fine quality, of whatever period, and to make the exhibition sufficiently small so that everything could be studied in detail and remembered. Furniture was arranged with the sculpture and the paintings, to make an attractive room. There was almost no regard for chronological order. That works of so many different periods of French art could be placed side by side to make an harmonious ensemble may be accounted for partly by the common national spirit underlying the art of the different ages, and partly by the fundamental similarity of character embodied in all works of art of the best quality. Although presenting interesting contrasts from certain points of view, a small wooden figure from a thirteenth century choir stall seemed not out of place within a few feet of a group of Nymphs and Satyrs by Clodion; and in the juxtaposition of a Gothic stone statue of the Madonna and Child and a portrait of a lady and her daughter by Nattier, the similarity was even more striking than the superficial difference, for, after all, the late fourteenth century was the frivolous age of mediæval art, the mediæval eighteenth century.

*The lenders were Mr. J. P. Morgan, Mr. Grenville Winthrop, Mr. Harris Whittemore, Mr. Adolph Lewisohn, Mr. and Mrs. George Blumenthal, Major Robert S. Clark, President and Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, Mrs. John Simpson, Mrs. Alfred A. Pope, Mr. Michael Dreicer, Mr. Herbert Straus, Mr. Horatio G. Curtis, Messrs. Duveen Brothers, The Kleinberger Galleries, Mr. Durand-Ruel, Messrs. Gimpel and Wildenstein, the Malden Public Library, and the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. Many objects also were lent anonymously. In addition to the painting, sculpture, and furniture, drawings, engravings, illuminated manuscripts, and enamels were included in the exhibition.

This suggests that a museum in striving too intently for the obvious harmony to be obtained by an arrangement by periods may thus sacrifice much that is suggestive in contrast and comparison, which is one of the great delights of fine private collections. At any rate, in this exhibition, in addition to the works mentioned above, a fifteenth century tapestry, a portrait by David, a richly colored painting of a girl with a cat by Renoir, Manet's "Street Singer," a clock and two bathing figures in marble by Falconet, a landscape by Courbet, small portraits by Corneille de Lyon, a martyrdom by Simon Marmion, a landscape by Corot, a "Rehearsal of the Ballet" by Degas, and other varied examples of painting and sculpture all seemed, with a little judicious arrangement, in perfect keeping with one another and with the exquisitely carved tapestry chairs and the inlaid commodes and table made in the time of Louis XVI.

One striking lesson to be learned from the exhibition is the importance of scale, for which the French masters of all periods seem to display extraordinary genius. Almost every object included in the exhibition is well-nigh perfect from this point of view, each work perfectly consistent with regard to the degree of minuteness with which the details were treated. The Louis XVI chairs and settees are extraordinarily fine in this respect. A feeling of uniform measure is preserved over the whole surface. The carving of the gilded wood and the design of the tapestry, the tone of which is of the same value as the gold, harmonize perfectly in scale of touch. The same quality and scale is found in the groups by Clodion. In the wooden saint of the thirteenth century, an amazingly subtle bit of expression, the scale is somewhat larger and the treatment is more summary, but it is perfectly consistent. The same thing is true of the paintings. Courbet, starting with one idea of handling, does not falter, but is consistently bold and crisp throughout. Nattier is correspondingly delicate and minute, and consistently so, even the flat wall and the pilasters of the background as minutely finished as the laces. Renoir's individual handling is again entirely consistent. The gradation on the bare floor leading up to the long French windows, in the "Rehearsal of the Ballet," is in true scale with the handling of the details in the figures on the other side of the composition. None of it is so minutely finished as in the piece by Nattier. This is in striking contrast to the work of the "average artist" in this country at the present day, where one may find broad handling in one place, minute in another, soft outlines in one part, hard as tin in another, all in the same work.

Another striking feature of the exhibition was the way in which the works of the later nineteenth century masters, Courbet, Manet, Degas, Monet, and Renoir, the men whose productions were so violently decried and ridiculed in the sixties and seventies of the last century, although necessarily inferior in quality of surface, held their own, in the essential matters of color, design, and significance of expression, with the works of the earlier epochs. It may well make us pause to consider how, since the end of the eighteenth century, the art of genuine significance has had a hard struggle in gaining recognition except from a small circle of cultivated and discriminating people, many of whom, in modern days, have been too poor to give the artists any proper financial support by their patronage.

ARTHUR POPE

The Phillips Collection

AT the Century Club, of New York, is being shown the collection of the fine critic and amateur, Duncan Phillips. It is an exhibition delightful out of all proportion to its technical importance. In a group of some thirty modern paintings by French and American artists of our day one senses a common taste. The show has a rare sort of personality of its own, is a reflection of its creator. The approximations are very enlightening. To see a first-class Twachtman between a capital Monet and a rare Venetian subject of Boudin is to learn something. The Twachtman is the finest picture of the three, while the Ernest Lawson across the gallery again makes a really lovely Monet look unkempt and painty. In an Alden Weir, of a glacial oncrop of granite, we have again an extraordinarily appealing picture; we have the authority of Cézanne without his fumbling and nervousness. Again the emphasis and the focus of Post-Impressionists is surpassed by the little Ryder shore scene, by moonlight. Only the emphasis is not blatant and momentary, but thoughtful and permanent. Fanton-Latour, Paul Dougherty, Tack, George Luks, Childe Hassam are some of the other artists represented in a singularly rich and satisfying show.

The Review

THE REVIEW had its origin in a prospectus issued February 1, 1918, by Fabian Franklin and Harold de Wolf Fuller. In brief, the object was to establish a weekly journal of general culture, devoted to the preservation of American ideals and American principles of government; a journal that should be animated by a spirit of progress, should welcome and promote needed projects of social improvement, but should insist on the preservation of those fundamentals which must be preserved if the nation is to remain a people of self-reliant freemen.

The need of such a journal, while clear enough then, was not so manifest as it has since become; and it was not until March, 1919, that the capital requisite to the establishment of the journal was, by gradual increments, obtained. This was subscribed in moderate sums by more than one hundred persons in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cleveland, Chicago, and San Francisco.

The subscription-agreement which was circulated for the purpose of obtaining this capital provided for the formation of a stock company with a capital of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares of $100 each. The agreement contained the following clause guaranteeing the independence of the Editors:

"It is mutually understood and agreed that the journal is to be absolutely independent and that its conduct and policy are to be directed exclusively by its Editors."

The Company was incorporated in March, 1919, under the title "The National Weekly Corporation." The act of incorporation contains the following provision:

"In the conduct of the said journal and its editorial policies, the Editors shall not be responsible or accountable to the Corporation for any opinion, comment or criticism lawfully made or expressed by them."

The total number of stockholders is 126. No stockholder has more than 100 shares out of the total of 2,000; 12 hold 50 shares each; 4 between 25 and 50; 12 have 25 shares each; 6 between 10 and 25; the remaining stockholders have amounts ranging from 10 shares to one share.

TIFFANY & Co.

WEDDING INVITATIONS AND MARRIAGE ANNOUNCEMENTS

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

Books Received

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Angell, Norman. The British Revolution and the American Democracy. Huebsch. $1.50.

A Peace Congress of Intrigue. Compiled by F. Freksa. Translated by H. Hansen. Century. $2.50 net.

Archer, William. The Peace-President. Holt. $1.00 net.

Balch, Thomas Willing. A World Court in the Light of the United States Supreme Court. Philadelphia. Allen, Lane & Scott.

Barron, C. W. War Finance. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50 net.

Butler, Ralph. The New Eastern Europe. Longmans, Green. $3.50 net.

Carver T. N. Principles of Political Economy. Ginn. $1.96.

Duhamel, G. Civilization. Century. $1.50 net.

Erzberger, Mathias. The League of Nations. Holt. $2.25 net.

Ferrero, Guglielmo. Problems of Peace. Putnam. $1.50.

Follett, M. P. The New State. Longmans, Green. $3.00 net.

Gibbon, Thomas. Mexico Under Caranza. Doubleday, Page. $1.50.

Greenlaw, Edwin. Builders of Democracy. Scott, Foresman.

Halstead, W. R. The Tragedy of Labor. Abingdon Press. 50 cents.

Hobbs, W. H. The World War and Its Consequences. Putnam. $2.50 net.

Hobson, J. A. Richard Cobden, the International Man. Holt. $5.00 net.

Hollander, J. H. War Borrowing. Macmillan. $1.50.

Huntington, Ellsworth. World-Power and Evolution. Yale University Press. $2.50.

Laski, H. J. Authority in the Modern State. Yale University Press. $3.00.

Latane, J. H. From Isolation to Leadership. Second Edition. Doubleday, Page. $1.00.

Lawrence, T. J. The Society of Nations. Oxford University Press.

The Motor That Lasts

Has 30 Years' Experience Behind It!

Your Motors are too important a factor in present-day production to be selected haphazard. You want a motor that has back of it time-tested ruggedness and stamina. You also want a motor that will run uninterruptedly through the years with the minimum of replacements and repairs.

C-W Motors have over 30 successful years in back of them. During this time many makes of motors have been produced—and many have been forgotten. But C-W, the pioneer commercial motors—are making good to-day as they have been for over 30 years.

Wisdom points to the selection of C-W Motors because it is the proved equipment. It has stood the test of time.

The specialist in the nearest C-W branch office will gladly cooperate with you in the matter of your motor requirements.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 4

New York, Saturday, June 7, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment
Editorial Articles:
What Constitutional Means	72
Our Relations to Russia	73
Germany in Africa	74
Robert Bacon: A Reminiscence	75
Unrest and Distrust	75
"Fed Up with the French." By Major, A. E. F.	76
An Examination of the Covenant. By Edward S. Corwin	77
Correspondence	80
Book Reviews:
Illusions Concerning Alsace-Lorraine	82
Hose Play and a Rill. By H. W. Boynton	83
Contemporary Mexico	84
Quaker Politicians	85
The Run of the Shelves	86
Drama:
"John Ferguson" and "Hamlet." By O. W. Firkins	87
Manifesto of the Socialist-Revolutionaries	88

Copyright, 1919, by The National Weekly Corporation.

THE abortive bomb plot of May Day has been followed by one that has done some execution. It would be folly to ignore the necessity for the most energetic measures of protection against a danger so clearly proved to be serious. But it would equally be folly to imagine that the successful, or partly successful, planting of a few bombs is evidence of a powerful revolutionary movement. For stage effect nothing could be more impressive. But to bring about simultaneous explosions in a dozen cities is nowadays a feat that can be accomplished by a very small group of determined men. The melodramatic broadsides scattered alongside the bombs breathe all kinds of threatenings and slaughter, but they contain the interesting admission that "we are not many, perhaps more than you dream of though, but are all determined to fight to the last." There is no more reason to-day than there was yesterday to think that any formidable number of people in this country are bent upon revolution by violence. There is a vast amount of dangerous revolutionism, but it is not of that type. The bomb explosions may, however, rightfully be expected to do two things—intensify precautionary measures against actual outrage and awaken our parlor Bolsheviks to a sense of the responsibility they are shouldering in encouraging what they like no better than the rest of us. The thing itself, in its physical aspect, is incomparably less serious than what we have lived through more than once and have pretty completely forgotten. The railroad riots of 1877 and the doings connected with the Pullman strike in 1894 were very much more like war than anything we are now witnessing.

There are one or two expressions in the broadside which deserve the special attention of our sentimental idealists. The bombers fling down their challenge to the "lords of the autocratic republic." "The great war, waged to replenish your purses" is the way they speak of the struggle against German domination into which the country threw itself with a unanimity never equalled in any previous war. Whether our republic is "autocratic" or not may be a matter of opinion, but to say that the war was waged for the purpose of replenishing the purses of the rich is to say what is not only false but is the exact opposite of the truth. It is not true of any of the countries that entered the war against Germany; but in our own country the interest of the rich was so clearly in favor of keeping out of the war that any person making such an accusation writes himself down either a fool or a knave. Yet we have not observed, on the part of our standard organs of "idealism," any very strenuous effort to extirpate this monstrous slander or to use fitting language in characterizing persons like Scott Nearing, whose professional antecedents make the utterance of it peculiarly disgraceful. It does not seem to occur to some people that devotion to truth involves any obligation to stop the spread of falsehood when the falsehood is calculated to foment revolution.

SECESSION in the Rhineland at least illustrates the German mentality. As yet it has no more seriousness than that. The Rhine folk have small love for Prussia, which remains powerful if not predominant in the new Germany. They have equally little love for paying indemnities or enduring Spartacan tyranny. East of the Rhine everything looks pretty stormy; westward the political weather is reasonably steady. To wish to escape from possible anarchy in Germany and obtain protection from the Entente is a counsel of prudence. In case Germany should reject the peace terms, to declare herself independent would put the Rhineland in a favored position. There would be no blockade. Such considerations as these guide the independence party. They are natural enough, only it is odd to see them springing up in that theatre of sentimental Germanism, the old Rhine Valley. The separation of the Rhine provinces from Prussia would make the military situation easier for France. It would also further complicate a Central European situation which already looks about as brittle and variegated as a candy walking stick.

ARGUMENT on the League of Nations has not reached a high level. If we except the debate between President Lowell and Senator Lodge, it can hardly be said that the issue has yet been joined. In general, those for and those opposed to the League in its present form have not learned to talk the same language. So when the New York Evening Post, epitomizing the President's Memorial Day address, insists that an overwhelming American sentiment favors a plan "to crown and assure the work of our heroic dead; to make a just peace that shall be lasting; to take a bond of fate against the occurrence of another ruinous war," it says what no one will deny. This is not argument, it is merely exhortation. Argument would have attempted to show how the League will accomplish these ends. President Wilson's speeches in Boston and at the Metropolitan Opera House could not be called argument. They were the warm assertion and earnest appeal of a partisan. The difficulty in all this matter goes as deep as the difficulty of conflicting temperaments. For some it is habitually easy to have faith that good impulses can be rallied for lasting benefits; others have too often seen good impulses followed by selfishness. The President, relying upon the growing desire to do away with war, was convinced that the Covenant, even before it was revised, was a trustworthy instrument. On the one side is humanitarian optimism; on the other is the doubting lawyer's eye looking for flaws in human nature. In a question having so much at stake, neither side can afford to vilify the other. For it is evident that an honest effort is on foot to safeguard the future of the world. In the interest of sober debate we publish in this issue a searching criticism of the Covenant by one well versed in the history of international agreements.

PRESUMABLY such newspaper talk as appears occasionally, to the effect that the rest of the powers are willing to let Germany into the League of Nations, but that France holds out against it, is irresponsible. But it ought not to go unchallenged. We ought to be immune by this time from the gullibility that can not see beneath the sheep's clothing. In any case, the time for swelling magnanimity is not yet. We are still at war with Germany and need to be reminded of the fact. We need also to be reminded that we entered the war pretty late, and that, whatever our services, we have no right to inject an easygoing complaisance into the settlement. Now is the time, when the effort has been made and the reaction is on, to steel ourselves, by remembering what Germany did, into a steady purpose that such things shall never happen again. It is no time to talk about letting bygones be bygones, for we are not at all sure that there are any real bygones; it is impossible as yet to observe any clear signs that the German people has experienced any regrets except the very poignant one that Gott and his armies did not succeed. In fact, it is doubtful whether the Germans will, for some time to come, realize that they were defeated. Certainly they have not exhibited such qualities and mood as have been adjudged requisite in a member of the League.

It is also highly unreasonable to advert to the implacability of the French. "The toad beneath the harrow knows exactly where each tooth-point goes," and if we get into a censorious, or even a regretfully excusatory attitude, we run the risk of impersonating the "butterfly upon the road," who "preaches contentment to that toad." For decades we have expressed pious surprise at the suspicions that lurked in the breast of France against Germany—Germany, the land of all the homely virtues and of Gemüthlichkeit. And then came the revelation, so startling and so ominous that, it would seem, the present generation could never forget it. In very self-interest we ought to lend to the present misgivings of France the weight which we now see to have been due to her former forebodings.

THE fervor and beauty of the President's address on Memorial Day should blind no one to its romantic falsity. Few of the quiet soldier-dead at Suresnes would know themselves as crusaders and gossellers of perpetual peace. Not one of them but would have resented the implication that the poilu who was fighting immediately, and the Tommy who was fighting eventually, for his fire-side, represented a lower order of idealism than his own. Their thoughts were his. He knew the Hun to be very powerful and terribly cruel. He sensed correctly the possibility of German victory and the chance of there happening on our soil what had befallen in Belgium and Northern France. His was no disinterested war against war, but plain war against "Kaiser Bill." He wanted victory and was willing to die for it. Had the average American fighter known surely that death would be his portion with victory, and that peace would last only ten years, he would have given his life just as willingly. To poetize his simple and natural patriotism, to represent it as a manner of internationalism, is to gild gratuitously facts that are in themselves sufficiently glorious. Few who have dealt intimately with enlisted men of the army and navy, sharing their hardships and admiring their pluck and clearheadedness, will admit as plausible this mortuary museum of plaster saints which President Wilson is at such pains to erect. For the League of Nations there should be arguments, without sentimentalizing and denaturing that sacrifice which our boys made so simply. From their wide-strewn graves they ask nothing of us but to honor them for what they did and for what they were.

MEMORIAL DAY assumed this year for the whole country a wider and deeper significance. There was no town or village which did not on that day turn its eyes towards France, ground rendered to them forever sacred, the affectionate guardian of our American dead. There was no town or village, East or West, North or South, that did not feel the emotion expressed by General Pershing:

And now, dear comrades, farewell. Here under the clear skies, on the green hillsides, and amid the flowering fields of France, in the quiet hush of peace, we leave you forever in God's keeping.

There were none who did not feel that the simple services everywhere held would gain by annual repetition in power to console and in power to make plain the ways in which the future is to prove that these dead did not die in vain. Not the least happy circumstance attending the observation of the day was the presence in many places of fine old men who had given their youth to insure that America should be a great nation. The old breach has long been healed. It closed over with the withdrawal of Northern rule in the South after the Hayes-Tilden election, it was strongly knit by the election of a Democratic president in the person of Cleveland and his appointment to national office of men who had borne arms for the "lost cause," it disappeared altogether when boys from the North and from the South fought shoulder to shoulder in the Spanish War. But on this Memorial Day the vanishing remnant on both sides of the old conflict gave over their splendid traditions to the keeping of a new generation of veterans who know nothing of division, but only America.

PRESSURE is again being brought to bear upon President Wilson in the matter of Ireland's grievances. We have no doubt he will firmly refuse, as he has consistently done hitherto, to have anything to do with the matter. The Irish situation is apparently more threatening to-day than at any previous time, and there is good reason to believe that agitation in America, or of American origin, has had a very considerable share in aggravating it. That Ireland has real grievances and that England has muddled horribly in its dealings with them it is impossible to deny, but it is not our affair, nor is it the affair of the Paris Conference. That body has quite enough to do in undertaking to settle the problems that were created by the outcome of the war—the defeat of Germany, the collapse of Austria-Hungary and Turkey, the break-up of Russia, the confusion in the Balkan region. Nor is it merely a question of the magnitude of the task. The defeated nations have to be dealt with, but to open up all the wrongs and imperfections that may exist within the victorious nations would be a monstrous impertinence. We have no more business with the establishment of a reign of ideal justice in the British Empire than the British or French have with a like undertaking for our country. There are several million people of negro race in the United States who are as effectively deprived of rights guaranteed to them by our own Constitution as if that instrument had disfranchised instead of enfranchising them. But we have yet to hear of any advocate of American interference in Ireland proposing that Lloyd George or Clemenceau should insist upon the South making negro suffrage a reality.

PREMIER PADEREWSKI, writing to Mr. Hoover, says that he considers it "of vital necessity that these accusations should be wiped out by the unbiased testimony of just men"—meaning, of course, the accusations in regard to pogroms in Poland. Unfortunately, there is little prospect of the accusations being "wiped out." Between wiping out the accusations, however, and reducing them to a character far less injurious to the standing of the Polish Government before the civilized world, there is a great difference; and it is to be hoped that the responsibility of that Government for the barbarities of whose perpetration there is hardly any room for doubt will be shown not to be what many believe it to have been. The facts themselves are of course involved in obscurity, owing to the meagreness of our sources of information, but even when the external facts have been established there remains the question whether the powers that be in Poland have played a disgraceful part in connection with them. We all wish to give the new Poland, upon which the hope of Europe so largely rests, the benefit of any doubt. Mr. Paderewski has made it perfectly easy for President Wilson to set on foot a thorough investigation, and there are few duties more pressing than this at the present moment. An immediate institution of such proceedings should have the effect of tranquilizing both those who have been stirred up to fierce indignation and those who have denied that there is anything to be indignant about. The mere fact of a genuine inquiry being under way may be expected to prevent further outrages for the time being. When the report has been made, it is not too much to hope that it will result in permanent protection against a repetition of them.

Now that sport is reviving it is a good time to scrutinize with some care a form of sport which it had been better never to call forth from the obscurity of the days before the war. When Read carries through his carefully considered flight across the Atlantic, the world is delighted; when Hawker disappears into the storm and mist of the North Atlantic to reappear after hope had been all but extinguished, the world is thrilled. Besides much else, this is sport at its best and highest. Whatever quickening of the pulse one experiences in contemplation of such feats springs from an honest emotion that needs no curb. When a crowd of a hundred and twenty-five thousand persons assemble at Indianapolis to see automobiles driven five hundred miles round a race course in something over five hours, one may admit that a race is a race, and even a six-day bicycle grind seems capable of attracting the attention, though one might think the beholders meagrely rewarded for their time. But when the automobile race involves three deaths and a fractured skull, when Arthur Thurman is crushed to death beneath the wreckage of his overturned car, when Lecocq and his mechanic expire in the flames of their exploded gasoline tank, when the horror-struck crowd fixes its fascinated gaze on the surviving racers, who make no pause, it is time to ask whether this sort of sport deserves reviving. It is time, rather, to say that this thing should be no longer tolerated. Nothing is proved by it save that to man's recklessness there is no limit, but to the care of Providence for fools a very definite limit, and both these things we know already. The Roman amphitheatre and the Spanish bullring afford far better sport, and in their effect on the spectator are not more hardening, more degrading, more thoroughly disgusting than the recent exhibition at Indianapolis. The Roman or the Spaniard, fortified by centuries of national tradition, might indeed spend a lifetime at his spectacles with far less harm than an American audience, with its temperament unsubdued to such things, would take from a single repetition of the Indianapolis public butchery. In American life there is no place for it; the noxious thing should be uprooted before it spreads further.

CONGRESS can without difficulty make a modest, but important and immediate, contribution to the improvement of the housing situation by carrying out the recommendation made by the joint committee on housing of the New York State Legislatures that "mortgages on homes, and holdings in mortgages up to, say, $4,000," be exempted from Federal taxation. This would facilitate such investments in a perfectly legitimate way, and moreover is in keeping with similar exemptions already existing in the case of farm mortgages. On no similar subject, perhaps, is the attention of practical men more actively directed at this moment than on the housing question, and in no other direction can relief be effected by means so simple and direct. Adjustments of most questions that press upon us as a result of the war's disturbances involve reconciliation of conflicting interests; in the matter of housing, quiet constructive work can go forward smoothly, and yet mitigate one of the severest hardships of the time.

IT is one of the few kind memories of the last Congress that, through mere press of other business, perhaps, it neglected to carry out the threatened repeal of the daylight saving law. What the present Congress will do will be watched with keen interest, for it would be hard to find an issue on which so overwhelming a majority of the people, backed by the judgment and practice of most European countries, is in agreement against a small but powerful minority. We are not incapable of sympathy with the farmer; we will not let the prices we pay him for his products distort our view of his rights or comforts. It is quite true, as he says, that the sun rises not one moment earlier in deference to our retarded time-pieces and that the precious period between his appearance and the departure of the milk-train or the opening of the markets is lessened by a whole hour. But it may be questioned whether the farmer has yet viewed the matter in its broad aspects. Some farmers we know are difficult to reason with on a point like this; one such refused to set back his watch last year because he would have no traffic with "Democratic time;" his own life was regulated by "God's time"—or Republican, the difference being to him either not clear or wholly negligible. But most farmers are not like this; they are reasonable beings with a heart under their waistcoats which can be appealed to. It should be reached. It should be made to feel for the light-hungry generation that fills the land. The farmer has the sun from his glorious rise to his often more splendid decline, but the millions of indoor men, what that one hour of quiet afternoon light means to them is past all counting. Put the economic return of it as low as possible—and it would still be high—the spiritual value of it places it in the class of things that men had better fight for than lose; fight for, that is, through their congressmen.

AN influential body of artists and critics is urging the appointment of competent painters to commemorate our part in the war. In this matter we have let England and our European Allies get ahead of us. Possibly the movement is a little tardy. The great opportunity of bringing the horror and the glory of the trenches vividly before our best eyes has passed. There remains the duty of securing adequate portraiture of the great personalities of the war. And here Sergeant York should be included with General Pershing. Before we despair too much of our artistic memorials of the war, we should not forget that John Sargent has been prowling not merely in the British but in the American trenches. He may have the answer to the desires of us all, if not in his portfolios at least in the back of his head.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

What Constitutional Prohibition Means

WHEN it was announced that the thirty-sixth State had ratified the Prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States a singular thing happened. The leading newspapers of the country seemed suddenly, and for the first time, to become aware that a very big thing had been going on. This state of mind characterized alike those papers which had favored the amendment and those which had looked on in an attitude of more or less benevolent neutrality. The few papers which had had the courage to oppose the amendment were not taken by surprise, for their opposition was based not merely on dislike of its specific object but on a clear-eyed appreciation of its enormous significance from the standpoint of fundamental principles of government. The number of these journals, however, was so small that the phenomenon which presented itself to the general mind when the newspapers of that morning appeared was that of a people suddenly realizing what they had done. This did not necessarily imply regret, but it did clearly show what to serious observers was already sufficiently plain—that the momentous departure which was being made from our political traditions had received almost no attention at the hands of those whose duty it was to devote to any such development their best powers of intelligence and judgment.

There has been introduced in the present Congress by the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House a bill which might justly be made the occasion for the devotion of yet another day of attention to the significance of the new departure. The bill contains the following provision:

No person shall, on or after the date when the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect . . . manufacture, sell, barter, give away, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, receive, possess, or use any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act.

If the United States wishes to go in earnest into the business of extirpating the drinking of intoxicants this is the way in which it will naturally go about it. This was of course in the mind of the Anti-Saloon League, and of the active promoters of Constitutional prohibition in general, all along. Many who, while the amendment was being put through, looked on with a half-asleep complacency may not have realized that this is what it meant. But there was never any reason to doubt that this is what its chief promoters intended to effect. With such a law on the statute books, search and seizure, every device and apparatus of inquisitorial control, will be part of the regular functions of the United States Government. Any community, such as that of New York City for example, regardless of the opinions or predilections of its inhabitants, will be subjected to all the rigors of Federal administration of a law affecting their daily life and habits. Nothing even remotely approaching a condition of this kind has ever been tried in this country; or, in time of peace, in any country of the modern world. Yet if we really want national prohibition, this is what we must have; and if we really want national prohibition by Constitutional enactment this is what we must endure until such time as a movement powerful enough to sweep into its current a two-thirds majority of each house of Congress and the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States has been set in motion and carried to a triumphant issue. That the possibility of this is dim and remote needs no argument.

What will actually happen under the Eighteenth Amendment is nevertheless still matter for speculation. Much depends upon the spirit in which Congress may choose to act, and even the Supreme Court is also to be reckoned with. As regards the particular bill introduced by the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee—a bill prepared, we are told, "with the assistance of counsel for the Anti-Saloon League"—its validity under the Eighteenth Amendment is clearly open to question. That Amendment reads as follows:

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Obviously the bill goes far beyond anything specifically authorized in the amendment. The amendment forbids "the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors," but says nothing whatever about the right to "possess or use" them. The Federal Government has no police powers except those expressly conferred by the Constitution. The separate States may forbid possession or use, but it is difficult to see how Congress, under the Eighteenth Amendment, has any such power. Indeed we are inclined to think that a strong case might be made out even for the right to make liquors for one's own personal consumption, not to speak of the right to possess or use them. The word "manufacture," in the acceptance in which it has been used within the memory of any man now living, has reference only to making for commercial purposes. A man who makes a corn-cob pipe for his own use, or a woman who makes an embroidered fire-screen for her living room, does not manufacture these things, and no ordinary law relating to manufacture applies to them.

Nor could a plea to this effect be dismissed as a mere quibble or technicality. The language of the Eighteenth Amendment was carefully chosen by men who had devoted years to the promotion of the object they had at heart. There were in existence State laws, perfectly familiar to these men, which prohibited the possession of liquor. If they abstained from putting this prohibition into the amendment it was not by inadvertence. They were presumably aware that there was still enough left of jealousy for individual rights and for local self-government to cause many people to shy at an edict that made drinking a crime against the Federal Constitution, and they were not so sure of their victory as to feel that they could without risk arouse this sentiment. The vote by which the amendment passed the House was but little above two-thirds of the members voting, and it is quite possible that a more bare-faced expression of its intention would have caused its defeat. It was part of the whole strategy of the movement to make the contest appear to be one solely between the forces of righteousness on the one hand and the liquor traffic on the other. The word "manufacture" carefully conforms to this notion. The desires of the millions of people whose interest was in the drinking and not in the manufacture of liquor were kept sedulously in the background. What decision the courts might render on the subject we can not pretend to say, but a perfectly honest argument can be presented for the interpretation of the word "manufacture" as not covering the making of liquor for one's own use.

Whether anything will be done to mitigate the rigors of the Eighteenth Amendment does not, however, at this moment interest us so keenly as does the intrinsic character of what was done when the amendment was adopted. To those who have any regard for the Constitution of the United States—and we take it there are still some such persons—the first thought about the Eighteenth Amendment must be that it is not merely a departure from the spirit of the Constitution but a degradation of the whole instrument. Unlike many of our State constitutions, the Constitution of the United States has hitherto been the embodiment only of those things which are essential either to the marking out of the structure of our Government or to the preservation of fundamental human rights. Such an instrument can command, and throughout our history has commanded, the loyal devotion of a great people. It is inconceivable that this feeling could have been built up for a document which undertook to impose upon the people in permanency—to withdraw from the operation of the ordinary processes of majority rule—specific statutes undertaking to control the daily lives of a hundred million people scattered over the expanse of a continent. As much as one provision can do to lower the standing of the Constitution of the United States, the Eighteenth Amendment has done. If there were nothing else to be said against it, this alone would be an objection whose gravity can hardly be overestimated.

But not only is it a degradation of the Constitution; it is a gross perversion of the very idea of Constitutional authority. A degradation it would be even if its subject matter were merely outside the natural and proper domain of Constitutional enactment, and otherwise of no special significance; it is a perversion because it places behind the bulwarks of the Constitution not a safeguard of liberty but a denial of liberty. Police regulations established by statute, whether State or national, embody, of course, many restraints upon liberty; but they are repealable by the ordinary processes of popular government. The purpose of the Constitution is explicitly to put some things beyond the reach of those processes. On the one hand there are things which relate to the distribution of powers either between the States and the Federal Government or between different departments of the Federal Government itself. On the other hand there are things which are supposed to be vital to the maintenance of the essential character of our institutions. Over fundamental rights of minorities or of individuals is thrown the protection of an instrument which no mere majority can set aside.

No better example of this can be given than the First Amendment, providing that "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This has put it beyond the power of a majority of the people of the United States, however much they might at a given moment be carried away by prejudice or fear, to proscribe any particular religion, or to compel individuals to profess adherence to any religion at all. The Eighteenth Amendment is in diametrical contrast with the First. The First Amendment says that not even a majority of the people shall have power to deprive men of religious liberty; the Eighteenth Amendment says that not even a majority of the people shall have power to restore to men that liberty in regard to their personal habits which they have hitherto enjoyed. Generation after generation may pass during which a majority of the people shall wish to recover this liberty and shall find that recovery impossible except by nullification of the Constitution of the United States. If, when that instrument was first adopted, any man had proposed to embody in it a provision of this kind—not relating to drink but to anything—he would have been regarded as imbecile. The safeguards of the Constitution were enacted not to impose upon future generations the particular preferences of the men who made it, but permanently to protect against attack by fleeting popular moods those things that were felt to be essential to the integrity of our free institutions. If the First Amendment had been framed in the spirit of the Eighteenth, instead of establishing religious liberty it would have established a national church—and it would have made the Constitution of the United States a monstrosity.

times the difference between governments and peoples he has shaken confidence in representative government, and he has allowed the fault to go not where it largely belongs, to the indifference or ignorance of the voters, but to the machinations of governments. Thus, probably unwittingly, he has fostered the feeling that Bolshevism is a tolerable substitute for democracy. Possibly a sense of some wild idealism in the second Revolution made him averse from taking the obvious stand against both its undemocratic theories and its actual brutalities. Possibly "neutrality of soul" dictated complete non-interference in Russia. Unhappily, however, we did not even live up to our negative policy; we did interfere grudgingly and hazily, in a way to get all the odium possible both from the Bolsheviks and from the Moderates.

In the whole transaction there has been a confusion of two quite different issues. Evidently we must never be a party to dictating a particular form of government for Russia. So far as we are concerned, Russia is quite free to experiment in any form of anarchy that may please her. It doesn't follow that we are bound to entertain friendly feelings towards any kind of misrule that Russia may choose for herself. Presumably we believe in our own institutions. We may have to do business with absolute monarchies or tyrannies of the proletariat—that is a question of policy; but our cordiality is properly reserved for those who share our own political and moral ideals. A false relativity and tolerance have been spread over the gulf that separates all free nations from Bolshevik Russia. Her apologists have spoken as if intimidation ceased to be such in Holy Russia, as if the intention to upset all existing governments were a matter for amicable negotiation.

Certain radicals have argued that to keep the way open for an eventual recognition of a Bolshevik régime in Russia was indispensable. That is true. Any kind of government that manages to establish itself must be recognized. But these radicals really mean that we should help the Bolsheviks along, which is quite a different affair. As a matter of fact, our prolonged and indecisive flirtation with the Lenin dictatorship has merely got us the reputation of hypocrisy and cowardice. The Bolsheviks at least have the merit of knowing what they want.

What this nation wanted and wants in Russia is some form of constitutional democracy. Obviously we can not work for it directly, but as plainly we should be foolish not to give incidental encouragement, as occasion presents itself, to any form of democratic organization in Russia. Admiral Kolchak, who is provisional military dictator of more than three-quarters of the territory of ADMIRAL KOLCHAK to-day embodies the national effort in Russia. With entire logic, the conferees at Versailles, as representing the idea of nationality, have recommended that Kolchak be recognized. President Wilson has asked for delay and consideration. Meanwhile the dictatorship of Lenin and Trotsky finds itself daily diminished in territory and power. The end of Bolshevism seems fairly in sight. A new government, not merely of the plain people but of the whole people, seems imminent. It will owe small friendliness to the United States.

Our Relations to Russia

We have no sympathy with those who regard the Russian situation as simple, and are ready to say how President Wilson should have acted at each step. No relations with a government in revolution are ever simple. General principles rarely work when power is shifting from day to day. All that can reasonably be expected in dealing with Russia is as decent an opportunism as we once exercised towards a recent ally, during the French Revolution.

But, whatever may be ambiguous in the Russian situation, there never has been a moment when our moral attitude towards the Bolshevik dictatorship should have been in doubt. Lenin's avowed programme was the overthrow of all existing governments. The Entente was rooted in a common faith in democracy. Doctrinally the Bolsheviks are as distinctly the enemies of the Entente as were the Junker Imperialists. Mr. Wilson has allowed this plain distinction to be blurred, and thereby has done disservice to the cause of democracy everywhere. In emphasizing at all the Russias, is firmly committed to the calling of a constituent assembly and to the legal termination of his own dictatorship. It may or may not be the moment for the United States to recognize him. At least all the presumptions are in his favor, whereas all the presumptions are against Lenin. Moreover Admiral Kolchak has taken the pains to show that he is politically our friend, while Lenin has omitted no opportunity to show that he is our foe.

Opportunism is plainly what is called for in the Russian situation, but an opportunism with clear principles behind it. Decisions based on propitiating revolutionary sentiment at home are false decisions. The admission that a proletarian distatorship is an acceptable newcomer in the community of nations is an

Germany in Africa

SOME twenty years ago, Alfred Zimmermann, a German writer on colonization, recorded a significant observation about the British system. He thought that system to be the best one for the Germans to follow, but admitted that they did not succeed in so doing. "The British arrangements," says he, "when they are transplanted, have always experienced a complete transformation, and one that has often destroyed their inmost essence." The British, by contrast, have been notably successful in taking over suggestions from others, particularly the French, and working them out; thus, the system of full self-government in the colonies originated out of ideas derived from the French of the Revolutionary period, and has been applied with astonishing success by the British during the last fifty years.

Out of the mêlée of war, with its blunt revelations of essentials and of insufficiencies, there has emerged an acme of tribute to the British colonial system. The Germans were counting with confidence upon disaffection within the Empire, and were reckoning with India and South Africa almost as with their own. Yet the struggle was scarcely begun before that dream was shattered. The Empire held firmly together, the colonials rushed to the assistance of the mother-country, and the rajahs assembled their wealth and their man-power to defend their alleged oppressors. The story of Germany's gigantic miscalculation as to the imminent break-up of the British Empire does not need to be related anew. And something the same thing has occurred in the case of the French; for their colonials, too, have rallied to the defense. Many a black warrior has laid down his life under the tricolor in such manner that it could not have meant to him the banner of tyranny or of serfdom. But where abject surrender of the principles for which we have fought. That the Russian situation is staggeringly complicated and our policy necessarily shifting with events themselves, is no reason for abdicating those faiths and convictions on which our nation rests. For the purpose of feeding the victims of his tyranny, we may have to deal with Lenin, as we had to deal in similar case with the German Kaiser. Let us not pretend that what may come as a stern duty is a pleasure. Let us not stifle through any tenderness of soul the voice of the national conscience. What we need towards Russia even more than a diplomatic policy, which at best must be groping, is a moral attitude of the nation. It exists; it is clear. Has it been fairly represented at Versailles?

have been the German colonial troops? Except in East Africa, where a force of natives was maintained under a system of payment, partly in money and partly in license to domineer over their fellows, the natives of the German colonies put up no resistance to conquest, much less a devoted championing of their masters. On the contrary, they welcomed the invaders.

There is no a priori proof of fitness for the destiny of a great colonizing power that can stand before a demonstration of this kind. Before Germany entered the colonial field, the Germans called one another to witness that they possessed qualities for world-power and the dissemination of civilization quite unparalleled, at any rate since Roman times; and their callings to and fro were so vociferous and so full of conviction that other nations, overhearing, were impressed. A number of English writers, under the curious mood of self-depreciation that overtook them some years ago, conceded the case, got out their sackcloth and ashes, and stood by to see the chariots and the glory thereof. But now, after the Germans have had their chance for over a generation, there is current a perfectly rational conclusion that they have failed so utterly that they are not fit to be entrusted henceforth with colonies at all.

But why, when they entered the competition with such acclaim? What of the industry, the science, the good intentions, the general Gründlichkeit? It is necessary to ask, first of all, as to the criteria of fitness to be a "colonizing power." These are not the same in all periods. Spain was the model once, when colonization meant exploitation; the rest envied her her Silver Fleet and the other grandiose thievements of her Conquistadores. And then arose, in turn, the admiring, even though rueful, conviction that, when it came to commercial exploitation, the Dutch were not to be beaten; "they have stolen themselves rich," remarked an impressed sightseer as he gazed upon the mansion of certain East Indies barons. England herself was exalted once by reason of the successes of a "colonial system," now long passed away, whereby, as in the preceding cases, the colonies were treated as destined to be no more than contributory to the economic prosperity of the metropolis. But it is not so long ago that we "freed" Cuba and the Philippines from the Spanish yoke, and thought well of ourselves for doing it; the Dutch government has been assailed by a fire of criticism for concerning itself solely with the batig slot, or favorable balance; and England of not many years since, having overcome the Boers, instead of looting and taxing, speedily granted them freedom—and not only that, but also a voice in the management of the Empire. There has evidently been a shift in the conception of what a successful colonizing power is. Fitness to hold colonies is not any longer adjudged upon the development of their material resources or trade; it comes down to the human element; it focuses upon the treatment of the native peoples, to which once the world was indifferent, and upon that of the settlers.

The trouble with Germany in the colonies has been the trouble with Germany in Belgium and Poland. "No kaikai [food], no Sunday," complains the laborer in Kaiser Wilhelmsland, "plenty fight, plenty die!" To the native the British are bluffly fair; they may not be loved, as the French are said to be, because they are not suaviter in modo, and do not let themselves go in a way appreciated by the simple child of nature. But they are good sports, and especially good losers, and they are, with all the grumbling, objects of trust. The Germans began with the idea of Strenge mit Gerechtigkeit, of teaching first "a good lesson"; but the emphasis fell overweeningly on the sternness, and the lesson not infrequently ended in the demise of the pupil. East African princes were hoaxed in the matter of "treaties," in which they later found they had signed away land and power; they had never understood the documents, which were, indeed, of the flimsiest order. Trouble with the Herero and other tribes has made of German Southwest Africa what they themselves called their "Schmerzenkind." Atrocities of an unbelievable nature (Kolonialgruel) evoked the term Tropenkoller, or tropical madness, to explain them.

It is plausible to contend that this was the result of inexperience, and that all would be eventually rectified. But if they were unfortunate in their beginnings, they have not lived down that early reputation. The war brought out the fact that their qualities are something more than transitory and accidental; and now no one would dare to advocate restoration of their powers on the ground that they would learn pretty soon to employ them like other human beings. The colonial performances are of a piece, be it reiterated, with those exhibited in Europe and extenuated, if not incited, in Turkey. No nation that will do that sort of thing is fit to be set in a position of authority over peoples the stage of whose civilization makes them relatively helpless.

Robert Bacon: A Reminiscence

IT was midsummer after the Lusitania, the scene a meadow near West Plattsburg, the time sundown, the persons the fifteen hundred "Tired Business Men" of the First Training Regiment. We had completed our hundred miles of march manœuvres and were correspondingly exultant. It was the moment of leavetaking and thanks to our devoted instruction officers. The memory clings to that scene. Scores of the khaki-clad men lolling in the great semicircle now lie very quiet in France and Flanders. Hundreds have put in practice in the Argonne the tactics begun at Perry's Mills and Altoona. For the moment, we were just a lot of rather harmless enthusiasts, barely tolerated at Washington, rather suspected as to our judgment, humorously admired for our cheerfulness in "taking our medicine." Our officers, however, believed in us, and we in them.

To express this sentiment of the enlisted men an officer might have been chosen, for example John Purroy Mitchell, who had just won his gold acorns; or a literary notability like private Richard Harding Davis of E Company. Instead a less eminent member of the regiment took the speaker's place, lifted the dusty campaign hat from a head beautifully cut and distinguished by tightly clustered curls—the head of a Greek athlete. It was "Top Sergeant" Bacon of A Company. He spoke very quietly concerning our gratitude towards our officers. He expressed our sense of benefit received from the training and of patriotism strengthened and confirmed. He urged as an evangel the duty of waking up the country to prepare a sufficient defence. We read between the lines a sentiment that ran through the company streets, that this was going to be our war, gloriously so. He and we knew the nation's duty, even if the nation didn't as yet.

The quiet, cultured utterance of the Greek god in khaki naturally impressed us. We called him over and looked him up. Most of us knew that Sergeant Bacon had been Ambassador to France, some of us recalled that he had been a great banker in his day, a few may have remembered that he resigned his ambassadorship to accept the to him prouder position of an Overseer of Harvard University. We all knew that the company sergeant of A Company was a friendly man and that he accepted the drudgery of the orderly tent with unaffected zeal and thoroughness. It was only later that we learned, what he would never have divulged, how much he had done to make possible General Wood's plan of officers' training camps.

He was a man of fifty-five and we suspected—a natural surmise in the case of the older men—that he had enlisted as a good example. Yet it was no surprise to us when he volunteered with his three sons, and undertook the exacting duties of a liaison officer. Major Bacon carried into the war a dangerous lesion which, neglected, became the cause of his untimely death. Col. Bacon came back with merited honors and decorations of all sorts. But as he stood before us at West Plattsburg in an enlisted man's khaki, he already had won his "field marshal's baton." It was what he liked to call his election to the Board of Harvard Overseers. One likes to remember him amid all that relaxation of good fellowship—serious, friendly; reticently looking forward to the service that awaited him with so many others of the Tired Business Men.

Unrest and Distrust

THE publishing business of the country was revolutionized by the simple discovery that the average reader is honest. You can safely put a book into a man's hand without first taking the price from him. Upon this sort of confidence the world keeps running, and when such confidence is shaken the world runs badly. It has been sorely shaken through the war, and nothing worth while can be done until the world is once more convinced that most men mean well.

We need not credit all the alarmist reports from Europe to realize that social distrust is everywhere prevalent. Part of it is mere fretfulness, and need not be taken too seriously. Millions of men have been thrust into unfamiliar and hard duties, have greatly suffered through their own inexperience and that of their officers; have been projected into the duller duties following the armistice, then suddenly whisked back to a world that has changed. War heroes must relearn how to be elevator men; whilom officers must drive delivery carts. It is not an easy readjustment. Unrest is inevitable, and its best cure is time.

There is, however, a distrust that goes deeper and needs a more radical cure; and there is always danger, too, that temporary agitation of spirit may settle down into ugly fixed forms of suspicion. Much has been done to bring this about. Historically, perhaps, the movement begins with the weak idealist, Alexander Kerensky, who demanded that the Entente struggling for its very life should purify and clarify its war aims. This unreasonable demand that a world with its back to the wall should considerably analyze its past and lay out its future, was echoed throughout the radical world. The refrain swelled until the governments that were actually fighting for the freedom of the world were put into the position of mere tricksters.

President Wilson unfortunately played into the prevailing mistrust by reiterating his academic distinction between governments and peoples. His invariable implication was that governments were wrong and peoples right. Such a distinction is destructive of the ideal of representative government. Plainly if free people will not take the pains to elect truly representative governments, democracy is a failure. It is one of the ironies of the war that practical democracy has been seriously undermined by the great champion of democratic theory.

Inevitable inequalities of treatment within the working classes have fostered discontent. The ironworker caught in the draft drew half his normal pay as a private, while his mate who had an exemption drew double pay in a munitions factory. Meanwhile both saw inordinate profit taking and greatly exaggerated what they saw. Millions of plain men on foreign soil were rubbed the wrong way by foreigners and amply reciprocated the attention. The mixing process which harmonized the national melting pot curdled the international cauldron.

Such are some of the main causes that have produced the prevailing unrest. Much of it will be cured by time. Some of it will be remedied mechanically through the resumption of normal industry. But there is danger that we may trust too much to mechanical treatment to repair what is emphatically a moral ill. The responsibility for a cure falls largely upon the prosperous, though the organizers of labor also have their important duty of interpretation. Something would be done toward lessening distrust if people could simply be made to grasp the truth that much of the admittedly unjust distribution of wealth has come not through anybody's malice but through general incapacity to cope with the swiftly growing industrial system. Neither capitalists nor workmen have, until recently, been doing much careful or solid thinking about the matter.

“Fed Up with the French”

THE transport had cleared the break-water at Brest and was squared away for the run to Sandy Hook. I stood aft on the promenade deck, looking down at the main deck, where the enlisted men were crowded at the rail taking a last look at the fast-fading coast of France. There was a light breeze astern, and the voices floated up with perfect distinctness—“Good-bye, France, damn you!” was a fair sample of the shouts of derision and scorn hurled at the defenceless French coast. A sergeant carrying a message to regimental headquarters came up the companionway two steps at a time: I accosted him. “Sergeant,” I asked, “are you sore on France and the French?” “Well, sir,” he answered, “I’m not sore to-day on any place or anybody, with this little old ship headed for the States. But I guess all the men got pretty tired of hanging ’round the Le Mans area waitin’ to go home and being robbed by these here frog shop-keepers. No, sir, I ain’t got nothin’ against France—it a bonn country—but these here civilian frogs don’t want nothin’ more offen us now that the fightin’s over—’cept our money, sir.”

Now the sergeant had it about right: he was an average, intelligent non-com, and he represents the average opinion of our enlisted personnel—and of the junior officers, too, be it said—who are returning from overseas service. There is no gainsaying the fact that, in the estimation of our army as a whole, France’s stock has dropped way below par in the last six months. I watched the thing pretty closely in a good many different parts of France, because I had been wondering, even before the fighting ended, how long it would be before there was a rift in the lute of the Franco-American entente.

While the war was on, while our men, our machinery, and our money were pouring into France in comforting streams, the French received us open-armed. I don’t mean that they were consciously play-acting about it; they felt emotional and grateful, and they made love to our army—they were French, that’s all. Our officers and men were somewhat astonished but rather pleased, and proceeded about their business of learning to fight the French way. Our officers—coming in contact with French officers at specialist schools, at the staff college, in liaison work, and in staff work, learning and teaching French combat methods—gained a wholesome respect for the Frenchman as a professional soldier, and began to realize that he was far and away the most scientific fighter in Europe, despite the fact that he talked with his hands and feet, and seemed to go up in the air on the least pretext. Had the war gone on, good feeling between the armed forces would have grown stronger and stronger.

But when the armistice was signed, two things occurred. France awoke from a four years’ nightmare and found several million rather strange and suddenly superfluous Yankees billeted on her; and several million Yankees rolled up their packs, forgot Berlin, and concentrated their whole minds on Hoboken. I remember, the morning after the armistice, going on inspections with one of my company commanders and asking him how his men felt. “Well, sir,” he answered, “they’re fed up with the French, and want to go home.” As a matter of fact, we were in rest billets in a shell-torn village in the devastated area; there were not six French people, soldiers or civilians, within twenty kilometers, and my outfit, which had been in the thick of the fighting before I joined them, had scarcely seen a Frenchman in three months. Yet they were “fed up with the French”!

Now I am not trying to prove that the lessening goodwill between us and the French is imaginary, or that the grievances which our soldiers are constantly reiterating are negligible. But I do believe that nine-tenths of the differences are superficial and to be expected, and that the rest is as much our fault as theirs.

When the war ended France was numb; also she was “broke.” Hundreds of thousands of our troops were withdrawn from the firing line and distributed through the training areas and the embarkation centre at Le Mans. The men who had been fighting had had no chance to spend money, even if they had been lucky enough to get any; and many thousands of our enlisted men, thanks to one of the cruellest pieces of inefficiency with which our Government is chargeable, had received no pay at all for four, five, and even six months. Many officers were receiving salaries from their old employers, as well as the pay of their grade. With the coming of the armistice the men were paid up, and officers and men, their pockets bulging with good American money, were poured over the French landscape, filling the provincial cities and towns, and even the smallest villages with a sudden surplus of wealth. Paris was an American officer’s club; prices shot skyward; the law of supply and demand was in full swing, with the French merchant on the boosting end.

Now, if at this point the Americans had understood Continental methods of bargaining and buying, or if the French merchant class had been able to withstand the temptation to make a “killing,” all might still have been well. But the American isn’t accustomed to bargaining; he asks the price of an article and then takes it or leaves it. I watched a corporal of marines buying a piece of lace in a Le Mans shop one day. Madame showed him the price on the tag—72 francs—which he promptly paid. The lace was a centerpiece of meretricious design and coarse workmanship which was worth about 40 francs and which he could easily have bought for 55 francs. After this sort of buying had been going on for a time, the shopkeepers decided that no price was too high, and governed themselves accordingly. All merchandise went up, and souvenirs, especially “German prisoner souvenirs,” were manufactured and unloaded on our soldiers. But the greatest extortion occurred in food and drink. The American soldier with money in his pocket hates to appear economical—or even prudent. If a drink cost fifty centimes, he would toss down a franc and scorn the change. He could never learn to tip in copper.

This overcharging was, naturally, not universal; in many places wise and successful efforts were made to control prices. When my battalion, for instance, came down from the advanced zone to the embarkation centre, we were assigned to a little town called Savigné l’Evêque. The Mayor of this town was an aristocrat of the old school, eighty-four years of age, who seemed to hold office by right of family, and who ruled the countryside after the manner of a feudal baron; prices not only did not rise, but he almost gave us the town and all that was in it. Our estaminet did start to raise prices, but the old Mayor closed the place before word of it reached our headquarters.

I have emphasized this single matter of overcharging, because after considerable experience both as observer and as victim, I have come to the conclusion that it actually forms the basis of all our irritation against the French. We, as a nation, are beginning to feel that the French, as a nation, are grasping. We think that their shopkeepers rather imposed on the pocketbooks and good nature of our army, and that their statesmen are trying to repeat the process on a large scale at the Peace Table: all of which we are inclined to consider a little ungenerous and unsportsmanlike.

For myself, I am prepared to admit all that I have cited against the French—and more, too, if necessary—and yet to find abundant excuse for them, and ultimate forgiveness.

For five years France has been hammered, mauled, and bled. While the show was on, she kept a stiff upper lip, but now the reaction has set in, and she hovers on the brink of a nervous breakdown. Her people and her Government are suffering from shell shock just as certainly as men in the field. She suffers from fear after the fact, some of it normal, some of it exaggerated and hysterical. She hates and fears Germany, she fears and distrusts England, and she distrusts Italy. She fears herself and her own weaknesses, her economic prostration and commercial stagnation. Above all, she fears poverty. America is about the only nation she doesn't fear; she regards us as an unsophisticated, disinterested, fabulously rich and generous big brother who will continue to stand for a touch from time to time and in a pinch will always come through with a check. She doesn't realize that the petty avariciousness has got on our nerves—if she did, I believe, she would put an end to it.

Do the French dislike us? I will answer that by saying that at the moment I don't think the French like anyone but the French. As compared with the British, they love us passionately, but that is another story. For the present, they want to get everybody out of the country: then they want to build a Chinese Wall against Germany and spend the rest of their lives poking guns over the top of it.

Do we dislike the French? If we do, we should be ashamed of ourselves, for we should be guilty of an ungenerous intolerance towards a nation which was very near death: we should be forgetting many heroic virtues in our impatience at a few superficial vices. I don't believe we dislike the French: on the contrary, I think we really like them. But I do believe that if the American Army had been billeted in paradise after the armistice, it would have got so bored and homesick that it would have picked a row with all the cherubim and seraphim over the vintage of the nectar and the freshness of the ambrosia served at celestial mess.

MAJOR, A. E. F.

An Examination of the Covenant

IT is frequently asserted that when the President went abroad he was committed to no particular plan for a League of Nations, and this in a sense is true, for he has at no time gone into very definite details on the subject. But it is also true that he had repeatedly expressed ideas which if embodied in any scheme for a League of Nations must have gone far to determine its character, and would, indeed, have given it a character very different from that of the present League. Thus, in his famous "Peace without Victory" speech of January 22, 1917, before the Senate, the President pictured a League embracing all nations on equal terms, a League from which the balance of power and international war were ejected, a League in which all states were to rely upon the "common protection" guaranteed them by "the organized major force of mankind." Here is the vision of a super-state within the bounds of which every nation must confine its programmes of development and growth. And it is a very similar idea which underlies the Fourteen Points, otherwise it is difficult to give any very coherent interpretation of the demand there made regarding freedom of the seas, and the limitation of national armaments to the requirements of "domestic safety."

The League plan now before us proceeds for the most part upon quite different principles. It organizes an hegemony of the principal Entente Powers; it does not necessarily discountenance war, provided a certain procedure looking to a peaceable adjustment has first been gone through with; it provides for no organized international force except what may be comprised in an international boycott of limited application; it does not provide for international disarmament further than to promise a future plan which shall take "account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State," and which must successfully run the gauntlet of ratification by every state before it is binding upon any. Finally, aside from the matter of colonial mandatories and one or two other matters to be mentioned later, it vests no independent authority in any international organ.

The great value which public sentiment, in this country at least, attaches to the League is as an instrument for the peaceable adjustment of international disputes, and it is from this point of view, therefore, that we should first regard it. Article XIII of the revised Covenant reads as follows:

The members of the League agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration. Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration. For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed upon by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

The members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

In specifying certain kinds of disputes which shall be treated as susceptible of settlement by judicial or quasi-judicial methods, Article XIII marks a distinct improvement upon its predecessor in the original draft of the Covenant. The enumeration remains, for all that, both incomplete and dangerously vague. Furthermore, the student of international arbitration can not avoid feeling that the Conference has missed a unique opportunity in failing to provide at this juncture a definite constitution for a permanent court of arbitral justice, instead of merely promising one for some future date, as is done in Article XVI. If an international tribunal comparable to the Supreme Court of the United States could be created which by the disinterested devotion of its members to the task of building up a system of international justice should eventually win the confidence of reasonable men throughout the world, a great step would be taken towards international peace. Such an institution has long been dreamt of. The thing which, more than anything else, has stood in the way of its establishment has been the insistence of small states upon equal representation in its membership. The Peace Conference, clearly, had an opportunity to impose a different rule, and that opportunity may not recur.

Disputes which are not arbitrated in accordance with Article XIII are, by Article XV, to be submitted to the Council of the League. There, if all goes well, a settlement will be effected through the conciliatory efforts of the Council; but, if not, the Council shall then, either unanimously or by a majority vote, publish a statement of the facts of the matter and its recommendations thereon, and if the latter have been agreed to unanimously, not counting the representatives on the Council of parties to the dispute, they become binding on the members of the League in the sense that no member may take up arms against the disputant which complies with the recommendations. There is also another option open to the Council—it may refer the dispute to the Assembly of the League, as, indeed, may either disputant within a limited period after the first submission to the Council. The recommendations of the Assembly become binding in the sense just defined, provided they are supported by all the members of the Council, not counting the representatives of disputants, and a majority of the members of the Assembly with a like exception. The sanction for this procedure is supplied by Article XVI, whereby the members of the League undertake immediately to sever intercourse with any member resorting to war in violation of Articles XII, XIII and XV; further measures will depend upon the recommendation of the Council and the action of the several states.

The success, however, of the League as a means of maintaining the peace of the world must depend primarily, not upon its ability to bring compulsion to bear, but upon the facilities it offers as an organ of international conciliation, and in this respect it is, I submit, far from being all that might reasonably have been hoped for. The body to which will fall, if the League succeeds, the adjustment of the most important international differences is the Council, the make-up of which is provided for by Article IV of the revised Covenant as follows:

The Council shall consist of representatives of the United States of America, of the British Empire, of France, of Italy, and of Japan, together with representatives of four other members of the League. These four members of the League shall be selected by the Assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the League first selected by the Assembly, representatives of (blank) shall be members of the Council.

With the approval of the majority of the Assembly the Council may name additional members of the League whose representatives shall always be members of the Council; the Council with like approval may increase the number of members of the League to be selected by the Assembly for representation to the Council.

The provision here made for additional members constitutes an improvement upon the first draft of the Covenant. Even so, it is always the existing Council which will determine whether there shall be additional members; and for a long time to come certainly, the predominant influence in the Council will be wielded by the "Big Five." But why, let it be asked, should the adjustment of international difficulties, from whatever quarter or source arising, be invariably entrusted to a particular set of nations? And, what is more to the point, is it likely that a stereotyped body of this character—made up beforehand, and predominantly if not exclusively political and governmental in outlook, and existing primarily to safeguard the interests of the Powers controlling it—will win and hold the confidence of the world at large in its capacity for disinterested action?

In point of fact, the authors of the League have confused two very different problems, with the not unnatural result of providing an entirely satisfactory solution of neither. These problems were, first, that of furnishing the peace settlement which was to be imposed by the victorious Entente upon Germany with adequate guarantees, and, secondly, the problem of providing a permanent procedure for the peaceable settlement of international controversies. The former problem was naturally the one which most interested Lloyd George and Clemenceau, while the latter had captured the imagination of President Wilson, and the result is a compromise.

Nor are we left speculating in vacuo how this compromise arrangement will work. The Council of the League of Nations is little more than a continuance, under a new name, of the Peace Conference. It is necessary to suppose, therefore, that the methods which have obtained in the Peace Conference will survive in the newer body, and that the same points of view, the same necessities will to a large extent govern there. Hence the significance of the settlement of the Shantung question, which has demonstrated how little chance considerations of justice will have with the League when they clash with the hard necessity of maintaining a firm front against Germany. Further, it has demonstrated that despite Presidential exorcism, the old concept—or better, the ugly fact—of a balance of power still remains as vital as ever, with the result that Japan had only to squint in the direction of Russia and Germany to extort from the peacemakers permission to rifle her and their ally. On the other hand, when we turn to consider the League as primarily a machine for guaranteeing the peace settlement, it again appears far from satisfactory; and in consequence it must be supplemented, we have just learned, by defensive understandings between France and the United States and France and Great Britain.

Article X of the League, so much criticized by both conservatives and by liberals, is eloquent of the same moral. This article, which appears virtually unchanged in the revised draft of the Covenant, reads as follows:

The members of the League undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The criticism passed by liberals upon this Article is the obvious one that it stereotypes existing geographical discrepancies, that it prevents healthful national growth, that it rules out henceforth all such enterprises as France's intervention in behalf of American independence in 1778, and America's intervention in behalf of Cuban independence 120 years later. The conservative critic, on the other hand, raises a more immediately practical question. Why, he asks, should the United States pledge itself to assist in defending the boundaries of all states for all time, and especially since everybody knows very well that the pledge will not be kept?

It is clear, I think, that this Article is quite out of place in the League Covenant, though this is not to say that a similar provision, to run for a limited number of years, ought not to appear in the peace settlement. The settlement will establish a status quo which ought to be assured a reasonable period of time within which to prove its viability, and we Americans are more or less obliged, no doubt, to lend a hand to this end. But we ought to be able to look forward to a period when we shall be relieved of such obligations. I submit, also, that there is a substantial contradiction between Article X and other features of the League. Let us suppose a dispute between two members of the League. The dispute is duly submitted to the Council, which arrives at a unanimous recommendation. Thereupon the disadvantaged party to the dispute balks. What is to be done? The successful party has its award, but how is it to enforce it? The League is under pledge to defend the unsuccessful disputant's territorial integrity from "external aggression," and it is under equal obligation not to make war upon the successful disputant, which by hypothesis has followed its recommendations. And the contradiction is even plainer in case a unanimous recommendation is not forthcoming from the Council. In such case, says Article XV, "the members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice." But suppose it is considered "necessary" to send armed forces into territory of the recalcitrant state, what then becomes of Article X? To be sure, it has been contended that mere invasion is not "external aggression" upon "the territorial integrity" of a state. But admitting that, what again becomes of Article X? By such an interpretation the invasion of Belgium was not "external aggression" upon Belgium's "territorial integrity."

One obvious defect of the earlier draft is supplied by Article V of the revised instrument, thus: "Except where otherwise expressly provided in this Covenant, decisions at any meeting of the Assembly of the Council shall require the agreement of all the members of the League represented at the meeting." Of a similar tendency is Article XXVI as redrafted. It reads as follows:

Amendments to this Covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the League whose representatives compose the Council and by a majority of the members of the League whose representatives compose the Assembly.

Such amendment shall not bind any member of the League which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the League.

Both these alterations of the original Covenant in favor of the principle of national sovereignty are free from apparent ambiguity. Not so much can be said of other changes. One most remarkable omission from the earlier Covenant was that of any provision for withdrawal from the League. Doubtless the omission was not inadvertent, the calculation of the framers of the instrument probably being that, while solidarity of interest must be relied upon to keep the "Big Five" in the League, lesser states could be kept in by the menace of coercion. And the same calculation seems to flicker through the rather opaque language of the following clause from Article I of the new Covenant:

Any member of the League may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the League, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Who is to decide whether a state has fulfilled its international obligations? Unquestionably, the Council of the League, in other words, the "Big Five."

And the demand of many American critics that certain "domestic questions" be specifically excluded from the jurisdiction of the League has been met in similar fashion. Assuming the validity of this demand—and that seems hardly open to question in the case at least of relatively unimportant states—it has hardly been satisfied in the following provision from Article XV:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the Council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the Council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

In the first place, international law does not, so far as I am aware, recognize any matter which "is solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of a particular state, provided such matter has in fact given rise to a dispute with another state. So far as I can discover, international law recognizes—impliedly, of course—just two categories of questions capable of producing international differences, those for which it provides a rule of settlement and those for which it does not. But if we confine the jurisdiction of the League to the former class, we confine it to those disputes for which, by Article XIII of the Covenant, arbitration is the suitable remedy; while if we regard it as extending to the latter class also, we still have our original problem on our hands. But this is by no means the whole of the business. We must remember, in construing this article, that by Article V the Council determines all matters where it is not specifically provided otherwise by the rule of unanimity; and in passing upon the question raised by a plea in abatement of its jurisdiction, it will therefore proceed by the rule of unanimity. It follows from the wording of the provision just quoted that the League will have jurisdiction of any dispute between member states of which the Council does not determine by unanimous vote that it has not jurisdiction; nor will such unanimity ever be obtainable where the disputant bringing the matter before the League is itself a member of the Council.

The "domestic jurisdiction" clause was designed to baffle a kind of criticism which was too formidable to be ignored, without at the same time altering the scheme of the League sufficiently to remove the real grounds of the criticism; and the same must be said of Article XXI of the revised Covenant, which is intended to spike the guns of those who have said that the League puts the Monroe Doctrine in jeopardy. This article reads as follows:

Nothing in this Covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe Doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

The language of this section seems especially ill-chosen except for the purpose of darkening counsel and confusing criticism. The Monroe Doctrine is neither an "international engagement" nor a "regional understanding," as Mr. Carranza has recently been at pains to explain—it is the foreign policy of the United States, and is based primarily, albeit not exclusively, upon the security and self-interest of the United States. Since it is of some antiquity, several meanings have, in the process of time, come to be attached to it, though logically and historically these constitute a single fabricated policy. In its broadest significance the Doctrine means "American questions for America, European questions for Europe." In this sense, obviously, the Doctrine is abandoned the moment we enter the League, for, as Mr. Lodge has pointed out, a fence is hardly preserved by taking it down. More narrowly the Doctrine means that European states (and Asiatic states, too, for that matter) may not acquire new possessions in the Western Hemisphere, from which it follows logically that any transference of soil in the Western Hemisphere involving European (or Asiatic) states must have the previous assent of the United States. Finally, in the Venezuela controversy, President Cleveland insisted on the right of the United States to make itself a party to any dispute between an American and a European state which might lead to a loss of territory by the former to the latter, and upon this precedent Mr. Roosevelt subsequently developed his "Big Stick" doctrine. Now, in which of these senses is the validity of the Monroe Doctrine asserted and safeguarded by Article XXI? It is impossible to say, nor would it appear that the United States has any right to say, since the vote of disputants is not counted in the determination of the recommendations of the Council or the Assembly regarding controversies before them. If, therefore, the Monroe Doctrine is really to be safeguarded against the League, it must be either by reserving some specific interpretation of it from the operation of the League or by a ratification of the Covenant on the part of the United States which is qualified in the same way that our ratification of the Hague Conventions was qualified, by a general reservation of American policy.

Another type of criticism of the Covenant which deserves some attention is that based upon Constitutional grounds. Two principles here come into play. The first is that the treaty-making power (the President with two thirds of a quorum of the Senate advising and consenting) may validly pledge the United States to exercise its powers in a certain way and then if the organ of government to which any of these powers belong does not observe the pledge, the United States has broken its word. The second principle is that the United States Government, being a government of delegated powers, can not transfer those powers to agencies outside the United States Government. And this is not to deny that sovereignty may be abdicated by a body possessing it, wherefore the British Parliament may, if it chooses, transfer all its powers to the Council of the League. But the Congress of the United States is not a sovereign body; the only sovereign body in the United States, the only body capable legally of redistributing the powers of the United States Government or of taking them away to confer them elsewhere is that power which amends the Constitution of the United States.

The section of the League Covenant to which these remarks are most immediately pertinent are the provisions of Article XXIII, which reads as follows:

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the League (A) will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations; (B) will undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control; (C) will entrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; (D) will entrust the League with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest; (E) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communication and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the League. In this connection the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914-1918 shall be in mind; (F) will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

By the tests laid down above, the engagements stipulated in clauses (A), (B), (E) and (F) here are capable of being carried out by the ordinary organs of government in the United States. Not so, however, those stipulated in clauses (C) and (D). These clauses must be interpreted as a pledge by the treaty-making power—provided they are ratified by the Senate—that the people of the United States will amend their Constitution to entrust the powers mentioned therein to the League. It is hardly likely that any such pledge will be carried out.

But an abdication of sovereignty may be none the less real because perhaps technically constitutional, in which connection it is important to weigh the possibilities of Article VIII of the Covenant. This article provides that the Council shall formulate plans for the reduction of armaments for the consideration of the several states, and then proceeds thus:

After these plans shall have been adopted by the several governments, limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the Council.

The argument is made for this provision that the United States is already party to an agreement with Great Britain not to increase its naval armament on the Great Lakes. By the same sign it would be legitimate to treat an act of charity as tantamount to an offer by its author to turn over his entire estate to the public. If sovereignty signifies anything it signifies freedom of choice on the part of government in discharging its principal duties. The unqualified pledge just recited would surrender this freedom of choice on the part of our Government in discharging the elementary duty of defense. Furthermore, its must be remembered that the League does not pretend to provide a peaceable settlement of all disputes, particularly those of graver character. By Article VIII, nevertheless, a state must fight through a war, into which it was possibly plunged on account of the limited scope of the League, with the armament with which it entered such war, unless it can get the unanimous consent of the Council to an increase of armament. Nor is this the only instance in which the League dangerously blends the contradictory qualities of a "strong" league with a "weak" one.

The people of the United States are to-day solicited, in the name of the cause of international peace, to resign permanently that position in the world which they have hitherto occupied with benefit both to themselves and to the rest of mankind. No such sacrifice is necessary; on the contrary, there is good reason for believing that such a sacrifice, if accorded in the form in which it is now required, would prove a serious detriment to this very cause of international peace. If we are to put our trust in the record of the past, there are many things which America stands ready to do in the interest of international peace. She is ready to cooperate in the establishment of an international court of justice, she is ready to cooperate in the clarification and extension of international law, she is ready to submit most kinds of disputes to arbitration, and those which she is unwilling to submit to arbitration she is willing to submit to investigation by impartial boards of inquiry. She is ready to go as far as any state on the path of disarmament. She is ready to lend counsel and friendly effort, whenever they may be required, to the work of preserving and restoring peace. She is ready to aid in repressing criminal disturbers of the world's peace and order. All this the past proves.

But the League of Nations plan exacts that we do much more than this. It exacts that we remain indefinitely the member of a coalition having for its primary purpose the maintenance of a solidarity of interests among its principal members and so a balance of power against another potential coalition, and, for its secondary purpose only, the adjustment of international differences. If, however, we are to judge the future by the past, America will never consent to become partner in any such arrangement; and this for three reasons, first, because she does not choose to be involved in the complications of the world's balance of power; secondly, because she does not care to thrust herself forward as one of a small group of states arrogating to themselves the authority to determine the destinies of other states; thirdly, because she will not sanction in the name of international justice arrangements which are grounded solely on power and selfish interest. The lesson of Shantung—to mention no other feature of the peace settlement—will not be forgotten in a day.

A final word is necessary on an immediately practical question: What action should the Senate take regarding the Covenant? The framers of the League have shown some ingenuity in interweaving the League plan with the Treaty proper. But the difficulty thus created is not insuperable. The Senate has the undoubted right to qualify its ratification of the entire Treaty or any part thereof, whether by limiting it to a term of years or otherwise. Let it, therefore, while making other appropriate reservations, also limit its acceptance of Section I of the Treaty, embodying the League of Nations plan, to three years. In this way the entire Treaty can be put into operation promptly with a minimum of risk from the dangers of the present League plan, and within three years our Government will have ample opportunity to reshape the plan to the fundamental idea of providing a method of adjusting international differences which can claim the confidence of great and small states alike. Despite some appearances to the contrary, the Senate to-day occupies a position of great strategic advantage. May it use it in behalf of two causes which have not heretofore been found to be antagonistic—those of international peace and American independence!

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Correspondence

The Left and the League

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The Covenant of the League of Nations now finds itself threatened from the left as well as the right. The publication of the official summary of the peace treaty with Germany has been followed by an unanticipated and paradoxical realignment of forces. Numerous radicals and internationalists, formerly ardent supporters of the League, and uncompromising antagonists of the proposal that the United States should return to its traditional policy of isolation, are now foremost in denouncing the Covenant, or in demanding amendments by the Senate which would reduce our participation in the responsibilities of the League to virtual nullity. The New Republic joins hands with Senator Lodge; and the Nation is endeavoring earnestly, if not altogether successfully, to rival Harvey's Weekly in the vivacity of its hebdomadal excoriation of President Wilson and his programme. So sober-minded a representative of ethical idealism as Dr. Felix Adler lends his support to the attack; and a group of distinguished British Liberals are reported to have issued a manifesto declaring the treaty offered Germany to be a breach of faith, and apparently implying, if not explicitly asserting, that no covenant which would commit the signers to the enforcement of the provisions of such a treaty should be accepted by Great Britain or America.

Many of the strictures of these critics of the peace terms are palpable exaggerations, made possible only by a singular forgetfulness of both the moral and the material facts of the situation with which the Conference had to deal.

It is, however, not my purpose to attempt to defend the treaty against all criticism. The document, assuredly, is not that ideal compound of justice, magnanimity, and far-seeing prudence for which many had hoped. Some of its provisions, even though not inequitable, are of very questionable expediency; and at least one of them—that relating to Shantung—appears to make all the signatory powers accomplices in a peculiarly shameless act of spoliation. It is, therefore, not surprising that many persons of generous minds, and of too sanguine hopes, should find themselves in a mood of disappointment and disillusionment over the outcome, thus far, of the Conference. Are those who are in this mood justified in joining the enemies of the League? If a man, before the publication of the outline of the treaty, believed the ratification of the covenant by the United States to be desirable, has he now adequate reason to abandon that belief? It is this question which I raise here. With those who have never believed ratification desirable the present discussion is not concerned.

If this country refuses to participate as a fully responsible member in the League, it is obvious that one of two things must follow: either the entire project of a Society of Nations will be abandoned; or else a League consisting chiefly of the European and Asiatic Powers will be formed, and will proceed to function without us. Suppose the former, which is perhaps the more probable of these possible consequences, to result. Supporters of the League have been accustomed to predict that, without a League, Europe would, within half a century, be plunged into another and yet more terrible war. Has that contingent prediction lost any of its likelihood, now that the terms of the settlement with Germany are known? Suppose—though the supposition is, I believe, contrary to fact—that the settlement increases the danger of another disturbance of the world's peace by Germany. Does the increase of the danger make it the less necessary to guard against it? And can any man who has once realized—as those who formerly supported the League must have realized—what another great war would mean, consent to leave aught undone that could in any measure help to avert such a débâcle of civilization? Shall it be said that, even after all the horrors and iniquities of the past five years, those who liked to call themselves "idealists" and lovers of their kind, chose—not blindly, like others, but with open eyes—to aid in making that final ruin of humanity inevitable?

Suppose, on the other hand, that a League is formed. Is it more likely to be an effectual safeguard of peace, of international law, and of international fair-dealing, if the United States holds aloof from it? Will America be in a better position to serve those ends outside the League than in it? Shall we have a more potent voice in the affairs of the nations if we refuse to have any part in their common counsels, or to assume any real share of the burdens and the risks which international coöperation, like every other form of coöperation between human beings, involves? Can the very modest beginning of a better international order, which is all that the League now proposed is, be expected to develop more sanely and prosperously, if the spirit and ideals of our Republic have no influence upon its development? It is difficult to see how any man who has ever urged our entering the League can be in any doubt as to the proper answers to these questions.

There is, however, one argument which seems to have greatly impressed those who once favored but now oppose American acceptance of the Covenant. It is the argument from the experience of the American delegation at the Paris Conference. That experience shows, it is said, that in any League the representatives of the United States could exercise no real influence in favor of reasonableness or justice, but would simply "be so pocketed as to count as a sure thing in the calculation of the diplomats." "If any one thinks," writes the New Republic, "that the United States under these conditions is going to have a rôle in readjusting the settlement or of affecting the war-making propensities of European governments, let him consider the majestic impotence of Mr. Wilson in Paris at a time when the effects of American military and economic intervention had not entirely worn off." This argument expresses both a false conception of what has been going on at Paris and a false analogy between the present Conference and a future League of Nations. "Majestic impotence" is a pretty phrase, but it can hardly fail, when applied to Mr. Wilson, to evoke a rather wry smile in Paris, even in certain high quarters. The treaty is manifestly the outcome of a compromise, in which Mr. Wilson has yielded some points upon which he would have wished to insist—and perhaps some points which he could have gained by a more courageous or a better placed insistence. But nothing can be less in accord with the facts than to imply, as the New Republic does, that there have not been concessions on both sides, or that the treaty as finally drawn up is not enormously different from what it would have been if our Government had from the first had no hand in the business. If any one wishes to know what the settlement with Germany would have been without American participation in the armistice and the Conference, let him first read the provisions of the secret treaties between the Allied Governments, and then ascertain from some competent informant what the demands originally made at the Conference by some of those governments were.

Nor is there any close analogy between the conditions under which the Paris Conference has worked and those under which a League of Nations might be expected to work. For, in the first place, the negotiations at Paris have been constantly conducted under the shadow of the secret treaties. It can hardly be doubted that the reason why President Wilson felt compelled to yield on Shantung was the existence of understandings between Japan and the other powers which seemed to them too explicit and binding to be broken; or that the reason why he had French and British support in his position with regard to Fiume was that, on this point, those Powers were without prior commitments. But, by the very terms of the League Covenant, no such secret agreements, in conflict with its principles, would be binding. And, in the second place, the whole state of mind of the Conference, and of the European peoples concerned in it, has been abnormal. Fear has prompted some of the demands which have seemed to Americans most unreasonable—the hysterical fear of people who have just escaped ruin by a hair's breadth and who snatch hastily at anything which seems to promise protection against a recurrence of the danger. International hatreds, too, are bound to be at their maximum intensity at the close of a war—and of such a war! And beyond all this, the number and prodigious complexity of the problems which had to be solved, all at a single time and in haste, while the spectre of Revolution looked in at the window, created unique temptations and opportunities for reckless chauvinist groups who were willing to gamble with the world's peace in the hope of national aggrandizement; while responsible statesmen who felt an early peace and a prompt return to normal domestic conditions to be all-important were, by the same situation, tempted to perhaps too ready compromises. If, then, the settlement is not all that could well have been wished, it is, fairly considered, a great deal better than might naturally have been expected to emerge from such a situation. And the conditions which produced it could not conceivably be duplicated at any future session of the Executive Council, or the body of delegates, of a League of Nations—unless there should be another general war.

ARTHUR O. LOVEJOY

Baltimore, Md., May 29

Book Reviews

Illusions Concerning Alsace-Lorraine

ALSACE-LORRAINE SINCE 1870. By Barry Cerf. New York: The Macmillan Company.

PROFESSOR Cerf's interesting and valuable contribution to the problem of Alsace-Lorraine can hardly be regarded as the final treatment of this long vexed question. The very circumstances of its composition, apparently at high speed, during the short interval between our entrance into the war and the author's exchange of his professorial gown for his country's uniform—Professor Cerf has become Captain Cerf—would seem to preclude any such finality. It is evident, moreover, that the book was written before the complete wreck of German ambitions, and while it was still thought that in a negotiated peace Germany might attempt to exchange her claims on Alsace-Lorraine for wide-reaching concessions in the East, or secure an apparent confirmation of these claims under the specious device of a plebiscite. It is in the spirit of a frank partisan rather than an impartial judge that Professor Cerf attacks these claims and protests against this device. His work, it must be said, contrasts unfavorably in clearness of exposition and sobriety of tone with such a standard piece of historical composition as Hazen's "Alsace-Lorraine under German Rule." On the other hand we are indebted to Professor Cerf for the inclusion of many facts not found in the earlier work, in particular for the revelation of German military tyranny in the provinces during the war, for his demolition of the German claim that annexation had brought prosperity to the two provinces, for his constant reference to sources, and for the appended bibliography.

There are certain misconceptions, due originally to German teachings and German sympathizers and still prevalent among too many of our people, concerning the simple act of justice which restores Alsace-Lorraine to France. These misconceptions may be briefly summarized somewhat in this way. Alsace-Lorraine originally belonged to Germany and was wrested from her piecemeal, through force and fraud, by France, and in consequence the annexation of the two provinces in 1871 was merely Germany's resumption of her own. Further, the two provinces had flourished exceedingly under German rule, the first natural resentment at their forcible transference had died out except in the hearts of a few intransigents comparable to our unreconstructed citizens of the South, and the demand for their return was prompted, mainly, if not entirely, by the spirit of revanche in France. And finally, admitting the possibility of a wrong and the necessity of redress, the only proper solution was to leave the whole matter to the inhabitants themselves to decide the future political connection of the provinces by a plebiscite, a solution that not unnaturally commended itself to the simple American belief in the rule of the majority.

That these conceptions are false, and this solution impossible to the point of absurdity is a matter of historical fact and of simple demonstration. And the value of such books as Hazen's and Cerf's lies in the proof drawn from past history and present conditions of their falsity and absurdity.

In the first place there never was an entity of Alsace-Lorraine originally German and wrongfully annexed to France. In the Middle Ages and during the period which saw the formation of the present nationalities there was not an Alsace, a Lorraine, nor a Germany in the sense in which we use the terms to-day. The territory which we entitle Alsace-Lorraine was in those days divided into innumerable districts, some essentially French, some German, all owing a vague allegiance to the Holy Roman Empire. French absorption began as early as 1552, when Metz, Verdun, and Toul were ceded to France by the Protestant princes of North Germany in return for her support against the Catholic and Spanish Emperor Charles V. It is a long way back to 1552 and it is a mere matter of history to say that from that date till 1871 Metz was as French as Paris. In somewhat the same fashion the French entered Alsace at the invitation of the Protestant Germans to protect them against Austrian and Spanish despotism, and at the close of the Thirty Years' War the Emperor formally ceded to France all his rights in Alsace. It was not until 1681, however, that Strassburg became French, not until 1798 that the free city of Mulhouse, formerly connected with the Swiss cantons, petitioned for annexation to the French Republic. The seizure of Strassburg by Louis XIV in a time of profound peace is one of the greatest blots on his reign, but it is a crime long since condoned by the sufferers. During the French Revolution Strassburg became, in her own words, one of the bulwarks of French liberty. Whatever sympathy for Germany lingered in the provinces was wholly effaced by the experiences of this great age, and since then the inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine, whatever might be their origin, descent, or language, have known themselves to be politically and spiritually French.

The German claim to have promoted the economic prosperity of the two provinces has no foundation in truth. It is not usual for a prosperous country to lose a large proportion of its inhabitants by emigration, but figures based upon German statistics show that over 40 per cent. of the original inhabitants have left Alsace-Lorraine since 1870. The increase of population in the provinces since that date has been due, therefore, wholly to German immigration, to the hordes of soldiers, officials, and exploiters that have been poured in upon them; and even this increase has been notably less than that of all the other states in the German Empire, less than one-fourth that of Saxony, less than one-third that of Prussia. The increase of taxation, on the other hand, has been stupendous. Between 1870 and 1914 the budget rose over 100 per cent. and the public debt, non-existent in 1870, amounted in 1910 to over 52 million marks. It is eminently characteristic of German methods that money wrung by taxes from the Alsations was used for the erection of monuments to their conquerors. Thus a sum of 300,000 francs was appropriated to bolster up a tardy popular subscription for a monument to Wilhelm I at Strassburg. The iron ores of Lorraine have been exploited solely for the benefit of Prussian industries; the raw material has been almost entirely shipped out of Lorraine to be worked up in the manufacturing centres of the Rhineland. As a result the population of Metz has remained practically stationary since 1870, while that of Düsseldorf, for example, has increased five-fold. In French Lorraine, on the other hand, Nancy, the manufacturing centre for French factories, has increased her population over a hundred per cent. Instead of promoting the prosperity of Alsace-Lorraine, Germany has treated these provinces exactly as she has treated all other, that is, she has ruthlessly exploited them for her own benefit.

If such things were done during the long peace between Germany and France, what has happened in Alsace-Lorraine since the outbreak of the war? As might have been expected the provinces have experienced a reign of terror. Long before 1914 the German police had prepared a blacklist of prominent inhabitants to be promptly expelled or imprisoned in case of war. This was to prevent any possible uprising in support of France; an interesting refutation of the German claim that Alsace-Lorraine was German at heart. When the 40th regiment of German Landwehr crossed the border into Alsace, in 1914, Captain Fischer gave the order to his men, Geladen, wir sind jetzt in Feindlande! (Load arms, we are now in the enemy's country!) The destruction of the little villages of Boutzwiller and Dalheim is a pathetic replica in miniature of the sack of Louvain. Military tribunals composed of German soldiers and officers were established throughout the country for the punishment of offences against military law; and these tribunals have imposed, in all, imprisonments amounting to some 8,000 years.

It is not to be wondered at that Franco-ophile Alsatians fled the country to escape such terrors. It is estimated that over 15,000 young men who had served in the German army and would have been called to the ranks again, escaped to France during the first few weeks of the war. Those who were unable to escape and were forced to serve proved themselves, in the eyes of their masters, thoroughly untrustworthy. The names of three hundred deserters from one Alsatian brigade were published in a proclamation of December, 1915. Only the fact that regiments from the Reichsland were sent as a rule to the Eastern front, or kept in reserve, prevented desertions en masse. Even so, some 30,000 Alsace-Lorrainers are said to have deserted during the first three years of the war.

In view of these facts, a detailed account of which would fill a whole number of the Review, the German proposal for a plebiscite—a proposal never put forward until the most blinded Germans recognized their impending ruin—is absurd and impossible. Who is to conduct such a referendum? Harden, the first German who ventured to suggest it, proposed that it should be held three years after the war under German supervision. It does not require any high degree of intelligence to calculate the fashion in which Germany would conduct the preliminary campaign nor any gift of prophecy to foretell the result. And who would be the voters in such a referendum? Would the thousands of inhabitants who have deserted, been deported, or denationalized during the war be recalled for such a purpose? What would be the rights of the still surviving emigrants? They voted against German rule in the beginning by preferring voluntary exile. Should they be deprived of the right of voting at the final and free decision of the provinces? What would be the status of the German immigrants, officials, school-teachers and others engaged for years in the congenial task of Germanizing the provinces? It would seem the height of injustice to allow a German immigrant to vote, while debarring an Alsatian emigrant whose post he had usurped. And how long a period of residence in the provinces would qualify a true-born Prussian to express an impartial opinion in the sacred matter of "self-determination"? The only fair method, it would seem, of conducting such a plebiscite would be to return the provinces to France for a period as long as that which German rule enjoyed, allow her to use her own methods for Gallicizing, as Germany has used hers for Germanizing the inhabitants, and at the end of the term hold a plebiscite under neutral supervision. But half a century is rather too long to wait for the final determination of this question. The open sore of Europe can not be allowed to fester for another generation.

And finally, a plebiscite, at any time and under any form, would be a condonation of the wrong done to France and the provinces in 1871. They were forcibly and unrighteously wrested from France at that time. Germany had no right to them then, and has acquired no rights by possession, no more than to the districts of northern France occupied during the war. The possession of Alsace-Lorraine has been for nearly half a century the symbol of triumphant might; at the very beginning of his reign Wilhelm II declared that Germany would prefer to leave her eighteen army corps dead on the field rather than surrender a stone of the land his father had conquered. In no other way can the utter ruin of her ideal of armed force be so convincingly brought home to Germany as by the prompt and unconditional return of the provinces to France. This is a lesson that is needed, possibly not for Germany alone. The treaty of peace which returns Alsace-Lorraine to France is at once an act which redresses a grievous wrong committed in the past, and proclaims a warning for the future that henceforth, to quote the words of the original protest of Alsace-Lorraine, "the world can not allow a people to be seized like a herd of cattle."

Hose Play and a Rill

BLIND ALLEY. By W. L. George. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.
THE UNDEFEATED. By J. C. Snaith. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

IF war has not put the Flibbertigibbet School of British letters out of countenance, or even greatly modified the nature of its antics, these seem now and then, as it were, to have been frozen in mid-air. We get at times the impression of a professional jauntiness suddenly rigid in its attitude of arrested humor—of a figure half-startled, and listening with ill-concealed irritation to a humorless and somewhat menacing din in the immediate neighborhood. What if it were really not a time for antics! Mr. Shaw chose to pooh-pooh the supposition—and pretty well lost his audience. Mr. Wells had never gambolled consciously in his life. He knew a serious rumpus when he saw it, and this one he had specifically foretold. What next? was the exciting question: the answer, or answers, as always with this inquirer, followed upon its heels. Swiftly and successively he discovered patriotism, and fatherhood, and God, and guaranteed them all as excellent. Having thus reached a sort of climax, he fell relatively silent upon the war, and presently got back his spirits by the most stupendous bit of anti-Victorian chat thus far poured forth by him under any (or no) provocation. "Joan and Peter" has helped reassure us as to the stability of our shaken world. It seems there are still social conventions, and family shams, and educational systems, and governments and bureaucracies that need bombarding. Squibs are still great fun. The grave of Queen Victoria is still here for us to dance on. Self and sex also are yet with us in, so to speak, the raw state: with them Mr. Bennett, displaying a kind of cold ardor, has recently sought refuge in "The Pretty Lady."

And now in "Blind Alley" that younger Georgian performer, W. L. George, sums up the whole matter according to his lights—England in wartime, her thoughts, her fears, her valor, her meanness, her dreams, her females. The last-named in particular; for by a not uncommon paradox this professed and talkative feminist has an Oriental contempt for women. He sees them as playmates, as parasites, above all as wantons, whether secretly or in the open—"the sex" in a very humble sense. There are three women in "Blind Alley," Lady Oakley and her daughters, Monica and Sylvia. The mother is a robust and independent person, to the eye and ear; but the only moment when her creator is thoroughly interested in her is that in which she vainly signals to her devoted but aging mate her desire for the passion of their youth. That is her moment of tragedy. Sylvia, the oldest daughter, inherits her physique and adds to it much "temperament," if we use that word in its debased current meaning. She is a wanton in one syllable, who keeps barely within the letter of the social law, making her fleshly gains under cover of the war itself. Monica, the second girl, represented as virginal and Diana-like, is quite ready to become the casual mistress of a married man, and only escapes by grace of the man's own whim. As for the sex in general, our sensitive Sir Hugh, gentleman and scholar and by chance husband or father of these particular females, thus sums it up in their presence: "Do you know? I think you women rather enjoy this war, and that's why you like the wounded. You're savage creatures. The idea of blood excites you." . . . "Hugh! [cries Lady Oakley, obviously flattered] how can you be so horrid." . . . "I may be horrid, but it's true. War to you is like a rattling good railway novel, a serial story with a frightful instalment in every morning's paper. War gives you all the heroism, and excitement, and color, and horror that you miss in your ordinary lives. To women war is the grand international cinema." This, to be sure, is only one of the thousand notions that come into Sir Hugh's handsome head in the course of these pages. He has the chameleon mind of your true Wellsian. About the war, and England's place in it, and the world of its making, he thinks all possible thoughts, snatches at all possible footholds. But we leave him groping in his blind alley. He has no hope of labor, or trust in socialism, "an alternative tyranny." At best, the vague dream that comes to him is based on ancient traditions of class: "His vision was feudal; he would have liked a country run by trustee aristocrats, who would live no more splendidly than their servants, but would live for them, for the honor of leading them, for the privilege of helping them, for the joy of seeing rise factories rich in beauty and schools rich in culture." . . . Who knows?

It is pleasant for the normal reader to be aware occasionally, above the soap-box oratory, and diffuse intellectualism, and official revolt of these "new novelists" of England, of a voice inviting him to try a different sort of journey; to turn from the blind alley of "fact," peopled with complacent wandering figures and echoing with shrill yet muffled Anglo-Russo-Gallic accents, and to set out upon a straight road in hopeful company. J. C. Snaith has been a writer of his time, has set a tentative foot on various paths. There are odd points of contrast between "Henry Northcote," published in 1906, and his latest story, "The Undefeated." The elaborate Stevensonian style of the earlier book, its sardonic mood, its queer blend of allegory and gross naturalism, mark it as an experiment of its period. Since then the writer has fallen under later influences of style. "The Undefeated" is done in the plain, brisk, pointed, quasi-vernacular manner which has come to be a common medium among his contemporaries. But in this story, at least, he has escaped the other current influences of which we have been speaking—the tendency to enlarge doubt and denial and revolt into positive virtues, and to dissolve all moral and spiritual certitudes under a persistent hose-play of glistening words. The book is "dedicated respectfully to 'a decent and a dauntless people.'" It pictures an England blundering into war, muddling through, by no means free from false motives or unworthy methods, yet on the whole strong and faithful in her task, and in many ways the better for its imposition. The war is needed to make over Josiah Munt, plebeian magnate of Blackhampton, to convert him from money-beast and political schemer to valued and honest public servant; from paternal despot and neighborhood bully to father and friend. It makes over Bill Hollis, his feckless son-in-law, the good-hearted and not ignoble dreamer drifting in middle age towards mental and physical sottishness: gives him self-respect and the will to serve, and the love, too, of the wife who has despised him. The gross blood in Munt is clarified, the good blood in Hollis recovers its potency; and the former potman is to be remembered as "Sergeant Hollis, who had died a soldier and a gentleman that his faith and his friends might live." The episode of his unforced intimacy and natural kinship with the great painter, "Stanning, R. A.," his comrade at the front, is conveyed with a delicate sympathy which keeps unerringly to its hair's breadth remove from sentimentalism. For simplicity of conception, firmness of touch, and a certain glowing quality which we may call idealism, or faith, or optimism, such a book stands half a world apart from the faintly exotic commentaries, the shrugging inquiries and flashing inconclusions of the Cannans, the Mackenzies, and the Georges.

H. W. BOYNTON

Contemporary Mexico

MEXICO: TODAY AND TOMORROW. By E. D. Trowbridge. New York: The Macmillan Company.

AMID so much that is sensational concerning Mexico it is a relief to turn to this book. Nowhere are the facts of contemporary Mexico set forth with greater fairness, nor are the Mexican revolutionists characterized with less prejudice. The author has traveled widely in Mexico, he has had access to official sources, and he apparently possesses that indispensable gift granted to few Americans—a sympathetic understanding of the Mexican people. His chief sources of information, to be sure, have been members of the party of the revolution, Señores Cabrera, Bonillas, Guiterrez, Basave, and Nieto, and in view of this, one might expect a somewhat laudatory account of the present Government. With a few exceptions and more noticeable omissions, however, the account is accurate and unbiassed. It is the best short account of Mexico's present problems that has appeared.

The book may be divided roughly into three parts of approximately ninety pages each. The first part presents a brief sketch of Mexican history up to the revolution against Diaz; the second part recounts the main facts in connection with the six revolutionary years from 1911 to 1916, and the third deals with the problems and policies of the present "Constitutionalist" Government. The expenditure of one-third of the book upon historical retrospect would be excessive if it were not so well done. It is almost as interesting as the best pages of Prescott, and will bring a thrill of pleasure even to the seasoned student of Mexican history. One important omission is the failure to mention the name of Limantour. It is difficult to understand such an omission on the part of an author who recognizes the very great importance of finance in Mexican affairs. No other single name is so indelibly stamped upon governmental institutions, and his work has been so inextricably woven into Mexican financial institutions that even the Revolution has found it necessary to accept a large part of his best contributions.

The second part of the book, in addition to presenting a brief account of the recent revolution, describes the political conditions of the old régime, furnishing herewith a brief treatment of some social and hygienic conditions, and of the agrarian problem. It is well written and interesting. It contains little that is new to the reader of Mexican literature and the daily newspaper, but it serves as an excellent summary for those who wish to refresh their recollections of recent Mexican history. Incidentally the writer's presentation of facts suggests some capital conclusions, which though not new to students of the Mexican problem may be surprising to some in this country; the seeds of the Mexican revolution were not found solely in the abuses of the Diaz régime, but for the most part were planted much further back in history; the land problem, while acute, arises not simply from the concentration of land ownership in the hands of the few, but largely from the nature of the land and the climate of Mexico. The problem of poverty, and the general low standard of living, sickness and the high death rate are due not principally to the intervention of foreign capital or to the type of government established by Diaz, but have continued in spite of these; Madero, the idealist, was less suited to the task of giving Mexico a stable government than a strong man such as Huerta, even though the ethics of the latter might not accord with American standards; Madero's disposition of the land proved a lamentable failure, many of the peons to whom the land was given having sold it at the first opportunity for a song; and we might add that however well intended the ideals of American statesmen may have been, the American interference that deprived Mexico of her only strong man is believed by many Mexicans to have been responsible for much of the bloodshed that followed the expulsion of Huerta.

The third part of the book is devoted to the problems of the present Government, with chapters on the new constitution, the financial and capital needs, and the agrarian problem. In many ways this part of the book is not the most satisfactory, although it must be admitted that it deals with some of the most difficult aspects of the problem. With a few striking omissions, the author has, however, considered these problems with remarkable fairness and lack of prejudice. He is sympathetic with the present Government and yet not blind to the weaknesses of its programme. Mexico has been in sore need of a sympathetic friend that had the courage to tell her the whole truth in unmistakable language. Mr. Trowbridge is evidently a sympathetic friend, and he has tried in a somewhat gentle, too gentle, way to point out mistakes in policy. The following quotation concerning the new constitution is typical:

It is quite true that the constitution is idealistic, and that in aiming at ideals practical considerations of application to existing conditions have been ignored. It is equally true that some of the Utopian plans would be difficult to carry through even under a highly developed social scheme, and far less likely to succeed under prevailing conditions in Mexico. However, the number of these radical provisions is limited. The work, as a whole, contains much less matter subject for criticism than first impressions, gained from common hearsay, would convey.

All of which is true, and yet it is such a statement as is calculated to sooth the Mexicans into inaction rather than to spur them on to the repeal or "interpretation" of the vicious clauses. Could he not have written with frankness, thus: Ninety-five per cent. of the constitution is good and should be retained, but five per cent. of it is not only Utopian but vicious; it is clearly inimical to the best interests of the Mexican people; it complicates domestic problems and impedes friendly relations with foreign peoples. The most pressing problem for Mexico is to repeal these obnoxious clauses, or if political conditions will not permit their repeal, to "interpret" them in the light of reason.

In the same way the author has glided gently over the petroleum problem, the forced loans from the banks, and the repudiation of the Huerta loan. We fail to find any clear indication of the extent to which the solution of many of Mexico's most pressing problems depends upon the introduction of foreign capital. He presents some interesting aspects of the agrarian situation, yet he fails to show that the land, contrary to popular opinion, is something more than a problem arising from the concentration of land in the hands of a few; that much of the land is of such a nature that only large capitalistic enterprises can successfully handle it. He mentions labor as the greatest of all problems in Mexico, and yet he fails to point out the fact that the situation is largely what it is because of the low productivity of the laborer himself, and that this low productivity is in turn due in large part to the lack of capital in Mexico. While he devotes a good chapter to the question of foreign capital and points out the importance of treating foreign investors with fairness, he appears to be of the impression that the necessary capital for the rehabilitation of Mexico may come from within Mexico herself. This is a surprising observation from one who is usually so well informed.

The suggestion of the author that Mexico might treat her foreign obligations like a bankrupt corporation is highly interesting. Such a plan would doubtless succeed in scaling down her present obligations and in so far as it reduced her fixed charges would enable her to get on her feet at an earlier date. But how about her future credit? When Mexico goes into the world's markets for capital, will she not pay dear for such a policy? Will not conservative investment eschew her shores and will not radical investment, in so far as it is willing to invest at all, amortize the possibility of future scaling down by increasing the interest rate and by taking only the most profitable investments? It is possible, to be sure, that some scheme for re-organizing the railroads which shall entail a material reduction of the amount of the capitalization may be wise, but to consider the Government in the aspect of a bankrupt corporation in view of Mr. Trowbridge's very optimistic picture of the vast resources of Mexico is, to say the least, unexpected.

Quaker Politicians

POLITICAL LEADERS OF PROVINCIAL PENNSYLVANIA. By Isaac Sharpless. New York: The Macmillan Company.

A pugnacious politician from Wales, named David Lloyd, was the acknowledged leader, not of the British Parliament in 1919, but of the Pennsylvania Assembly in 1694 and for a considerable part of the time following until his death in 1731. A Quaker, he fought fiercely against allowing the Province to be involved in war; a non-resistant, he vigorously opposed any encroachment upon the prerogatives of the representatives of the people. Nor did his temperament keep him out of the Chief Justiceship of the Province, which, like another Quaker a few years later, he held simultaneously with the Speakership. He is perhaps the most "human" figure of the eight political leaders, beginning with William Penn and ending with John Dickinson, whom President Sharpless has grouped.

Despite Penn's benevolent intentions, the political situation in his Province bore a certain resemblance to that in England under the Stuarts. His Deputy Governors were often ill-chosen, so that there was usually a contest between them and the Assembly. At one period this contest resolved itself into a struggle between adherents and opponents of Penn. The Assembly, ordinarily united against the Deputy Governor, was divided, and the next election saw the defeat of the opponents of the Proprietor. When his unworthy sons succeeded to the inheritance, the Assembly was again united in opposition until it was proposed to appeal to the Crown to be placed directly under its control. This was felt by the shrewder Quakers to be leaping from the frying pan into the fire, an attitude that rapidly became general as the Stamp Act and similar measures were passed, although Franklin was twice sent to England to urge the transfer. The spectacle of the un-mystical philosopher coöperating with Quakers is not without piquancy.

As President Sharpless remarks, it would be interesting to have information upon the political methods of the Quakers. How did they choose their nominees for the Assembly? There was no difficulty about electing them, for even when Friends became a small minority in parts of the Province, their nominees received overwhelming majorities. One may hazard the guess that what obviously went on in the Assembly took place in its formation; that is to say, there was a good deal of "follow my leader." Most of the Friends were simple-minded, unambitious, without experience in affairs. They naturally listened to the advice of the few well-educated, conspicuously successful of their number, particularly as that advice was plainly directed to the ends that they all had in view. So aggressive a leader as David Lloyd may well have had a "slate" which he gently suggested name by name in the three counties which with Philadelphia sent representatives to the Assembly.

The most eminent of the eight men considered in this volume was not a Quaker. John Dickinson had among his distinctions that of having been Governor of two Colonies, Delaware and Pennsylvania, serving them in turn while a citizen of the former, although Philadelphia had been the scene of the literary and forensic efforts that give him his chief title to fame. His association with Friends grew closer in his latter years, and he came to use the "plain language" in all his intercourse.

President Sharpless's book suffers in its first part from an intrusion of matter relating to Friends rather than to the leaders that are ostensibly being presented. There is also some unnecessary repetition. On the whole, however, he succeeds in giving not simply a series of portraits but a picture in which the several individuals fall into their places. They were attempting a unique task: to govern in accordance with principles that most persons would say were better adapted to a better world. President Sharpless is concerned to show how far and how they managed to discharge what they conceived to be their duty, where and why they failed. The "Holy Experiment" virtually came to an end in 1756, when most of the Friends refused to allow themselves to be elected to the Assembly. This was on account of the growing tension between the Indians and the whites, which they could not relieve, since they could not control the attitude or the acts of Pennsylvanians who knew not Penn.

The Run of the Shelves

THRILLING is not the word that can ordinarily be applied to archaeological discovery. It suits well enough the unearthing of a great treasure of fourth century church plate on Mr. Arthur J. Balfour's Scottish Estate. These broken and oxidized chalices, bearing such designs as Adam and Eve by the Tree of Knowledge, The Magi Adoring the Christ Child, and the Miraculous Draught of Fishes—are dated by Roman coins of the end of the fourth century. The treasure was carefully hidden, presumably against the forays of the still pagan Picts and Scots. These venerable relics are a full century older than St. Patrick and the Missionaries of Iona. They represent the gradual infiltration of Latin Christianity into Britain. What light the discovery will cast on one of the obscurest chapters of history must await the report of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. It is known that there was a Celtic British church long before St. Augustine and the Irish missionaries. It has been surmised that the Romans, with their usual intolerance of the more cruel superstitions, put down the native Druidism by force, and that Christianity dribbled in, not by organized effort of the church but incidentally, with the legionaries from Agricola's day to that of Constantine. It was in the name of this old church that Arthur dux Brythonum made a last stand against the pagan Saxons. The discovery at Traprain Ale should help clear up a twilight realm as to which, exceptionally, legend is nearly as silent as history itself.

That the small pickings of Walter Pater would be worth while was the conviction of Messrs. Boni and Liveright when they got together the attractive pocket volume "Sketches and Reviews." The result fairly justifies the hope. Stylistically Pater is rarely so much at his ease as he appears in the review of Lemaitres' "Serenus and Other Tales." The review of William Morris's poems gives some illumination of mediævalism in general. Pater writes with singular justness of observation and as singular joltings of style: "Of the things of nature the mediæval mind had a deep sense; but its sense of them was not objective, no real escape to the world without us. The aspects and motions of nature only reinforced its [the mediæval mind's] prevailing mood, and were in conspiracy with one's brain against one." Meaty but difficult matter. Two reviews of Flaubert, one on Coleridge as a Theologian, an odd brace on Wordsworth and Oscar Wilde; a more appropriate brace on Arthur Symons and George Moore (as art critic) make up the review of a somewhat thin but delicate repast.

Max Beerbohm's "A Christmas Garland," of which a new printing comes to us from Dutton, contrives to keep its freshness. Of all the parodies launched against that most tempting of all such marks, Henry James, is there a better one than that which opens Mr. Beerbohm's volume? "It was with the sense of a, for him, very memorable something that he peered"—along with his little sister at their Christmas stockings! The other parodies are not all so good as this, that of George Moore distinctly below it, but the reader who has not yet thrust his head into this garland has yet a joy to savor.

Our attention has been called to the fact that Mrs. W. A. Gillespie's translation of "Sangre y Arena" ("Blood and Sand"), by Blasco Ibáñez, recently reviewed in these columns, is not the first effort to bring this striking Spanish novel to the attention of the American public. On further enquiry we find that it was given an English dress by Frances Douglas under the title "Blood of the Arena" and published by A. C. McClurg and Company of Chicago, in November, 1911.

Any book about Boswell and his Johnson is pretty sure to be a good book because there will be so much Boswell in it. Mr. S. C. Roberts admits him with open arms to his "Story of Doctor Johnson," recently issued by the Cambridge University Press. Supreme as Boswell's great biography unquestionably is, cumulative and finally overwhelming, its strong point is not its structure. An introductory volume, therefore, which devotes successive chapters to the different periods of Johnson's life, to his household, his clubs, his daily life, and to each of his principal friends is quite in place; especially when the form of the little book exhibits as excellent taste as the matter. Even he whose pencil has left a continuous track through the six volumes of Birckbeck Hill can spend a pleasant half hour with it. For those whose knowledge of Johnson is derived chiefly from Macaulay, which seems to be the case with most young people, the invitation here extended to explore more widely in Boswell should prove irresistible.

"War Verse," edited by Frank Foxcroft and published by Crowell, has grown in size and attained to a seventh printing. Like the Dictionary, it is not a work to be read through at a sitting even though it does not often change the subject. Here in its fullness and at its highest is the reaction of the English-speaking world to the ordeal just past. It is a record to which the future must continually return and which it will be grateful to find in such convenient form.

Two little text-books in French which have alighted on our table have prefaces over which reflection may momentarily poise. The first, a French reader, with the peach-blossom title of "La Belle France," edited by A. de Monvert (Allyn and Bacon), propitiates beginners by offering them a French disencumbered of idiom. It is not exactly a French with the French left out, but a French Anglophile in spirit, emphasizing common traits, a French under the flatiron, a French without creases, a French standardized and rationalized to the point that will make it puerile to the reason of the world at large. Nothing could be more obliging. We have been searching for a long time for a foreign language that would meet us half way.

Miss Noelia Dubrule, in her "Le Français pour tous" (Ginn and Company), will admit no translations of French into English, because translation is an artifice. The premise is indisputable; translation is an artifice. But the expulsion of artifice is a large order; it would virtually apply the torch to civilization. Miss Dubrule, it appears, is a high-school teacher. Suppose a hater of artifice in conveyance should abolish the street-car in which she rides to her classes, and a hater of artifice in apparel should appropriate the shoes which made the walk endurable. Suppose that the reformers should next abolish that artifice called a high-school, in which Miss Dubrule's bread is honestly and usefully earned, and that other artifice known as a text-book, through which the range of her helpfulness is presently to broaden. The dislodgment of artifice will be a hard task; it will be even more troublesome, possibly, than learning French in the old way.

An instructor in a Western college has published an edition of Stevenson's "Inland Voyage" and "Travels with a Donkey." We presume he is a conscientious teacher, quite sincere in the hope his preface expresses that the students who use the book may absorb by contact a modicum of the Stevensonian felicity. Yet the English in which that hope is voiced is pitiful to a degree which brings out the recalcitrancy of the human mind to delicate example with a clearness which charity itself could not dispute. To Stevenson's grace and felicity this man is opaque, yet he has read Stevenson with something that he calls pleasure, has found qualities in his work which he is able to describe to himself as felicity and grace. He belongs to a type that is none the less curious for being probably not in the least rare—the type that is docile to a fault and is wholly unteachable.

Drama

“John Ferguson” and “Hamlet”

“JOHN FERGUSON” is a play of power. Reservations must ensue, but that is the initial, grateful, and irrevocable word. On the score of dramatic tendency, its leadership is sane. Its emphases are soundly based on passion, crisis, individuality, and its universality is flavored, not enfeebled, by the localism of its racy Irish setting. The Ireland which it depicts is a singular place where the decencies and pieties, though powerful, can adjust themselves to rape and murder with an assimilative readiness that reminds one of the book of Genesis. That book is further recalled in the person of John Ferguson himself, in whom the patriarchs find a successor and the Sermon on the Mount a belated champion. There are a son and daughter over whom the mortgage on the family property lowers grimly in the threat of a loveless marriage for the girl and the son's enforced renunciation of the ministry for farm work. The father's religion, which is central in the drama, is subjected to two cruel tests: the violation of the daughter by the holder of the mortgage and the son and brother's retaliation by murder. The unforgivable thing both in the father and the play is that his religion should withstand the first of these tests and succumb to the second. A man who warns his daughter's ravisher of the approach of vengeance is pardonable and endurable only on the understanding that his Christianity is nature-proof. A fatherhood that conquers religion beside a guilty and imperilled son is inexcusable for its failure to conquer religion in the presence of an outraged daughter. It is the weakness and misfortune of St. John Ervine that, having drawn credible and likable human beings, he should permit them to be actuated by motives which are half unbelievable and half revolting. Andrew, the son, supplies a second illustration. A man who allows the maunderings of a half-crazed beggar to impel him to the crime to which he was not impelled by the discovery of his sister's shame, in passing from forbearance to violence, merely substitutes one ignominy for another.

The hand of Mr. Ervine is vigorous, but inexpert. This comes out in the fact that between Andrew's deed in the second act and his confession in the fourth the Fergusons are almost unemployed, and Jimmie Caesar, the girl's lover, on whom suspicion first fixes, steps into the vacant foreground. It is not Jimmie Caesar's play, and his appropriation of the third act is an impertinence which reminds us of the depredations of Clutie John on the larder and house-room of the remonstrant, but unresistant, Mrs. Ferguson. Mrs. Ferguson, in whom the modulation is exquisite, Jimmie Caesar, in whom truth and comedy fraternize, and Clutie John are the salient portraits in the group.

The acting of the Theatre Guild in the Garrick Theatre must be praised with some reserve. There were perfect moments of collective felicity, when the acutest tension was brought about by methods of exalted quietness. There were strong parts, especially those of Rollo Peters as Andrew, whose voice, except in its spates and spasms, was ideal, and of Dudley Digges as Jimmie Caesar, whose playing, always vigilant and versatile, was at moments of inspired veracity. The setting was flawless. But the play offers a difficult problem. Actors are taught, and rightly taught, to bring out a play. They are scarcely blamable for being maladroit in the handling of a powerful, but amateurish play like “John Ferguson,” which needs to be kept in as well as brought out. Its dilatoriness, its shift of centre, were accentuated, not lightened, in the performance, and the insistence of the players on all the vehemencies on which the play itself did not insist gave us drama in a state of inflammation. Hysteria would attack two persons at once. I submit that paroxysm on the stage should not be endemic; by competing outbreaks the sympathies are dismembered. Of Mr. Augustine Duncan in the title rôle a rather different criticism must be made. He struck the right and sound note at the outset of the play, and the rest of his performance was mainly a reverberation of that note. The fact that John Ferguson is a self-reverberative character may absolve Mr. Duncan from blame, but absolution is not quite identical with triumph.

New York is truly metropolitan in its indifference to Shakespeare, if I may judge by the size of the audience that greeted Mr. Hampden at the first matinee performance of the return engagement at the Thirty-Ninth Street Theatre. Hamlets as a class are less dear to me than to my brothers in criticism; they draw me too many ways at once; they tease and balk me with a diversity of moods for which I can find no explanation but distraction, and for which the explanation that distraction offers is much too summary and comprehensive. To madness anything is natural. I am not sporting with paradox when I say that the vice of insanity as an artistic expedient is that it rationalizes everything at a stroke. Partly for this reason, I have always shrunk from admitting the insanity of Hamlet. His freakishness does not require such an explanation. A nature whose capacities for anguish have been drained dry by a usual or slightly unusual misfortune is confronted in the Ghost's recital with intensified and anomalous calamity. What will ensue? A grief that is abysmal can not be deepened; the effect will be a rebellion or rebound of grief against itself in the form of a mercurial extravagance, a maudlin whimsicality. This skittishness may be less the result of insanity than its preventive; it may be nature's prophylactic, related to dementia as vaccination is related to smallpox. Hamlet may be fighting insanity, as he fought Laertes, with its own weapons.

I thought Mr. Hampden's performance good. I can not say that I was struck by its originality. It fell among or between the other Hamlets, and, without any meanness in conformity, it kept within the common circuit or enclosure. Each Hamlet is highly diverse within itself, but for that very reason the Hamlets have a strong family likeness, on the same principle that patchwork quilts, which are collections of differences, resemble each other more than ordinary quilts. One need not dispute the underlying unity. Hamlet, speaking in metaphor, wears motley over sables and the actor's problem is to show the sables through the motley. Dropping the figure, which confuses quite as much as it enlivens, the actor's task is to convey the effect of seriousness, grace, and dignity through a jumble of acts in which the accepted notions of the dignified, the graceful, and the serious are often brusquely contravened. In this trying problem the success of the better Hamlets is considerable, and Mr. Hampden's is among the better Hamlets. I suspect sometimes that Hamlet is a wilderness to Mr. Hampden. The reply is that Hamlet is a wilderness to himself.

The fine profile and chiseled brow prepared me at the outset for something bronze-like in the portrayal, but the voice was pliable enough to inhibit this effect, or at least to subdue it to agreeable proportions. Hamlet is remarkable among all other parts for the number of passages which the actor may slight or stress, may enlarge or diminish, at his pleasure. In the passages which Mr. Hampden chose not to stress he was fluidly and pleasingly natural, and the grace of his transitions was appealing. In declamatory parts, like the address to the players and the to-be-or-not-to-be soliloquy, he was markedly effective for the impeccable reason that he was not lavish, but chary, of declamation in his speech.

The play was staged after the fashion now in vogue, which makes an interflux or pudding of the acts. I admit that even in Shakespeare the acts tend to interflow, but to me this would be a motive for the maintenance and repair of the dykes. No part in the support requires mention, except the Polonius of Mr. Albert Bruning. That gifted actor cut his Polonius in two, but had no warrant to throw away the worsen part of it. The sage of the first act was admirable; the addeplate of the second was well enough; but the hiatus between the two was impassable.

O. W. FIRKINS

Manifesto of the Socialist-Revolutionaries

WHEN the Bolsheviki seized the government authority in Russia in November, 1917, they were assisted by the party of the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the Left, led by the famous terrorist, Maria Spiridonova. This party remained with the Bolsheviki only a few months. After Lenin and Trotsky signed the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, thus delivering Russia into the hands of the Germans, the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the Left declared against the Soviet Government and began an open struggle with the Government and the Germans. The central committee of this party organized the assassination of Count von Mirbach in Moscow and of Field Marshal von Eichorn in Kief, for which many members of the party paid with imprisonment or their lives. Only a few weeks ago the leader of the party, Maria Spiridonova, was tried by a Bolsheviki tribunal for "counter-revolutionary" propaganda, found guilty and sent to a sanatorium because of ill health.

At the beginning of last March an uprising of workingmen against the Soviet took place in Petrograd. This uprising was organized very largely by the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the Left. The movement was crushed by the Government, largely through the employment of Chinese and Lettish detachments of the Red Army. It was in the course of this uprising that the Petrograd Committee of the Party of the Socialist-Revolutionaries of the Left published a manifesto, the text of which has just reached this country. Following is a translation of this manifesto, as it appeared in the New York Russian newspaper, Russkoye Slovo:

Down with the Soviet Government!
Comrades, workingmen, peasants, sailors, and soldiers of the Red Army!

Eternal shame rest upon the Bolsheviki, the violators, the deceivers, the agents-provocateurs of the Russian people!

The Petrograd Soviet does not express the will of the workingmen, the sailors and the soldiers of the Red Army. This Soviet was never really elected. The elections were either dishonestly manipulated or else conducted under the threat of execution and starvation. By means of the same kind of terror the Bolsheviki have crushed all liberty of speech, the press, and the assembly for the working class.

The Petrograd Soviet consists of the Bolshevist imposters. It is but a blind instrument in the hands of that band of provocateurs, hangmen, and murderers, who constitute the Bolshevist régime. Let this self-styled Soviet stand before the working class of Russia and before the whole world and answer the following questions:

Where is the dictatorship of the proletariat and of the working peasants?

It does not exist, for its place has been taken by the dictatorship of the central committee of the Bolshevist Party, which rules the country through the instrumentality, of all kinds of extraordinary commissions and of punitive expeditions, consisting of foreign mercenaries.

What has become of the authority of the Soviets?

In the whole of the Soviet Russia there is nowhere to-day any authoritative governmental power.

Where are the rights of the voters?

In the factories and in the foundries, on ships and in railroad trains there are now only self-appointed Bolshevist commissaries, men who had served the other régime but a short time ago, and who now work their will upon the workingmen and the peasants.

What has become of the freedom of speech and of the press, especially the labor and the peasant press?

The workingmen are not permitted to hold meetings. They are not allowed to publish their own newspapers. They do not dare—under the penalty of imprisonment or execution—to say a word against the Bolsheviki.

Where is the labor control over the factories and foundries, which was promised to the workingmen?

It has been displaced by the self-appointed Bolshevist agents, for the government does not trust the workingmen. The Bolsheviki have attached the workingmen to their places of employment, thus creating a new form of serfdom.

Where is the socialization of the land?

What has become of the promises to abolish capital punishment?

Capital punishment now rages both at the front and throughout the country, and it is directed not only against the bourgeoisie, but also against the poor.

The party of the Bolsheviki in its struggle against the workingmen and the peasants is supported by the bayonets of the mercenary Chinese and Lettish troops, commanded by traitor officers who find themselves in a better situation under the rule of Lenin and Trotsky than they had ever found under the régime of the Tsars.

Comrades! At the present time, not a stone has remained of that edifice of liberty which was upreared by the October revolution. The place of that edifice has been taken by words of deception and by tyranny.

Thus the former allies of the Bolsheviki characterize their friends of yesterday. Coming as it does from such a source, this manifesto is a veritable indictment against the Bolsheviki, hurled against them by those who know them too well.

Books Received

FICTION

Anderson, Sherwood. Winesburg, Ohio: Tales of Ohio Small-Town Life. Huebsch. $1.50.

Baroja, Pío. Cæsar or Nothing. Translated by Louis How. Knopf. $1.75 net.

Chambers, R. W. The Moonlit Way. Appleton. $1.60 net.

Davies, M. T. Blue-Grass and Broadway. Century. $1.50.

Dunbar, Ruth. The Swallow. Boni and Liveright. $1.50 net.

Huard, F. W. Lilies White and Red. Doran. $1.50 net.

Kauffman, R. W. Victorious. Bobbs-Merrill. $1.75 net.

Maher, R. A. The Hills of Desire. Macmillan. $1.50.

Perry, Lawrence. The Romantic Liar. Scribner. $1.50 net.

Roche, A. S. The Eyes of the Blind. Doran. $1.50 net.

Rousseau, Victor. Wooden Spoil. Doran. $1.50 net.

Roy, Jean. The Fields of the Fatherless. Doran. $1.75 net.

Sinclair, Upton. Jimmie Higgins. Boni and Liveright. $1.60 net.

Terhune, A. P. Lad: A Dog. Dutton. $1.75 net.

Vauardy, Varick. The Lady of the Night Wind. New York: Macaulay. $1.50 net.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Bloomfield, Meyer. Management and Men. Century. $3.50.

Brown, A. J. The Mastery of the Far East. Scribner. $6.00 net.

Brown, L. F. The Freedom of the Seas. Dutton. $2.00 net.

Fitzpatrick, E. A. Experts in City Government. National Municipal League Series. Appleton. $2.25 net.

Flexner, Abraham and Bachman, F. P. The Gary Schools. N. Y.: General Education Board.

Friedman, E. M. Labor and Reconstruction in Europe. Dutton. $2.50 net.

Gibbon, T. E. Mexico Under Carranza. Doubleday, Page. $1.50.

Gompers, Samuel. American Labor and the War. Doran. $1.75 net.

Kellogg, W. G. The Conscientious Objector. Boni and Liveright. $1.00 net.

Laughlin, J. L. Money and Prices. Scribner. $2.50 net.

Leverhulme, Lord. The Six-Hour Day and other Industrial Questions. Holt. $3.50 net.

McKinder, H. J. Democratic Ideals and Reality. Holt. $2.00 net.

Millard, T. F. Democracy and The Eastern Question. Century. $3.00.

Montgomery, R. H. Montgomery's Income Tax Procedure. 1919 Edition. Ronald Press. $6.00.

Reid, L. J. The Great Alternative. Longmans, Green. $2.25 net.

Sharpless, Isaac. Political Leaders of Provincial Pennsylvania. Macmillan. $2.50.

There is A Pioneer in Every Field

"What the name Edison is to the Phonograph—Westinghouse to the Air Brake—Wright to the Aeroplane or Marconi to the Wireless Telegraph—the name Crocker-Wheeler is to the Electric Motor. The first commercial electric motor was produced by the men in control of the Crocker-Wheeler Organization who were actively associated in establishing the Pioneer Motor Industry thirty-four years ago."

Ed Wheeler

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

Slichter, S. H. The Turnover of Factory Labor. Appleton. $3.00 net.

Swift, E. J. Psychology and the Day's Work. Scribner. $2.00 net.

Wines, F. H. Punishment and Reformation. Revised and Enlarged. Crowell. $2.50 net.

Woodruff, C. R. A New Municipal Program. Appleton. $2.25.

EDUCATION

Brownless, R. B. and Others. Chemistry of Common Things. Allyn & Bacon.

Claxton, P. P. and McGinniss, J. Effective English. Allyn & Bacon.

Hughes, R. O. Community Civics. Allyn & Bacon.

Kelsey, F. W. Cæsar's Commentaries. Allyn & Bacon.

Latané, J. H. A History of the United States. Allyn & Bacon.

Lewis, W. D., and Holmes, M. D. Knowing and Using Words. Allyn & Bacon.

Macgruder, F. A. American Government, with a Consideration of the Problems of Democracy. Allyn & Bacon.

Monvert, Adolphe de. La Belle France: A French Reader for Beginners. Allyn & Bacon.

Reese, A. M. Outlines of Economic Zoology. Blakiston. $1.75 net.

Robbins, C. L. The School as a Social Institution. Allyn & Bacon.

Stewart, Anna. Social Problems: Outlines and References. Allyn & Bacon.

The Great Tradition. Edited by E. Greenlaw and J. H. Hanford. Scott, Foresman.

West, W. M. History of the American People. Allyn & Bacon.

SCIENCE

Dulles, C. W. Accidents and Emergencies. Blakiston. $1.00 net.

White, W. A. The Mental Hygiene of Childhood. Little, Brown. $1.35 net.

Wiley, H. W. Beverages and Their Adulteration. Blakiston. $3.50 net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

Shackleton, Robert. The Book of Philadelphia. Penn Publishing Co. $3.00 net.

TIFFANY & Co.

PEARLS AND PEARL NECKLACES
A NOTABLE COLLECTION

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

NEW SUBSCRIBERS

We are securing a number of new subscribers through the efforts of individual agents who find it easy to interest substantial people in THE REVIEW. Anyone who desires to build up a personal business in this way by representing us, will please address Circulation Department, THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York.

FOR SALE. UNPOPULAR REVIEW (Holt, N. Y.), complete, with indices, 22 numbers. $10 and postage. Address "D," The Review.

The Addressing Problems of Industry

The addressing problems of industry are solved by the Belknap Addressing Machine.

Typewritten Addresses for All Your Lists

That is the modern way—the way of sure, prompt, 100 per cent. mail deliveries. In every office where a typewriter is used the Belknap Addressing Machine can be made to increase sales, double the day's work and save money.

If you value economy, accuracy and speed you will not hesitate to secure a Belknap Addressing Machine. It gives your literature that personal appeal which a typewritten address possesses. You wouldn't write your business correspondence in long hand—why write addresses that way? Banish the wasteful method.

Treat It As You Do Your Figures

Place this important work upon a basis of minimum expense—elevate it to its logical importance.

Systematize it with an error-proof machine that will save you the cost of twenty helpers, do neater work, assure prompter deliveries and obtain a more favorable audience.

No. 4 Rotary, on special stand. Speed increased to 1800 to 2000 per hour.

When you install a Belknap Addressing Machine, you get a service that means efficiency in every detail.

First, we study your requirements. Then we adapt the Belknap to fit those needs. We plan the handling and operating. We stay with you until the Belknap is actually saving you money by doing this mechanical work better and quicker than it can be done in any other way.

Your Typewriter is Your Stencil Cutter

The Belknap Fibrotype Stencil is the only one your stenographer can slip into her regular typewriter and cut without expensive equipment.

Our Reputation is Your Assurance of Satisfaction

For 35 years the Belknap Addressing mechanism has borne a large and responsible part of the commercial world's burden. It has in that time so capably conducted itself that—with all its numerous improvements—it stands today pre-eminently the most popular and widely used of all addressing machines.

Offices and Agencies in all Principal Cities

Rapid Addressing Machine Company "The Belknap System"

32-46 West Twenty-Third Street : : : : : : : : : : New York

On the bare announcement of the publication of THE REVIEW, many hundreds of annual subscriptions were received even before the first issue went to press. A magazine dealer of forty years' experience has described as unprecedented the welcome thus accorded this publication.

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

R.6.7.19

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

R.6.7.19

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 5

New York, Saturday, June 14, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	91
Editorial Articles:
American Labor Against Class War	93
Some Lessons from Government Control	93
Land Values and Congestion	94
The Anti-Submarine Campaign	95
Education—Its Constant Values	97
New Pogroms for Old. By Jerome Landfield	98
Great Britain and Ireland. By Edward Raymond Turner	99
Mr. Creel and the Non-Partisan League. By E. H. Nicholas	101
Correspondence	102
Poetry:
Cain. By Edmund Kemper Broadus.	102
Book Reviews:
A New Liberalism	103
Tin Soldiers and Paper Dolls. By H. W. Boynton	103
Landmarks of Americanism	104
Pax Japonica	105
The Run of the Shelves	106
Charles Kingsley: A Centenary Notice. By O. J. Campbell.	107
Dramatic Performances in London. By William Archer.	109
Mr. Dryden Meets Mr. Milton. By Raymond D. Havens.	110
Copyright, 1919, by The National Weekly Corporation.

WHEN the Governments of the world have been preaching "force without stint" for five years as the means of accomplishing their aims and desires, it is not surprising that unbalanced or criminally minded individuals should likewise think to accomplish their purposes by killing and destruction.—The Nation.

The idea of violence would of course never have entered the heads of our revolutionaries if the evil example had not been set by the governments of the world. The railroad riots of 1877, when Pittsburgh and Baltimore enjoyed brief experiences of something like a reign of terror, were prompted no doubt by a sudden revival of memories of the Civil War, which had ended twelve years before. The Haymarket massacre in Chicago, the outcome of many months of incendiary agitation, is proof not of any inherent tendency toward violence on the part of the "reformers" who made and threw the bombs, but interesting evidence of the vagaries of memory, showing that even twenty-two years of peace did not suffice to wipe out the evil effects of the spectacle of warfare. In 1894 again, when Mr. Cleveland found it necessary to send United States troops to restore order in the Chicago region, the strikers were animated by a resurgence of vicious impulses instilled into them or their fathers by the wicked war that had been waged thirty years before for the preservation of the Union. Let us have no superficial explanations of our troubles. If King Albert had quietly let Germany take possession of his country, Mr. Palmer and Judge Nott and the rest of the persons that have incurred the wrath of the I. W. W. and the Bolsheviks would have nothing more to fear than gentle pleadings for the gradual establishment of a better world. It is all very well for the Secret Service to hunt down the bomb throwers; the man higher up, the real criminal, is Albert of Belgium.

ALL honor to Senator John Sharp Williams for casting the single vote against a resolution of sympathy with the Sinn Fein republic. The scramble of both parties to propitiate the Irish vote was disgraceful. This is said quite apart from the merits of the independence movement in Ireland as at present organized. We as Americans are in no position to judge the promise of the present revolt, nor yet to instruct England in a by no means simple duty. If the Irish question had to come before the Senate—and there seems no good reason why it should at this moment—then it should have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and appropriately debated. The Irish revolutionists are shrewd enough to realize the cheapness of the Senate's compliment—and, perhaps, to honor the single senator who dared to vote like an American.

DR. BERNARD DERNBURG, German Minister of Finance, in a recent interview, declares Germany can not pay what the treaty exacts and that the Entente can not make her pay. It is the easier to take such a stand in that the demand itself has not been reduced to figures. The intention of the Peace Conference was plainly to make the levying of indemnity experimental, regulating the exaction according to Germany's proved ability to pay. Theoretically correct, the plan ignores German feelings. Uncertainty is a grievous weakness in any financial transaction; an uncertainty running over years would evidently be deplorable. We are not prepared to say that the indemnity should be fixed in advance of adequate knowledge of Germany's ability to pay. At least maximum and minimum figures, the German offer of $25,000,000,000 serving the latter purpose, should be fixed promptly, and as soon as the treaty is signed Germany should be left free to reestablish her industries.

MR. TAFT, speaking at Albany before the League to Enforce Peace, intimated that if the Senate should reject the League Covenant, the President would decline to conduct further negotiations, leaving the business of peace-making deadlocked. Mr. Taft said: "No one can make a protocol of peace except the President. If, therefore, the President should deem it essential that the Senate should act upon the treaty as he submits it, there can be no protocol as long as he maintains that attitude." This comes to saying that if the Senate exercises its constitutional right of declining to vote on the Covenant-Treaty as presented, the President will assume the unconstitutional right of declining to do the necessary diplomatic business of the nation. This picture of Senate and President reciprocally casting the blame for the absence of a peace treaty seems to us highly imaginary. If the case should unhappily arise, the people would judge where the fault lay; and the Senate would be in the stronger legal position. The Senate has the unquestioned right to reject or ignore treaties that are unacceptable to it, and, where a treaty is plainly necessary, the President is bound to keep on negotiating treaties until he hits on one which the Senate will accept.

POLITICS is politics! Recently it was the thing to say politics is Republican. But Senator Hitchcock's exhibition has made it clear that politics is no respecter of persons. There has been much foolish preachment about politics in the mouths of many, from the President down. For it stands to reason that each party will continue to take advantage of the other when it can do so without injury to the country. While the war was at its height there were no better patriots, by and large, than the Republicans, and the President's admonition that "politics is adjourned" was not needed to spur them to their best efforts in behalf of the nation. It is a question whether Democrats have not been spoiled by the wholehearted support of the Opposition during the crisis. They seem to think that every programme which they and their leader advocate must continue to have the air of sanctity which all citizens, regardless of party, gladly attributed to the measures necessary for the prosecution of the war, though its control was wholly in Democratic hands. Let politics again convene, if this means merely searching inquiry by one party into highhandedness or carelessness on the part of the other. After all, if not politics, then the curiosity of the man in the street would have felt cheated if there had not been a flurry over the spectacle of the peace terms reaching New York before they reached the Senate.

PARIS, June 7.—A dispatch from Coblenz to-day reported that an unknown person fired three shots into Gen. Craig's house.

Man hat geschossen, but (1) no fine was imposed upon the city of Coblenz. (2) No German hostages were shot. (3) No public or private buildings were burned. (4) No massacre was made of the citizens.

U. S. S. George Washington, most famous of transports, was sure to have a newspaper, which was predestined to be named The Hatchet. It is now reprinted, and sold at $2.00, and sold for the benefit of the Navy Relief Society (Washington, D. C., or 280 Broadway, New York). The little paper was in charge of Chaplain Bloomhardt, who recruited a new staff every trip. It contains that modicum of carefully picked-over news which its wireless afforded to the floating Navy. Of greater interest are accounts of recreations aboard ship, and of the doings of famous passengers. Among these were the authors of the "Dere Mable" letters and of the "Fourteen Points." Only the former contributed. The paper is largely given over to jokes and humorous good advice, but it has tucked away notable bits of sea lore, yarns of telling sort, and a very interesting account, by Capt. Pollock, of the swift conversion of the wrecked German liner into a crack transport. The future historian may welcome the picture of Mr. Wilson "delighted and thrilled" at the singing of "Old Nassau."

IF conditions in Western Canada are approaching settlement, if the papers now call it a strike and not a war, if those behind the agitation now assure us that they meant only to afford a demonstration of the power of labor to do as it pleased, but not really to do it, then we may be sure that there are some people who are not a little disappointed. Disappointed, but not discouraged, for it means that though revolution has not come through this time the "One Big Union" goes marching on. Its possibilities make it an attractive instrument; if it fails, it was only engaging in strike, but who knows when a strike may grow to revolution? Meanwhile, more and more people grow accustomed to the idea of it, more and more are frightened by its display of power into calling themselves its adherents. Once get a foothold, however small, and a ruthless and organized minority can slowly but surely reduce a helpless majority to subjection. Such plausible procedure seems in the case of Western Canada to have met an unexpected check in the behavior of the soldiers. Forgetting their little grievances, as soldiers always do in the face of real trouble, they set themselves solidly against the disordered proletarian nightmare. One company, returning from long service abroad, is reported to have voted unanimously in favor of volunteering at once for strike duty without even visiting their homes. They were quite willing to see the world improved in several little ways, but not à la Russe.

THE obvious and disastrous helplessness of the unorganized majority against a determined minority has led the London Spectator to offer for general consideration a simple device which has been laid before the National Security Union for meeting the ideal of disorder. Its chief feature is that all good citizens who are true democrats and believe that the interests of majority and minority alike reside in law and order should allow themselves to be enrolled with a view to aiding their fellow citizens in resisting revolution when called upon to do so. At a given word law-abiding citizens would quietly meet at certain designated places, to retire as soon as the police or the military take charge of the situation. The plan seems not without its dangers. Probably its greatest advantage is that it would never have to be resorted to. The mere existence of some effective means by which the majority could realize itself would be sufficient to rob the starting of revolution of much of its charm. Here we are still no doubt far from a situation which demands such measures, but the suggestion is worth bearing in mind.

THERE is in Girgenti, Sicily, a famous saint, Calogero. His venerated image has an iron head, because he is at times roughly handled by his worshipers. His task is to bring rain, in which he occasionally fails. In such unexpected drought, the impatient populace hale the image to the sea, cast it in, and leave it afloat until rain is vouchsafed. All of which is a parable of an Editor of the New Republic writing a revised psychology of Mr. Wilson. It may also teach that as idols often have clay feet, it is very convenient for them to have iron heads.

THE world needs a Sherlock Holmes—several of him. There are quite too many mysteries abroad for comfort. There is the little matter of the bombs—elementary, my dear Watson, when you have once turned your mind to it. There is the Purloined Treaty—what an opportunity for the Holmesian talent! And, perhaps equally important, there is the rifling of the Mayor's tulip beds; Darwins, no doubt, of the finest and worth their weight in gold. Let the policeman whose duty it was to guard them be duly boiled in oil. But in such an ending there is no unction to the analytic mind. Why this recrudescence of tulipomania? In short, who did it? Do our modern detectives fill their pipes with shag and listen in the stalls with closed eyes to the music of violins? They ought to. Then, perhaps, with some prospect of success, they could turn their attention to what is quite the most important mystery of all—the "mystery" ball of Eddie Cicotte, the accomplished pitcher of the Chicago White Sox. Its antic behavior in the air clearly indicates that the ball is somehow bewitched and bedeviled. Yet umpires examine it and solemnly pronounce that they can't see no p'int about that ball that's different from any other ball. But the Chicago players take jealous care that the ball with the strange medicine on it is kept in play and out of the hands of their opponents, and the crowd in the grandstand shudders as it observes the sphere take on, from no apparent cause, a rapid and uneven discoloration. Watson, forget your patients and run out with me to see a ball game this afternoon.

THERE is perhaps no more expressive symbol of the age and of this country than the Bach Festival which began last week in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. Since 1912 there has gathered each year an assemblage of musicians from all over the country—this year from sixteen States and Canada—to present in the quiet church of the old Moravian community the deeply spiritual music of Bach against the titanic world-gripping background of the great steel mills of a modern industrial city. The community and the festival date back to Colonial days, and place against a background of modern creative industry not only this music of another century but the traditions of our own country's childhood. There are those to-day who would tell us that we can not have these things together, that in order to retain our Bach and all that he means to the spirit we must do away with our steel mills and the world-web of modern business which they weave in their ceaseless roar.

Perhaps, but not if the spirit of man is strong enough. We might not have the ear and the time for Bach to-day were it not for the vast machinery which those mills represent and by which alone we are able to live with any leisure and comfort. And we might not be able to endure that machinery without the refreshment which Bach gives us.

HOWEVER unprogressive the American drama may appear, the American actor, it seems, refuses to be behind the times. He has been reading his Tom Mann and his Debs, and has concluded that the best kind of acting is the direct kind. The New York theatregoer seems unaware of the calamity threatened him in the recent unionization of his movie and dramatic stars and the corresponding entrenchment of the managers and producers to combat this new manifestation of radicalism. If he were, a panic might seize him. The vision of a darkened Broadway, of innumerable deserted and cheerless nickleodeons, resulting from a prolonged strike on the part of the Actor's Union, would be unbearable. Even the Russian bourgeoisie apparently was spared such privation, and rather than endure it the city's bored millions would compel the Mayor to capitulate to the dramatic syndicalists. Not even Ole Hanson could hold out against the accumulated ennui of New York.

THE resumption of the National Open Golf Tournament at Brae Burn this year has been followed, we may be sure, by no more interested group than the Seniors. When all the technique has been learned, the golfer has still to think about his mind and soul. Can he prevent those little mental devils from making him look up? Is he at peace with himself and the world? Mastery in any form is alluring, and golf, say the Seniors, means mastery of one's entire being. How, then, does it happen that persons of no very exceptional qualities excel? There are many who break eighty for their average of four rounds! "How do they do it?" marvels the President of the Seniors Association. Thickets and long grass are great suggesters of philosophical doubts.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

American Labor Against Class War

THE American Federation of Labor is a most reactionary body. It was reactionary during the war, for it threw itself heartily into the support of the cause of freedom as it has been understood by liberals for a hundred years and more. It was not neutral in the great war for American rights, the preservation of democracy and the overthrow of Prussian militarism. Its convention at Atlantic City shows every sign of being permeated by that same reactionary spirit in relation to the problems confronting us now that the war is over. This might not be a source of any particular distress to advanced thinkers were it not for the uncomfortable fact that the membership of the Federation is 3,260,008, and especially that this number represents an increase of 826,449 during the past year. Such an increase in the face of Mr. Gompers' disgraceful record of patriotism, and of the perhaps still more damning circumstance that he is as firmly opposed to Bolshevist ideas as he is to Prussianism, is an ugly fact that can not be ignored.

What our advanced thinkers will regard as the most melancholy exhibition of the Federation's reactionism is its strong endorsement of Mr. Gompers' stand against the formation of a labor political party. This is merely a continuation of the unbroken policy of the Federation, but it derives extraordinary significance from the conditions of the present time. It means that the men who have done the heavy work of labor agitation in this country, and the mass of those whom they represent, are satisfied that great results have been achieved, and that further great results are still to be attained, without breaking the unity of the American people. It means that on the one supreme question of the day the Federation has distinctly chosen its ground. That question is, Shall there be war or peace—not war or peace with foreign countries, but class war or peace within our own country. The Federation has declared for peace.

This does not mean that there is going to be no trouble. It does not mean that everybody is going to be satisfied. It does not mean that the Federation itself may not stand for measures and methods which Americans in other walks of life, and with other sentiments and prejudices, may regard as dangerous. But it does mean that these things are going to be fought out in ways consonant with the spirit of our institutions—with occasional clashes and alarms no doubt, but still in the ways in which Americans have always believed in fighting out their differences, and of which all sides have loyally and good-naturedly accepted the result.

From the standpoint of the intellectual radical there may be reasons for condemning this attitude. But there is one thing about it which can not be condemned from any standpoint, except that of unmanly dilettantism. These men, face to face with a big situation, know where they stand. They consider class war a bad thing, and they are against class war. The dilettanti are not quite sure whether class war is a good thing or a bad thing; or, if they are quite sure that it is a bad thing to have, they are not quite sure but that it may be a very good thing to flirt with. The courage that they display is the courage of having no opinion and of accepting no responsibility. The responsibility is there, nevertheless, and the time will come before long when the good sense of the country will demand that it be placed where it belongs. These very men are the men who are constantly telling us that we are on the verge of war. They utter all sorts of warnings that the war is close at hand. They make some feeble effort to suggest preventives. But in the face of a situation which they themselves, more than any one else, declare to be a life-and-death crisis, they fail to tell us where they stand on the most urgent issue of that crisis. The Federation of Labor, whether right or wrong in its position, has set an example of manliness which the dilettante radicals would do well to attempt to follow.

Some Lessons From Government Control

THE railroads are to be returned to their owners by something like unanimous consent. Upon what basis they are to go back is a tough question; but on the proposition itself there is, for the present at least, practically no dispute. Those who looked forward to the war-time régime of government control as a mere introduction to government ownership are, of course, disappointed; but so unpleasing has been the experience that they find themselves compelled to acquiesce in the general verdict. The most they say by way of protest is that the test has not been a fair one; that government control has been tried for too short a time, and under conditions too abnormal, to justify a conclusion as to its merits, still less as to the merits of outright government ownership.

Fair-minded opponents of government ownership must admit that this is true. The experiment has not been sufficient to settle the question for good and all. But it has been sufficient to damage terribly the claims of that policy. Of the defects of operation—the unsatisfactory service, the tremendous increase in rates, the enormous fiscal deficit in spite of that increase—everybody has been hearing so much that there is no need to dwell on them here. But there is one aspect of the matter which seems to have been lost sight of, and which is perhaps most of all deserving of attention. We refer to the apparent collapse of the claim for great economies through consolidated operation of the roads. We are perfectly aware that government ownership advocates will insist on emphasizing the word "apparent"; but on the other hand we insist on emphasizing the word "great." The ownership people will say that many of the economies possible under government ownership could be introduced only when that régime had been permanently established; and this is true. But while it is true of many of the economies, it is not true of many others; and the remarkable thing is that we hear very little of savings actually effected by the Government as an offset to the enormous increase of expenditure due to raising of wages and other causes. That there have been such economies is undoubtedly true, and there might be more; but the fact that there is so little "pointing with pride" to anything of the kind is pretty sure evidence that, in comparison with the total expenditure, these savings are a mere drop in the bucket.

It is a characteristic of most savings of this kind that they are of very simple character and can accordingly be exploited as object-lessons for much more than they are worth. Many of them, by the way, would be quite feasible under private ownership if they were not prevented or discouraged by governmental restrictions; but let that pass. The point is that while they loom big in government ownership arguments they play but an insignificant part in the figures of the railroad budget. Take such a thing as the printing of time-tables, for example. It is altogether right that the Government should cut down this expense; but if it were cut out entirely, it would make but an imperceptible difference in the balance between income and outgo. Consolidation of ticket offices, the sale of common mileage books, and similar improvements—for which the Government deserves credit—are meritorious from the standpoint of convenience, but the economies they bring about are too small to affect the character of the fiscal showing. There are many more important savings that it is easy to point to as possible under government ownership. But we have seen little attempt to prove that in actual dollars and cents the aggregate would amount to enough to reduce expenses by a large percentage, even when government ownership was complete; and in the present experiment they have doubtless amounted to so little, in comparison with the hundreds of millions of shortage, that to try to make much of them would do more harm than good to the government ownership cause.

This whole question of the economies of government ownership, or of socialist organization in general, and the waste of competition, presents an interesting case of what economists used to be fond of referring to as the difference between the seen and the unseen—the superficial phenomena that thrust themselves upon our attention and the underlying things which we are apt to overlook. Nothing is easier than to prove that the competitive system involves a vast amount of waste. But before we throw it overboard—on the score of its wastefulness at least—we should take thought, in the first place, not merely of the absolute but of the relative magnitude of the waste; and secondly we should consider to what extent the loss may be a necessary incident of the gain attaching to private enterprise. Even in the case of public utilities, under the best of regulation, and with competitive waste reduced to a minimum, something of that waste may be expected to remain. But how does it compare with the economies which the stimulus of private interest brings about in ways that can not be catalogued? Nothing is easier, for example, than to point to the big salaries of corporation managers, far bigger than those which the Government would pay; but are they not a mere bagatelle in the total expenditure? These men constantly feel the most acute necessity to make ends meet and overlap; they keep down the waste of operation in a thousand indefinable ways; the absence of their special efficiency would mean the loss every week, perhaps, of more than their whole salary amounts to in a year. These same men, as part of a Government bureaucracy, would rarely be keyed up to the same kind of activity—not to speak of the probability that it would not be these men, but quite a different set, who would fill the like posts in a bureaucracy.

In the field of ordinary business, competitive waste is a much bigger item. Vast sums are expended for advertising, and for attracting business in other ways to one concern rather than another. That such waste might be materially reduced without impairment of business energy is undeniable, and any scheme that can effect this is worthy of most serious attention. But take it as it is, and there is little reason to doubt that the loss, though very great, is far less than the gain that arises from that general energizing of industrial and commercial activity which goes with the competitive spirit. It is in the direction of voluntary coöperative enterprise that the most promising outlook exists for reducing the waste of competition. Yet the history of coöperation, admirable as some of its results have been, gives the strongest possible proof of the limitations of competitive waste as compared with competitive efficiency. If competition were half so wasteful as it is sometimes represented, the coöperative stores, which have so long been a great success in England, would by this time have driven ordinary retail trading out of the field far more completely than they have; and they would be playing something of a part in this country, where, in perhaps fifty years of trial, they have not got beyond a most rudimentary stage. Voluntary coöperation provides something of the same stimulus of interest that competitive enterprise furnishes. There ought to be a large future for it in the industrial field as well as in that of retail trade. In the meanwhile its history of several decades teaches a useful lesson as to the alleged demerits of the competitive as compared with a socialist régime from the standpoint of economy—for whatever limitations coöperation labors under from that standpoint, we may be sure apply in far greater force to socialism.

Land Values and Congestion

THE New Republic for June 7th discusses in a sober spirit the question of taxation of land values as related to urban congestion and the housing problem now pressing upon the country. We note with pleasure that its advocacy of special taxation for unimproved land is distinctly limited to such taxation as would absorb future increments of value. "We would not confiscate existing values, as the Single Taxers propose," says the New Republic, "because we do not believe in revising the rules of a game and making the new rules retroactive." With confiscation out of the way, it is possible to argue the merits of the question upon economic grounds—that is, with an eye to specific and practical consequences rather than ethical or political principles.

The idea running through the New Republic's article, and through all that is written by enthusiastic advocates of the "unearned increment" tax as a solution of the problem of urban congestion, is that the speculative holding of land is the one great barrier to the comfortable housing of millions of people now herded together in crowded city centres. The view is plausible, and to many appears absolutely self-evident. Nevertheless, we believe that it is almost wholly unfounded. "All around every large city," we are told, "there is a broad zone of unimproved land, much more than adequate for the comfortable housing of a vast population, every acre of which is held at a price that drives away prospective home owners"; a population of eight millions could be housed within the limits of Greater New York, allowing an acre for every ten families, which "is scarcely more than a village density." But if one examines this broad zone of unimproved land, one finds that nearly all of it can be had at prices so small that the addition to rent which the land value would cause is insignificant. It is true that the commuter finds that in the places where he would like particularly to live sites are fairly expensive; but these are not places where large areas are held out of use, but choice spots which for some reason or other have themselves become attractive centres of population. You can not lump the hundreds of thousands of acres within a ten or twelve miles' radius of the City Hall as one homogeneous mass, any more than you can lump together the million acres, sufficient to house half the population of the United States, which lie within the commuter's radius.

A concrete example may serve to emphasize this point. In a certain admirable water-front location, where high-class houses have been built in considerable numbers in the last ten years, and only about a half hour's rapid-transit ride from the City Hall, building lots 40 by 100 feet go begging, though the prevailing price is only $2,000 per lot. In less desirable but still very good locations, somewhat further from the centre of the city, such lots can be had for $500; and $500 means $50 a year in the rent. It is not this $50—say $25 per family for two families, or $17 per family for three families—that is keeping houses from being built in the suburban zone, "while the children of the city grow pale and anæmic in cramped tenements." The great reason why people do not go to these outlying districts is because the advantage or the necessity of being near the centre outweighs, in the minds of the people concerned, the undeniable hygienic and moral benefits that might be attained by living further out.

The New Republic admits that "some men are drawn toward the limits of the urban area by the hope that values will advance." But it adds that to one man moved by the hope that prices will rise higher there are ten who are "deterred by prices of land that are already too high." This is a matter of opinion, and we feel very sure that the fact is quite otherwise. But however this may be, it has very little to do with the question of increase of housing facilities for the hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of the poorer inhabitants of a city like New York. These people will not go out by ones and twos and build houses for themselves. Even such of them as may somehow be able to command the capital could not afford to take the risk of loss when they may have occasion, as they all know they are likely to have, to change their residence and hunt for a purchaser for the house they have been living in. It is enterprise on a larger scale—the kind of enterprise that opens up considerable tracts for occupancy—which is substantially the whole question as regards this class of people. And it seems absolutely plain that the absence of the prospect of rising land values must greatly diminish the stimulus to such enterprise. The houses themselves in the nature of things decline in value. The increase of the site value is counted on to counterbalance not only this loss but the risk of mistakes in judgment in the first place, and adverse local changes which may occur in the future and which it is impossible to foresee.

Another consideration that is constantly overlooked by those who regard taxes on land as a panacea for high rents, is that on the face of it the tax operates not to lower rents, but simply to put into the public treasury what would otherwise go into the pockets of the landowners. We say "on the face of it," because in so far as the tax may operate to increase the supply of housing, it would tend to lower rents. That it would so operate is, as we have tried to indicate, highly doubtful; but the point that we wish to insist upon is that except in this way the tax would not even tend to reduce rents. Rents are determined by demand: if people can be found who are anxious to live in a certain kind of house in a certain location and are willing and able to pay a certain rent for it, that is the rent which it will command. The rents on Park Avenue or Riverside Drive are not what they are because the landowners wish to get that amount of money, but because there are few locations presenting such attractions and many people willing and able to pay the price. If the full rental value of the land were taken by the city in the shape of taxation, the city treasury would be by so much the better off through this act of confiscation, but rents would be no lower.

If we are to do anything really helpful towards the solution of the housing problem we must concentrate our attention on the question of supply. Speculative holding of land out of use may not be wholly an imaginary obstacle, but it is certainly at most a very minor element in the case. To look for relief in that direction is to follow a false scent, and thus to divert attention from real possibilities of helpfulness. There is plenty of land to be had at prices so small as to constitute no hindrance to any well conceived plan of development. There is almost no limit to the amount of capital that could be obtained for the prosecution of great home-building enterprises, carried on primarily for the public benefit and offering only the most modest return on the investment. Two things are essential to the success of any such scheme—first, sound judgment in the choice of location and plan, and secondly, the enlistment in the enterprise of men whose names command the unhesitating confidence of the community. The practice of making subscriptions running into the hundreds of millions, for every possible kind of public purpose, has now become a habit: there is the best possible opportunity, before the habit wears off, for a great movement to supply, on a self-supporting basis, attractive and healthful homes for the masses. Never has the need been so keenly felt or so widely recognized.

The Anti-Submarine Campaign

OF the weapons of surprise developed in the great war,—the submarine, the armored tank, and poisonous gas,—the submarine was the most remarkable. Naval critics had generally regarded it as a useful defensive auxiliary. Certain alarmists, among them Sir Percy Scott of the British Admiralty, had falsely predicted that the submersible made useless every fighting ship of the older types. Nobody fully foresaw the rôle of the submarine as a commerce destroyer, not even the Germans, for they entered the war with only about forty U-boats. Everybody regarded the submarine as part of a fighting fleet. Its capacity as a piratical sea rover, defying the laws of war and the established practices of humanity, no one had fully grasped.

Its early successes were appalling, and its entire record is impressive. Taking total sinkings, the submarines sunk shipping of 15,054,000 gross tonnage. That is about 40 per cent. more than England's entire steamship tonnage at the opening of the war. British merchant vessels were sunk to the number of 5,622, in about half the cases with the crews aboard. That is about a quarter of the number of vessels, steam and sail, registered as British when the war began. Expressed in gross tonnage, the British loss is far more serious. It amounts to 9,032,000 tons, or nearly three-quarters of the British tonnage of all sorts registered for the year 1913. Such figures show how uncomfortably near the Germans came to controlling the sea routes, and lend a great interest to those measures which finally thwarted the wolves of the sea.

The first measures were defensive, for the submarine had asserted itself as an appallingly effective weapon of attack.

Naval history hardly knows another such feat as Van Weddingen's accounting for three great British cruisers in hardly more minutes. The great fleet sulked at moorings. Harbors and the Channel were mined and protected by nets. The purely military issue with the submarine was quickly settled. England pursued her gigantic task of transporting troops overseas almost undisturbed, as the United States did later. It was soon plain that the submarine did not intend to fight, but to sink helpless merchantmen, and cut off England's food supply. What was intended was a lawless blockade as wide as the seas.

Soon the merchantmen grew teeth. The voyages were made with never-sleeping gun crews fore and aft. Sinking ships "without trace" became no longer an easy water sport but a dangerous business. A "sub" has to come up frequently to breathe and recharge batteries. It was found that any swift fighting vessel could make it uncomfortable for her on the surface. So the North Sea and the Channel were strewn with little eighty-foot motor launches, made chiefly in the United States and smuggled out in parts. It was the first development of a real counter-aggressive. Meanwhile, shipbuilding was speeded up in England and the neutral nations. This was a necessary counsel of despair, warranted only by abnormal freights which paid for a new ship in a couple of trips, and by the confidence that the war would be won on land before Germany should sink enough ships to starve England.

The answer of the submarine to such measures was emphatic. In 1917 they sank 7,624,000 tons, two and a half times what they had sunk in 1916, four and a half times the sinkings of 1915. It was Germany's maximum effort. We may estimate that she had no less than 146 submarines in operation, with nearly a hundred more under construction. To Admiral von Tirpitz and his advisers the problem now presented itself in this fashion:—Would the attrition of the submarines at sea work faster than the attrition by the Entente on land? There were reasons for thinking the submarines would win in the race. Against this hope stood the stern facts that the transport service of the Allies had not even been successfully assailed, while the sensational destruction of merchant ships by thousands had not brought famine to England.

From 1918 the submarines, remaining an annoyance, ceased to be a serious menace. For the first nine months of 1918 the sinkings fell to half the figures for the previous year. And the swelling volume of new shipping made monthly sinkings still averaging nearly 300,000 tons seem almost negligible. The counter-offensive against the submarine had come suddenly to focus; the weapon of surprise had evoked its own offsets. It was no longer a question of meeting the torpedo by gun fire, of casually catching a "sub" in a net or bursting it with a stray mine, or scoring a lucky hit from the air, of blinding a periscope with oil, or escape in a smoke screen; the means of destruction were now manifold, systematic, and relentless. To review them is our task.

A mine barrier twenty-five miles broad was stretched from Norway to Scotland; the United States supplied more than half of the work and material. By bombing from the air and direct naval attack, the Belgian submarine bases were made nearly valueless. A new and terrible weapon, the depth bomb, made what had been the submarine's condition of safety one of extreme peril. The depth bomb made the smallest motor launch or submarine chaser potentially the destroyer of any submarine that could be detected below the surface. Probably only a few score "subs" were actually sunk by depth bombs. To be sure if an "ash can," as our Navy called them, exploded within a hundred yards of a "sub" it was likely to open up the plates, or, failing that, to disable the numerous rudders; but generally speaking the depth bomb worked after the German's own method, by Schrecklichkeit. It threatened a hideous death to all submarine crews, for a leaking submarine manufactures chlorine gas; it reduced the morale of the sea wolves immeasurably. German courage was unequal to a losing fight.

While the depth bomb was the striking weapon, it could do its work only when directed by the most extraordinary reconnaissance. For two years the Allies had fought the "subs" as a blind man might fight a pack of bloodhounds. Then the ocean developed ears and the air developed eyes. A heard "sub" was a threatened "sub," a seen "sub" practically dead. The air patrol and the listening devices in boats more than anything else hastened the end. Our submarines, with the British, listened from the bottom of the shallow waters, promptly reporting to the destroyers and mosquito fleet any submarine within a radius of several miles. On the surface, drifting patrol boats and trawlers did the same service of detection. The listeners were trained to recognize the throat of every sort of engine as the musician knows the typical chords. Soon the listening devices were so improved that they could be used on a boat under way. Then it became possible for a destroyer to hover over a "sub" and force her to use up her electrical power, while running the risk of a well-placed "ash can." The submarine service became intolerable. The Germans admit that fourteen U-boats were destroyed by their own crews, and that hundreds of sailors went mad. The ocean was filled with ships whose wireless direction-finders intercepted the radio reports of the submarines and added one more element of danger. Meanwhile, for fifty miles at sea the dirigibles and flying boats, fully armed with machine guns and depth bombs, plied over the waters. Kite balloons tugged at the off-shore guard-ships and were towed out with the convoys. The observers from the air could see a U-boat far below the surface, could detect at great distances the oil slick or the surface furrow, and could attack directly while reporting by wireless what they saw. It meant destruction for a submarine to show itself in shallow water by day. The effectiveness of the U-boats was thus cut in half.

Few people realize the part played by the Navy air patrol in safeguarding the approaches to New York. It was a terribly arduous service. Planes ran out of gas, took the water, remained for hours gradually breaking up; the crews were generally rescued, sometimes not. Kite balloons were torn from their moorings by the Nor'westers and with their occupants went down the wind never to be heard of again. If the sinkings within fifty miles of Sandy Hook were held down to about 50,000 tons for the last four months of the war, thanks are largely due to the Naval air service. Without it, it would have been a question not of half a dozen supply ships and a cruiser, but of ten times that number.

What compacted all the anti-submarine methods into an invulnerable organization was the convoy system. To torpedo a ship requires that a future position can be predicted, to lie in wait for either a ship or a convoy means that its course is known. By the simple device of zigzagging on a smaller or greater scale it became as impossible to ascertain the course of a convoy as to predict for any few minutes ahead the position of any single ship. Convoys simply shambled about the ocean like a flock of worried sheep, following, however, a plan strictly laid down. U-boats, even though they had information about a convoy, were doomed to heartbreaking wild goose chases.

Had a convoy been without escort, it could pretty well have looked out for itself. It represented, however, from 60 to over 300 guns, with trained crews and vigilant lookouts. But a convoy actually went out with pearly kite balloons ahead and astern, a silvery dirigible hovering overhead with two darting sea-planes; boxed in by the sturdy serviceable craft of the scout patrol and submarine chaser classes; with a cruiser ahead, and a brace of destroyers circling about. It would have been utter folly for a big squadron of U-boats to attack such an aggregation by daylight. To find it at night was difficult. As a matter of fact, convoys were rarely attacked. The U-boats hung behind and picked up an occasional laggard, like the unforgettable Ticonderoga; or limited themselves to the safe, if base and lawless device, of sowing stray mines in the high seas. Thus the negligible destruction off New York was effected. But prestige had passed from the submarine. It no longer was a formidable weapon of surprise and attack. From being the wolf it had sunk to the estate of jackal of the seas.

If we may trust the German figures, the submarine fleet in commission at the time of the surrender was 136. It was still near its estimated maximum of 146, but it was no longer formidable. The actual destruction of U-boats by war devices of all sorts may be roughly reckoned at over 150—about one-half of all that were put into the water. The morale of the remaining fleet had been greatly reduced. The necessary hardships and increasing terrors of the service had brought the officers and crews near to the breaking point. Had the war continued six months longer, there would have been no submarine problem. Camouflage, which has naturally caught the public imagination, had very little to do with this result. Many authorities regard it as mostly a waste of good paint and ingenuity. What brought results is what always brings military results—a suitable weapon, the depth bomb; proper tactics, the convoy system; and effective reconnaissance by the listeners of the waters and the lookouts of the air.

German courage cracked under the ordeal of a forlorn hope. The old exploits were still possible. A lucky and enterprising U-boat commander could have run amuck by night in a convoy with good chance of sinking several ships, or, for that matter, could have touched up during fog the great transports always anchored in our Lower Bay. No such attempt was made. The spirit of the sea wolf had been broken.

The sensational collapse of the submarine campaign proves first that mere terror is a poor military resource. At no time, from unarmed tramp to cockleshell scout patrol, was any seagoing man terrified by the "subs." Wrath and courage rose to meet the new peril. More important, perhaps, is the lesson that no war is likely to be won by a weapon of surprise, however ingenious. It seems certain that if Germany had had at the outset her maximum fleet of 146 U-boats, she could within two years have starved England into submission. But such calculations are always retrospective. The weapon of surprise is never provided in sufficient quantity, nor with adequate foreknowledge of its effects, and it never works quickly enough. In 1917, when the U-boat seemed to be winning, its battle was already lost. Counter-invention had mastered the problem, and the purging of the seas was only a matter of time.

Education—Its Constant Values

AT a thousand commencements this year the war values of education will be properly emphasized. The colleges are proud of the way in which their sons did their bit. From the moment when gallant students hurried over to France to drive ambulances or guide fighting planes, it has been clear that the morale of the American college was sound. To exult in this fact is right and natural.

It is inevitable, too, that an accounting of service should be made. That technically trained college men should have won most of the glory was to be expected. The junior whose elective chemistry had given a smattering of the lore of high explosives was more immediately available than the philologist of world renown. But the unlikeliest specialties proved useful. Dean Keppel, in his address at the Columbia Commencement, remarked that an archæologist has invented the best trench helmet of the war. A British scholar formerly in charge of the School at Athens proved himself an invaluable intelligence officer at Salonika, most delicate of situations. A noted American Chaucerian as readily mastered the armament of fighting planes as he had the relations of 15th century manuscripts. Besides morale the university-trained man brought a surprising versatility. Education had not only not softened his fibre, it had not rigidified his thinking.

We like to dwell on these extraordinary cases of unconscious technical preparation, and of intelligent adaptation. We are likely to forget the thousands of college-trained men who were relegated to the smallest jobs, which they accomplished with fidelity and cheerfulness. The drudgery of Army Training Camp and of Naval Shore Station is nothing to talk about. Perhaps it is well forgotten. But it can do no harm to recall that if the college men readily rose to the greater and more conspicuous responsibilities, they also regarded no charge as too mean to enlist their best ability. The young poet who starved intellectually in the fo'c's'le of a submarine chaser deserves his moment of praise alongside the connoisseur of poisonous gases and the renowned ace. The duties were many, the luck most various; the spirit of service was one.

It is a pleasure to be sharply tested and to endure the proof. Thousands of liberally educated men have forever banished the fear which is the bane of their class. In retrospect we do well to stress these painfully proved values. The danger is that we may continue to measure our educational values by the yardstick of overt efficiency. This is the spirit of the time. Our great adventure in the active life will have wrought harm if it sets scholars to doubting the undiminished value of the life contemplative. Education is not solely preparation for prosperity; it is also the best means of coping with adversity. It is upon this side of the case, which we fear few commencement orators will touch this year, that we wish to dwell.

To have resources against monotony and misery not simply in animal spirits or in stolid resignation is the privilege of the educated man. How many cases of the sage in prison the war afforded! Here were delicate spirits, adepts of the old philosophies and literatures, thrust into filth and semi-starvation, despitefully treated withal. At Ruhleben Englishmen and Americans of this type stood behind the cruelty of the prison management and the helpless mass of prisoners. Their balance and cultivation had protective value. The Germans were ashamed to do the basest things under their eye. These academic captives gave themselves loyally to the entertainment of their humbler fellow prisoners. One professor of Greek philosophy, who had won a new degree as an expert bomber, resumed his old occupation at Ruhleben, interested the "Tommies" in Plato and Plotinus, and had sufficient energy in reserve to produce a volume of sonnets. Compared with this, Boëthius's feat of writing "The Consolations of Philosophy" in a clean and well-conducted Roman prison sinks into insignificance.

Indeed are not the constant values of education of this sort? To keep a spirit superior to adversity, to attain a dignity that can not be abased by violence, to command recreation amid pain and misery, and joy as the body wastes—in short, as Boëthius wrote, to have a soul superior to fortune; this is the privilege of the man who is really educated. From a merely technical and utilitarian training no such resources can accrue. They imply a perspective of the past, values tempered through contact with the great thinking of all ages, a soul vividly conscious of its kinship with the great dead. An education that fails to give the soul superiority over fate is a poor education. A young student, a youth of high promise, wrote a few days before his death, from the western front, to a professor of archæology: "What you have taught me enables me to bear this life." The "confessors" of education before the world are not so much those who achieved greatly in the mechanics of the new warfare, as those who endured cheerfully the long martyrdom that war means to a gentle spirit.

New Pogroms for Old

THERE is a sinister cloud gathering over Russia. Its portent has been in view for many months, yet those who should have noted the impending storm and should have done the obvious thing to avert it, have fatuously beckoned it on. This is the storm of horrible pogroms that threatens the Jews of Russia with extinction. It is not enough that these hapless people had been down-trodden and oppressed for a century and a half under the Russian Bureaucracy; it is not enough that they had been harried most cruelly in the ebb and flow of war since 1914 as it rolled over them unceasingly; as if they had not already drained the cup of bitterness to its dregs, they must needs face the danger of a still more terrible fate.

It is no new thing, this menace of pogroms, but a new element, and a powerful one, has been added to the incitement. In the past under the old régime, the pogrom became almost an institution. Its causes lay deep in economic as well as cultural conditions, and it is a mistake to assume, as is frequently done, that the pogrom was simply instigated by the police at the behest of an autocratic government. Frequently as pogroms occurred under the consenting eyes of the police authorities, it may be asserted that they would have occurred oftener if the police had not interfered. Pogroms occurred in Austria-Hungary and Rumania as well as in Russia, and it is a striking fact that they were frequent in revolutionary Russia during 1917, at a time when the Provisional and Kerensky Governments were proclaiming religious toleration, and taking up the cause of the Jews as a race that had been oppressed under the old régime. There is no need here to dwell upon the various causes of the race antipathy which heretofore has caused such outrages in Russia. I have rather to point out that there has arisen a new situation destined to serve as a new incitement to fresh pogroms. This is the situation growing out of eighteen months of soviet rule.

The Russian people are not far from liberation from the hated Bolshevik yoke. Although they present the appearance of a herd of fatigued animals, crouching inert and spiritless beneath this crushing tyranny, there is a feeling among them that deliverance is at hand. Many risings have occurred and more will follow. Soon the brutal Red Guards and the Lettish and Chinese mercenaries, upon whose bayonets the Bolshevik régime has rested, will melt away, and the peasants, proprietors, and intelligentsia will again occupy their heritage and strive to restore orderly conditions of living; but it is too much to hope that they will emerge quietly and peacefully from the slough in which they have been plunged. For the bitter sufferings of eighteen months of brutal terror, they will seek vengeance. That commissars and soviet members will be hunted down like wild beasts goes without saying, and no one will lament them. But it is not they alone who will suffer. In the minds of the mass of the Russian people the Bolshevik régime and its soviets have been associated with the Jews, and they hold all Jews collectively responsible for the Bolshevik horrors.

This is most unjust. It is true that most of the soviets are dominated by renegades and criminals of the Jewish race. Naturally the soviets, which are made up of the ignorant, the rowdies, and the ne'er-do-wells, the scum of the population, turned to the only literate and clever elements among them for leadership. But these men should not be termed Jews; rather are they internationalists, scoffers at religion and race. It is estimated that they constitute at least sixty per cent. of the commissars and members of the soviets. But certainly seventy-five or eighty per cent. of the Jews of Russia are against them. The Russian peasant, however, does not see this; to him soviets are run by men whom he takes for Jews, and he simply holds all Jews as a class responsible.

Even in the early days of the Bolshevik régime the Jews were alive to this danger. They were greatly disturbed by the prominent part taken by men bearing Jewish names. They emphasized on every occasion the names of Jews prominent in the anti-Bolshevik parties. They noted that it was a Jew that killed Uritsky, and a Jew that attempted to assassinate Lenin. When a well-known Russian asked Boris Kamenka, the great Jewish banker: "Why don't you call off your man Trotsky?" he replied: "Why don't you call off your man Lenin?" The retort was clever and obvious, but it did not meet the situation.

In the hope of averting the catastrophe which they saw impending, a delegation of prominent and representative Jews waited on Trotsky and begged him to withdraw, lest he should bring ruin and destruction upon his co-religionists. In his reply Trotsky stated his position clearly and cynically. He was no longer a Jew—he was an internationalist and had no feeling for race or religion. It mattered not to him if a million of Jews were sacrificed. If they stood in the way of the realization of the new world order, let them perish. And, as if to emphasize their position, the Bolsheviks have recently led out to execution one of the most prominent Jews of Russia, Abram Varshavsky, the President of the Jewish Community of Petrograd.

What can the Jews of America do to avert the threatened calamity? They are at last awake to the danger, but when I spoke with them of it a year ago, they did not seem to realize its seriousness. I saw then that a number of them who were prominent in public life and were accounted close advisers of the President, were throwing the weight of their influence in favor of the recognition of the soviet government. I knew that they were making themselves responsible for the catastrophe that was almost certain to follow, for they were identifying Jewish opinion and policy with the Bolshevik régime in the mind of Russians. They may have been misled as to the facts. They may have honestly believed that the soviet government in Russia was a democracy and that to interfere with it was to promote counter-revolution. They may have believed that the soviet system would win out in the end and that the position of their co-religionists would be secure by reason of the offices they held and the power they wielded. But they had no right to believe thus, for the plain facts were again and again placed before them. If now you speak with any Russian concerning the American policy towards Russia, and the question is raised as to why America flirted with the Bolsheviks and was willing to see the Russian people subjected to their rapacious tyranny, he will shrug his shoulders and mention the names of these advisers of the President.

Can anything be done to avert this impending danger? Can any practical steps be taken that will save the Jews of Russia from vicarious suffering for the sins of the renegade Jewish Bolshevik leaders and their thoughtless supporters in America? It is useless to appeal to the Conference at Paris; the Russian people are beyond its jurisdiction. It is stupid to talk of exacting a guarantee from Kolchak and his Government as the price of recognition. Kolchak has already announced unequivocally his stand for religious toleration and race protection. But what can Kolchak and the Omsk Government do? They would be powerless in the face of the popular indignation that would follow such a demand from the outside. We have already exasperated the Russians enough with the suggestion of the Prinkipo Conference; with the Bullitt and Steffens Missions; with the proposal to feed Bolshevik Russia; with the disgraceful abandonment of Odessa to be plundered by the Red Guard.

As I look over the field, I can see but one course that promises any chance of success—if perchance it be not already too late. The Russian people must be made to understand that Bolshevism and its works are not a Jewish product, but that the Jews as a class are unalterably opposed to the régime that has encompassed the ruin of Russia and untold sufferings to her people. Let, therefore, the Jews of America join together in the strongest possible pronouncement denouncing the Bolshevik government and repudiating those renegades who have brought dishonor on the Jewish name. The right note was sounded by Rabbi Schulman in his ringing Memorial Day sermon.

"Judaism, as a religion, can not tolerate the spirit of Bolshevism," said Dr. Schulman. "Judaism is essentially a religion of law, of the law of right, which distinguishes between mine and thine, of the law of justice, which seeks to hold the scales evenly between all the elements in the national life. Therefore, no one who understands the genius of Judaism will commit himself to the moral madness of Bolshevism. No one who has a right to speak for it dare so interpret the traditions of Israel, and so deny the foundations of Jewish life, as to declare himself in favor of the madness of Lenin and Trotsky."

Let such a statement be circulated throughout Russia, at whatever cost. Let all loyal and patriotic Russians know that the Jews of America stand with them for humanity and civilization, for justice and order, and that they repudiate the evil counsel that has hitherto led our policy into devious channels. In this way perchance it may be possible to win the confidence of the Russian people and dispel from their minds the belief which now unfortunately possesses them, that the Jews are responsible for the Bolshevik régime and that the Jews of America are supporting it. It is already late in the day and the danger is very near, but by prompt and vigorous action, not along the lines of coercion from without, but of sympathetic coöperation within, they may hope to avert the storm that threatens to engulf millions of their hapless brethren in Russia.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Great Britain and Ireland

OUTSIDE the British Isles there are many who wonder why Britain does not readily grant Irish independence, if Englishmen really believe in political freedom and the Irish desire independence; reluctance to do so on the part of Englishmen must arise from a desire to oppress and tyrannize over Ireland. In former times, unfortunately, there would have been much reason to believe this, but it is neither the whole nor a part of the explanation at present. The primary reason is easy to state and not hard to understand. For the past three hundred years the developing nation states of western Europe have gone their way in rivalry and strife. To survive, to remain, to be great, it has seemed necessary to each of them to consolidate its resources, to increase its strength, to unite separate parts in one whole. If they ceased their efforts, if they relaxed attention, they would certainly fall behind in the race, they might be destroyed by more active rivals. Now, fundamental geographic and strategic considerations have in the past made it the first condition of England's greatness that all the British Isles should be held together in one strong state. As France and Spain were built up out of small kingdoms or feudal domains, so the English kings, after uniting England, first conquered Wales in the Middle Ages, then sought to conquer Scotland and, failing, gradually contrived to unite England and Scotland by peaceful agreement, and in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries completed the conquest of Ireland which had been begun long before. It was no mere lust for dominion and conquest which urged them to do this; it was the soundest statesmanship, as things then were, and as they have generally continued down to the present. In former days Ireland was the natural and proper base for a flank attack upon England, and was generally used for such purposes by the Spaniards in the time of Philip II and by the French under Louis XIV and after 1789. And in the later age Ireland became in respect of these things more rather than less important to Great Britain. In the nineteenth century the population of Britain expanded with its industrial development, until finally its people could not live without constant imports of food and raw materials for their industries. These imports came very largely across the Atlantic and were borne past the coasts of Ireland, north and south. If Ireland were in the hands of the enemy, or if Ireland were independent and hostile, or perhaps even lukewarm during a war, then the essential communications of Britain would be destroyed. Had German submarines found bases along the Irish coast in 1915 and 1916, England would almost certainly have been starved and the cause of the Allies lost. This fact has been clearly recognized by Germans and their sympathizers, and explains much German ardor for Ireland.

It has been said that if Great Britain had given to the Irish actual or virtual independence, gratitude would have brought into being an Irish loyalty towards Great Britain comparable to that of South Africa. But it must be said that the happy outcome in the case of the Boers could not have been counted on with certainty. Irish independence might not have been followed by such loyalty that the Empire in the midst of a great struggle would be as safe as if it still had military and naval control of the Island. Most probably a majority of the Irish people would have stood firm with Great Britain against Germany, but a minority might not, and in the confusion of a time of transition from the old union with Britain to a full measure of Irish independence, German propaganda and intrigue would almost certainly have worked among this minority with success. Had the Boers been ungrateful or unfriendly, they could have done no vital hurt, since they were very far distant; but if an independent Ireland had been only a little hostile to England, or only a little helpful to Germany during the Great War, it would have been a stroke at the very heart of the Empire.

It may be argued that even if all these doubts apply to the past, yet in the new era of the League of Nations such arguments savor of evils departed. If the very causes of rivalry and misunderstanding are about to be removed, why should not Englishmen be willing to let Ireland go her way in complete independence, even though she does lie across the essential communications of Great Britain? By all means, if one can be reasonably sure of the future. But can we be sure? Those who know the past can only hope and strive to bring better things.

But granted that surety with respect to Ireland has hitherto seemed fundamentally important to the people of Britain, so that very rightly they oppose Irish independence, yet in respect of world considerations ought not the Irish to have it anyhow if they desire it? Is not the Irish question essentially similar to that of Jugo-Slavia and that of the Czecho-Slovaks? This is more easily asked than answered. Indeed, it must be answered very differently according to the premises assumed. From the point of view of possible conditions or of conditions as they at present appear, many people consider that the irresistible and proper tendency is towards letting every well-recognized group of people be free to work out its own destiny as it sees fit. If all the old international and strategic relations are to be successfully replaced by something new, it will be safe for England to let Ireland go, very convenient for her to rid herself of Irish trouble, and unrighteous and unwise for her not to let Ireland do as she wishes. If this comes to pass, it is quite probable that later on an independent Ireland may of her own accord seek some union again with Britain, and find great advantage in getting it. On the contrary, if judgment is made in the older way, from premises hitherto deemed proper and valid, the reasoning will be very different. As the result of a great war Central Europe has for the time fallen to pieces, and the discontented are finding solace in rearranging the fragments to suit themselves. Had the British Empire dissolved, doubtless this same process would be now going on with its remains. But actually Britain emerged intact and triumphant. In any difference about Irish matters there are on the one hand the interests and desires of the forty millions of Great Britain, on the other the aspirations and interests of Ireland's four millions. It is not just or proper to ignore either of them for the other.

If on general grounds of justice it is contended that, like the Bohemians, escaped from the tyranny of the Hapsburgs, the Irish should be aided by free peoples the world over to establish an independent state of their own, it may be answered that England does not treat Ireland in a way to make the comparison proper. In the past Ireland did suffer terribly from England, but the old wrongs, done in a time very different from ours, have almost entirely passed away, and at present Irishmen have as members of the United Kingdom exactly the same political status as other citizens in the British Isles.

Ireland was conquered in an age of religious persecution, when conquest meant subjection; she became a colony in an age when colonies were exploited in accordance with Mercantilist theories. Famine made Ireland bitter and oppression turned the bitterness against England. Time does not change it. Yet in the latter part of the nineteenth century a new, a kinder, and a democratic England, urged by the rising and angry insistence of Irishmen, strove to undo the past, and make as full reparation as possible. There is no longer any religious persecution nor any civil or economic discrimination; Irishmen have as complete control of their local affairs as the English and Scots have of theirs, and share as equals, so far as they are willing, in the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; the old power of the landlords has been broken, and the British Government has assisted the Irish peasants to buy the soil and become independent proprietors, until now most of the agricultural land is in the possession of Irish farmers. Not all of the past has been undone: it takes some time to uproot an old establishment and make a real and lasting improvement, unless one is a literary or professional reformer. The relics of the old government remain in Ireland; they are expensive and burdensome and are not properly controlled by the Irish people. Castle government and military occupation should be brought to an end, and almost certainly will be in no long time, if the Irish people will assist. To meet Irish poverty, which Sinn Fein reformers believe Irish independence will quickly abolish, intelligent government assistance can do a great deal. But the truth seems to be that some parts of Ireland, like some parts of Scotland and England, are not very richly endowed with natural resources for either agriculture or industrial life.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the Irish may speedily get what they really believe best for them; but it is evident that the principle of self-determination, like the principle of nationality, can be extended to a ridiculous infinity. The thirteen American States once had experience of this, and their wise and speedy decision to surrender some of their separatism and unite in a larger organization was the basis of later prosperity and power. For the British Isles this has been accomplished as the result of war and negotiation in the past three hundred years. The union of Scotland and England, completed in 1707, was opposed by a minority in both countries, but it has given security to England and prosperity to Scotland, and redounded immensely to the benefit of both. In the eighteenth century Ireland desired complete union with Britain, and while the act which accomplished this in 1800 was unpopular and was brought to pass through bribery and intimidation, it might nevertheless soon have been accepted as desirable, had not George III prevented the Catholic emancipation which should have gone with it. The various parts of the British Isles adjoin one another or lie close together, and for the most part they are inhabited by the same people—for while there is a brilliant and priceless Irish nationality, the best authorities believe that racially the peoples of England and Ireland are not very different. Therefore I can not but believe that the complete separation which Sinn Fein demands now is but one of the fervid things engendered in these late strange and passionate years, and that if Sinn Fein is to retain its present ascendancy it must moderate its demands and take a place more like that of the Nationalists who once followed Parnell and John Redmond. Indeed, there are signs of this already.

There is, notwithstanding, no doubt that Ireland has her own particular problems which may best be settled by her own people. If most Irishmen believe that their affairs can be better administered by an Irish parliament and a responsible executive in Ireland, there would seem to be no good reason now why they should not have them. Some competent critics believe that more efficient government will come when Scottish and Welsh affairs and also the affairs of various parts of England are administered locally in the same manner, all the parts continuing to be united under one central government. I suspect there are not many Englishmen now who would oppose Irish self-government within the British Empire. "The England of the war is wholly unlike any England that has ever been," said Sir Horace Plunkett in 1917, and it was my opinion before the war that a majority in Great Britain had come to assent to Home Rule. Why, then, it may be asked, has Home Rule in some form acceptable to the Irish not been given, especially when Irish aspirations have been advanced so passionately these last five years? It is not difficult to understand why. The period of a death-grapple for the existence of the British Empire was no fitting time to effect a change which would for a while loosen if not alter the connection of Ireland and Britain. The European war postponed a settlement of the Irish question as it postponed many another thing very desirable. But difficulties come from Ireland itself. Whatever the merits of the case, the fact remains that a considerable part of Ulster has been so opposed to Home Rule that it was prepared to resist it by armed force, and in 1914 the British Government had to face the unpleasant probability that putting Home Rule into effect would entail the employment of the British armed forces to coerce a population that would fight to retain its membership in the commonwealth of the United Kingdom. I do not pretend to judge whether Ulster is wrong and unwise or has been stirred to its action by baneful politicians. Much of Ulster has insisted upon a continuance of the Union for herself, while the rest of Ireland insists that Irish self-government will be a failure without her. It is but fair to say that the people of Ulster employ against the rest of Ireland many of the most effective arguments used by other Irishmen in stating their case against Britain—a minority different in character and conditions of life which should have the privilege of going its own particular way.

The difficulties of the Irish problem do not justify despair. It is only in books and in debating societies that really difficult questions find complete and ready solution. In the midst of much noisy announcement by enthusiasts, the wisest and best people of Britain and Ireland are working at the thing patiently, as is their wont, and almost certainly success will come to their efforts. I make no predictions, but I believe that a freer and happier Ireland will remain part of the great group of British commonwealths, and that Irishmen and Englishmen, forgiving and forgetting, will like each other and assist each other more hereafter than they have ever done in the past.

EDWARD RAYMOND TURNER

Mr. Creel and the Non-Partisan League

I HAVE read Mr. Creel's article in Everybody's, entitled "Our Aliens, Were They Loyal or Disloyal?" The portion of the article dealing with the situation in Minnesota, with special reference to the activities of the Non-Partisan League, is so false that I feel it my duty as a public official to make a counter-statement. I can submit in substantiation of my statement letters, telegrams, and copies of court records which prove that officers of the National Non-Partisan League were indicted and prosecuted for disloyalty under the statute commonly known as the Sedition Law.

My attention was first called to the activities of the Non-Partisan League, soon after our entry into the war, by a large number of complaints made to my office. Its activities were generally confined to towns almost solidly German, the evident intent being to prevent men of German birth and descent from joining with other citizens in aiding the Government in prosecuting the war.

One Townley organizer, at a meeting held by the League on the 10th day of October, 1917, in the town of Sioux Valley, in Jackson County, told his audience that it was not safe to buy United States Government bonds, that the United States would soon be bankrupt, and would be unable to pay its financial obligations. This same Townley organizer at a meeting held later in the town of Minneota, in this county, said that those present ought not to purchase Liberty bonds, and that they had better invest their money in Non-Partisan League elevators. Later, and on the 25th day of January, 1918, this same Townley organizer tried to get one John Steiner to join the Non-Partisan League and to collect sixteen dollars for a membership therein. Freitag said to Steiner: "If you farmers will join the Non-Partisan League, we can make a law so as to stop your boys from being taken into the Army."

The meetings referred to were held during a Liberty Loan drive in this county and were attended by Judge Thoreson, the judge of the Probate Court of this county, J. G. Brauch, the cashier of the Farmers' State Bank, of Lakefield, Minnesota, and other citizens of unquestioned standing. Many complaints came to this office, as well as to the office of the sheriff, requesting that something should be done to stop them. On January 18, 1918, the heads of the Safety Commission, America First Association, and other officers of the county directed a letter to the National Non-Partisan League headquarters at St. Paul, advising the officers of the League of the disloyal character of the Townley organizers in this county. In response to this letter the National Non-Partisan League sent Mr. Joseph Gilbert, the manager and director of the League, and several League officers and organizers to Lakefield, Minnesota, on the 23rd day of January, 1918, for the purpose of holding a Non-Partisan meeting. The sheriff of this county, the county attorney, the county auditor, the judge of probate, who was the chairman of the America First Association for the county, local representatives of the Safety Commission, Liberty Bond Committee and other officers met with Mr. Gilbert and other League members and officers and advised them of the disloyal character of the work which had been carried on by the League in this county for many months prior thereto, informing them also of the opposition by the Townley organization to the Liberty bonds, to the selective draft, and other Government work. They requested Mr. Gilbert not to hold a Non-Partisan meeting, for the reason that such a meeting would be likely to result in a great disturbance and possibly riot. Mr. Gilbert in his reply said, "You are a lot of provincials, but I know what my rights are; I shall defy the officers of the county and if they want to arrest anybody they can arrest me." Mr. Gilbert then requested that he should be allowed to address the persons present, possibly a hundred in number, as to the purpose of his coming to Lakefield. He was allowed to do so, and, among other things, he said, "The United States has never before drafted its citizens into the Army." Judge Thoreson, who was presiding, corrected the speaker and drew his attention to the fact that the citizens were drafted during the Civil War. Mr. Gilbert, however, allowed his statement to stand.

He then made an appeal to a large number of citizens who had come into the room not to pay any attention to the officers of the county, but to go with him for the purpose of holding a meeting. Accompanied by a large number of men, Mr. Gilbert left the hall and proceeded to Sand Kamp's Livery Barn, and there delivered a very impassioned and very disloyal speech, in which, among other things, he said:

All these young men in North Dakota and Minnesota ought to be left on the farms. . . . The boys shouldn't be taken into the army, they are better off where they are than in the trenches, five thousand miles away. . . . When the Government conscripted your boys, it didn't conscript wealth; if it had, we shouldn't have to have wheatless days, meatless days and heatless days. . . . You farmers are trying to produce more crops than ever before and you have had to subscribe to the Liberty Loan, the Red Cross, and the Y. M. C. A., and on top of all that they now take your boys. . . . The Safety Commission, Judge Thoreson, and your other county officers are a bunch of flag-wavers and shouters, they spell their patriotism to the farmers P-A-Y.

Before the speech was ended, the sheriff interfered, arrested Mr. Gilbert, and dispersed the crowd. This meeting and the disloyal things said by Gilbert at the meeting are the bases of prosecutions which are now pending against him in this county. After the arrest of Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Townley, officers of the League tried to make it appear that the Federal Government fully endorsed its principles and that the League and its officers had the support of the President, as well as of other high officers in the Federal Government. To back up this claim an attempt was made to hold Non-Partisan League meetings in this county at which speakers furnished by the Committee on Public Information should speak.

We should have had little trouble with our foreign element had it not been for the disloyal work of the Townley organizers. Though many of the members of the National Non-Partisan League in this and other counties of the State were disloyal and pro-German, they were strengthened in their attitude by the speeches of Townley, La Follette, Gilbert, and hundreds of Non-Partisan League officers who went up and down the State preaching disloyalty and sedition, class hatred and social unrest.

If Mr. Creel really believes what he has stated in his article, he certainly was entirely duped by A. C. Townley. Mr. Creel, however, was in a position to obtain the facts if he so desired. We had no objection whatever to Mr. Creel's sending speakers into this county, but we did object seriously to the Federal Government sending speakers here under the auspices of a political organization whose every activity had been disloyal. Mr. Creel says that the opposition to the National Non-Partisan League was political in nature. This is absolutely false. There has been no time in the history of this county when political differences were so completely wiped out. All loyal men of this county, irrespective of their party affiliations, were greatly aroused by the disloyal activities of Townley and his organizers.

After this programme of disloyalty had been carried out in Jackson County for some months, a hundred men were summoned by the local draft board for service. Out of the hundred, eighty-five rushed from the rooms of the medical examiners to the local board and claimed exemption. There is no doubt that this attitude was occasioned very largely by the seditious and disloyal doctrine preached in this county by officers and organizers of the Non-Partisan League.

E. H. NICHOLAS

County Attorney, Jackson County, Minn.

Correspondence

“What Would France With Us?”

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

“Lafayette, nous voilà!”

Imperishable phrase—its validity attested by victorious American youth. Sanctified with the holiest human sacrifices, it belongs with the laconicisms of historical literature.

Yet will it—though engraved on brass—resist the corrosive acid of the Comic Spirit? Was Irony—the Gallic imp of letters—whispering in the ear of the soldier who uttered it?

Had some one put that question a brief month ago, we should have shouted, “Treason!” Were we not one with France? After an amazing myopia, had not our eyes been opened? Did we not perceive the flame, did not our dull ears detect the meaning in the music of the Marseillaise?

Undoubtedly! Observe the mercurial American: Behold libations! Lo and behold, loving cups; Hell Gate to the Golden Horn spouting with spontaneous emotions. A long-suppressed desire, a Freudian dream actualized and liberated in tokens, cries, and carnivals. Our Goddess, frantic for French fashions, exchanges her crown for the tri-colored cap.

Frankly, I watched with misgivings this orgy of enthusiasm. An American whose forebears were French, had I not mentally made note of our limitless capacity for reaction? Did we not all but deify a Dewey only to dethrone him? Had we not—? Attend!

In a New York club, whose mentor is Minerva, the thing occurred. For weeks the world’s slain serpent, waiting sun-down, had been wriggling with his woes. We heard the expiring hiss: Our Allies were at odds. France frowned at Wilson. French profiteers “bled” the American soldier. The “American” Mr. Hearst—booted by public opinion, hid by a buxom Britannia—thus spat, from Los Angeles, at France: “An American soldier can not take ten steps in the streets of Paris without being insulted by the crowd.” Thus, on a Sunday in Manhattan, removed his slouch hat in prayer meeting: “France is making $75,000,000 a month out of the American occupation. . . . The only idea is to exploit the Americans.”

But in this New York club! Ready with applause for a woman lately in that devastated land, they waited for the word that might refresh them for laboring anew—for sustaining at least those Americans still toiling at reconstruction. They waited, and they heard:

“France no longer needs us. Her shopkeepers have been at work. She has taken toll from our army. Withhold all further help, and she will recover; continue to aid her, and we pauperize a nation.”

So, in substance, spoke the lady: a distinguished lady. An intellectual leader, in the front rank of her profession. She had gone, labored, observed, given—and returned to tell them this.

What did it mean? Kid gloves politely smothered gasps. Uplifted eyebrows automatically responded to long-imposed restraint. The lady was their guest. Toujours la politesse! France, you would receive them socially!

With infinite patience, Frenchmen had explained their own sufferings inflicted by these same profiteers. From our warm-hearted West came tales of shopkeepers grasping—not so much the hand as the dime of heroes home from war. . . . But the club guest was speaking again:

“France is her old self once more. She is as she was before the war. The combat exalted her. We saw her then as she had not been before—as she will not be again. She was exaltée; now she is normal, as in 1913.”

No German propaganda this—yet something, alas! as subtle. What the lady said—what too many other ladies and gentlemen, alas! are saying, may but be the sequence of our twin defects. Ah, my fellow Americans—justly proud of your public schools, of your sociable Universities, of your freedom conferred by the Constitution to be free to go your ways: reading all editions, and meditating not at all—blame not, I implore you, the Movies and the extra Extras. Ere ever Mr. Chaplin fell plump into a pie; ere ever one Hearst was hoist with his own petard—you were, O next of kin, addicted to two drugs. Clinical reports by our doctors of mental hygiene damn you doubly:

1. You swallow much sentimentalism.
2. You take printed matter in overdoses. Mushy with the one, you lust to rear an idol over-night that you may lynch it with the dawn. Muddled with the other, you can not or will not learn to think clearly.

As to sentimentalism, it has caused more crimes than the name of Liberty. Was it imported here by aliens sticky with the treacle of Werther? That is another inquiry. What it is doing for the stage, what it has done for fiction, essays, art, is obvious enough. Sentimental, our sentiment is too often false; thinking thickly, we should sit at the feet of the French.

What to do else? Ask some psychologist—umpire for all our ills. And then, better still, ask yourself. Meditate. With Bolshevism, it may be, lurking in your best friend’s back parlor—reforming human nature while you wait; with everyone, from editor to errand boy, competent to settle offhand the affairs of a wobbling world, better, we say, get into a quiet corner and pray a bit. Or, if prayer be only for that proletariat once pronounced “the poor,” well, then, it is Walt Whitman’s centenary. Your parlor radical thinks he knows his Walt Whitman, the revolutionary—who praised the virtues of good Queen Victoria; who counseled that so long as there were anarchists, we needed the police. But your Whitman democrat does not know this: from Whitman he deduces welter; from Camerado, the chaos of Bolshevik brotherhood—originally introduced by Cain.

So, after all, suppose you try to pray. Then you might ask yourself: Would it perhaps be wisdom’s part first to understand France before you admire her so; to realize that she can perhaps help us more—if only in the negligible arts, if only in the will to think—than we can as yet help her. That this is not unimportant I should like the space to prove—out of your own mouths. Scratching only the surface, there is left but a line to say:

“Avaunt, O Comic Spirit! Ironic Imp, erump!” Then we without uniform who also served in that we “stood and waited” may yet be educated to announce—without sentimentalism, having thought it over: “Lafayette, nous voilà!!”

WILLIAM TROWBRIDGE LARNED
New York, May 30

Poetry

Cain

And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

CAN ye not make an end? The waiting world

Grows restive o’er the terms that lawyers use.

Have ye no case, when multitudes have hurled

Upon his guilty head their great j’accuse?

What holds your hands? Do ye, perchance, debate

Of punishments—of exile or of death?
What lone sea-rock would be commensurate

In horror with a mother’s drowning breath?

Let him live on! Already hath been passed

A sentence to which human tribunes bow.

Let him live on—expatriate, outcast, Bearing the mark of Cain upon his brow!

EDMUND KEMPER BROADUS

Book Reviews

A New Liberalism

THE GREAT ALTERNATIVE. By Leonard J. Reid. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

A NEW liberalism or—chaos; this is what the author of this work means by the great alternative. Somehow or other there has got to be a better distribution of wealth and an infinitely wider range of opportunity for the masses of the people. If it does not come through wise leadership supported by enlightened voting power, it will come by the pressure of civil commotion, riot and perhaps civil war. This is written with particular reference to Great Britain, but if Mr. Reid has an informing word to utter on the subject he will find an eager audience in America.

Such a word he has, despite the shortcomings which minds of different types will discover in his work. His unbounded faith in the political and economic wisdom of President Wilson will not be shared by all his readers, and some of them will undoubtedly find in his remarks too much of the library and too little of the market place. With every allowance, however, there is here an exceptional amount of common sense, the one thing of which the world has greatest need to-day.

This is apparent in the chapter urging a better distribution of wealth. Much that is said will impress the cold and calculating economist, however just and generous, as verging on the sentimental. Yet in the following we have a declaration that easily covers a multitude of sins: "The first great step towards making a better distribution of wealth possible is to increase wealth, and the only royal road to the increase of wealth is by the increase of production. That is the great truth that we have to bear in mind." It is, indeed, and it is possibly a truth more effectually inculcated in terms tinged with emotionalism than in the soundest words of the classical economist.

The war has imposed an enormous debt on Great Britain, entailing most burdensome taxation. Labor sees this and the cry has gone up for a "conscription of wealth," or a "capital levy," to pay off the national debt. Capitalists are, of course, opposed to such a programme, and so is our author on a magnified scale. He appears, however, to be something of an opportunist, for, while holding that anything like a £5,000,000,000 or £6,000,000,000 levy would be little short of mere economic moonshine, he says: "Some form of capital levy, undertaken with the consent of the richer classes, would stand out before the world as a spectacular act, a striking exhibition of the realization of the calls of patriotism and responsibility. Such a policy would blunt the swords of the wild men of the socialist extremists. It might even afford the only escape from the dilemma of revolution or repudiation."

Mr. Reid is confined in no pent-up Utica, and we can not in these remarks accompany him in all his journeys. Yet we can not refrain from citing a few of his observations. In discussing Liberty and the State, he says: "I can not see how in a general way we can, if we believe in individual freedom, logically deny the 'right to get drunk.' We condemn drunkenness morally, but can we allow the right of the State to dictate to us what our morals shall be?" National sobriety is a high aim of all right thinking people. But to take coercive means, to try to make the nation clean by legislation which incidentally will interfere with the perfectly legitimate and reasonable consumption of a large part of the population is, he contends, the wrong way of aiming at the desired goal.

With all his sympathy with labor, we find him saying that any attempt by the state to enforce agreement between capital and labor would be as futile and disastrous as an attempt to dictate to the people of another nation the form of constitution under which they must live. The events of the war period do not impress him as pointing to the superiority of governmental control of industry. On the subject of Industrial Self-Government he asks, "Have you no faith in human nature?" The essence of democracy, he adds, is faith in the prevalence of general good sense in the majority, provided hasty decisions are eliminated. Again, to insist upon good management of old and new house property and upon adequate comfort and modernity in new construction; to provide reasonable security of tenure and safeguards against exorbitant rent charges—these must be the guiding lines of the attitude of the new liberalism, which on the other hand will not tolerate spoliation of the landlord. The war has strengthened immeasurably his faith in free trade. He pleads for more efficient education, and declares that it is the rational course to consider education, first of all, as affecting trade and commerce and the "earning of living." In superintending education the state should superintend health, including pre-natal health.

The right of labor to share in the management of industry being conceded, it is a short and logical step to the acknowledgment of labor's claim to a right to share in the profits; that is, over and above wages. Mr. Reid is hardly as successful in dealing with this subject as with some of his others. He quotes certain well-known industrialists in support of his contention. Lord Leverhulme, who is perhaps better known as Sir William Lever, of Port Sunlight, is reported as saying that every reduction of hours that has been made since the Earl of Shaftesbury began his agitation for reduced hours has been accompanied by a reduced cost of production. That we may accept, as we may also the assertion that this reduced cost has been due to the greater employment of machinery and mechanical utilities. But we are at a loss to know what to make of the statement that "it has been estimated that capital invested in machinery is accountable, apart from the cost of raw materials, for more than 90 per cent. of the cost of production, and human labor engaged in the active process of production for less than 10 per cent. of the total cost."

This is meaningless when tested by the experience of this country. We have before us as we write, for example, the cost sheet of a mining company in Illinois, which shows the total cost of mining a certain quantity of coal as $1,700,000, the human labor cost being about $1,100,000. A discrepancy of this sort is regrettable; it impairs the value of a work which for many reasons is entitled to exceptionally high commendation.

Tin Soldiers and Paper Dolls

THE TIN SOLDIER. By Temple Bailey. Philadelphia: The Penn Publishing Company.

THE CITY OF COMRADES. By Basil King. New York: Harper and Brothers.

VICTORIOUS. By Reginald Wright Kauffman. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company.

"THE TIN SOLDIER" has been among the most popular novels of the past few months. Perusal thereof will confirm, alas, the worst suspicions of the observer who has had reason to be skeptical of such phenomena in the past. "The Tin Soldier" is a book of vulgar conventions such as in our crowded places, the church, the theatre, the "forum," the press, are wont, from year to year and age to age, to be mechanically thumbed over, and recognized with a kind of dull comfort, without ever exacting the inconvenience of examination. The plot is based upon the most mawkish of absurdities, the sacrifice of living things, including common sense, to the keeping of a foolish promise to the dead. The young gentleman in the story whom we are to accept as hero (and this is the kind of yarns that must have one of those well-groomed and well-lighted gentry) has promised his dying mother that he will "never leave" his drunken but aristocratic father. Therefore, when the war breaks out, and every instinct and muscle of him longs to be off to the front, he is obliged to lop about in melancholy attitudes while everybody calls him a tin soldier, anglice, slacker. He is mute, even with the girl of his heart, since honor, which compels him to stay at home as not over-successful watch-dog over the naughty old father, compels him also to another famous occupation of romantic heroes, namely, suffering in silence. This situation gives room for no end of artificial cross-purpose and submersible sentiment. Ere the end Derry is permitted to feel himself absolved of his vow, the old General his father is reformed, and the lovers are wed shortly before, by inches and watering his path with our proud and gentle tears, we speed Derry on his way overseas. It is right and noble of him to go. But oh, dear, what if he should get hurt?

All this, you say, is a very old-fashioned and feminine kind of thing. So it is; and yet in the current novel it is by no means solely a product of feminine hands. Here are the latest performances of two popular male romancers. They attempt something in the way of serious interpretation of our time, contain a good deal of realistic detail, as well as of preaching and direct commentary; but as stories they are frankly lashed to the wooden mast of romantic convention. Mr. King has his idea of the "Down and Outs" and their mutually regenerative functions; he has his ideas about the war, and America's part in it, and its influence on the future. He is one of those who believe that something radical has happened, that this particular war, by reason of its scale, has actually changed human nature: "Since we have thrown off our mental shackles in great moments, we shall see that we can do the same in small, and, having emerged on a higher plane, we shall stay there. Staying there, we shall doubtless go on in time to a higher plane still—a plane on which the mighty works that are now wrought in war will become feasible in peace." And so on: our author's eloquence now and then seems to be running its own show, in the manner of a pulpitier who prides himself upon being nothing if not human, and is not too proud to babble on occasion. But when, as always with this writer, we detach the story-teller from the keen observer and too fluent dogmatist, we find him about a very simple business. The younger son of a titled Canadian drinks himself into the gutter. He breaks into the house of some people in New York to whom he has held unrepresented letters of introduction, and nearly gets away with the jewels of the (beautiful) daughter of the family. But the girl confronts him, forgives him (because she sees that he has been a gentleman) and he withdraws without the jewels but with her casual blessing. Love at sight for him: now he has something to live for, and with the aid of the Down and Outs he is presently moving, as "a rising young architect" in the lady's own circle. She must never know: whenever he thinks of the possibility, the vision of a revolver he keeps in a certain drawer comes to him pleasantly. They have arrived at an unspoken "understanding" when his sense of honor compels him to tell her the truth. She is not unnaturally annoyed for the moment, since he has represented her ideal of the perfect knight—no, "thoroughbred." He, while realizing his unworthiness, is greatly put out by her failure to forgive him offhand. He thinks of the revolver, and he thinks more favorably of drinking himself to death. But the faithful "buddy" of his gutter days steps in. Then the war handily arrives, and it is our hero to the front, followed, according to all the rules, by our heroine; and after a somewhat laboriously prolonged course of misunderstandings and coincidences, backings and fillings, we are almost permitted to see them go to the altar together and have it over. But there is the war, and their work that must be done; so that we do actually leave them still fiddling with the idea of marriage, after all we have been through with them. Does anybody get the impression that this pair are unreal? By no means: they are a real hero and a real heroine, going faithfully about the business to which the god of romance has called them.

The author of "Victorious" does one brave and, for his purposes, foolish thing. His Andy and Sylvia are put through virtually the same paces of cross-purpose and purblind fumbling with the obvious, that our other romantic pairs have been condemned to. But there are three ways of ending matters. The author of "The Tin Soldier" has not the heart to grudge us the spectacle of the young lovers wedded for a few days before the youth is off to war. In "The City of Comrades," as we have seen, love is put off till duty shall be done, the inference being that it will not be put off forever in this world. But the pair in "Victorious," after coming to the same noble abnegatory understanding, part to meet no more. Andy is permitted rather more than his probable toll of Huns, but is then brutally and treacherously slain by the romancer. There is our story. What else is in the book (and the else, after all, takes up most of it) is a thorough-going demonstration of the fact that our Government muddled things horribly during our first year in the war, that the censorship nearly lost the war for us and the world, and that it was won by a hairsbreadth through the efforts, against all odds, of our war correspondents, of whom Mr. Kauffman seems to have been one. However, he wishes it understood that matters have come out pretty well in the end; and is even at pains to convert his villainous lieutenant-censor and his venal air-plane magnate, at Andy's death-bed. Patches of realism, thickets of controversy, and a harmless little tale of conventional sentiment running happily through them. But it wasn't right to kill off Andy.

H. W. BOYNTON

Landmarks of Americanism

THE WORLD WAR AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.
By William Herbert Hobbs. With an Introduction by Theodore Roosevelt.
New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

PROFESSOR HOBBS delivered a course of lectures on Patriotism before the University of Pittsburgh last summer which with some additions, including a most valuable series of references to current history, form the substance of this volume. Not unnaturally did Mr. Roosevelt commend it as the one book above all others that he would wish the public to read at this time; for its spirit is exactly that of which Mr. Roosevelt was the chief exemplar.

It is a sturdy patriotism that Professor Hobbs preaches. He not only shares the views of preparedness, of America's relations to the war and to the peace and of the threatening dangers to our own liberties so often expressed by Mr. Roosevelt, but he also shows much of his hard-hitting fearlessness and his instinct for the essentials of a situation. Professor Hobbs makes no pretense of philosophic detachment. He evidently desires to be impartial, but is far removed from neutrality on any point at issue. With burning indignation he reviews Germany's attack on civilization and with scarcely less heat America's response to that attack. Leaving aside military operations and making no attempt at a diplomatic and political history of the war, he dissects out from the overwhelming mass of records the materials for a vivid and generally true picture of Germany and ourselves. His Germany shows a unity of policy from Frederick the Great to William II, a policy of violence and broken faith, of cynical oppression and tyrannical repression. As we review the story, we can only marvel at the blindness with which the English-speaking world followed the hero-worship of Carlyle in admiration of the false Frederick, hailed as noble statesmanship the baseness and brutality of Bismarck, and dwelt in a fool's paradise while the German military power with unconcealed truculence prepared for its subjugation.

The author makes clear the deliberation with which Germany forced the war and reveals the springs of policy actuating her. That policy neither ignored America as an ultimate enemy in Berlin's ambitious plans for world conquest, nor failed of elaborate preparation to undermine our patriotism. Professor Hobbs's analysis of German propaganda and intrigue against this country, long antedating the war, is of great interest and value. The ingenuity with which philosophy, religion, and sentimental aspiration were used to mask thoroughly hostile operations should be remembered by a people peculiarly subject, as we are, to enthusiasm for phrase-making. Doubtless this propaganda had much to do with America's two years of confusion about its duty in the war, but failure of official leadership had more to do with it. It is frequently said that sentiment in the United States was not ripe for making the world safe for democracy before the President formulated that rallying cry. If so, it was chiefly because every natural moral impulse had been repressed and every simple issue confused by authority. The people had been told to be neutral in thought about the rape of Belgium, to be too proud to fight over the murder of their wives and children on the Lusitania, to feel that with the causes and objects of the war we were not concerned. They were asked to reelect the President on the ground that he had kept us out of war, and after that, within only a few weeks of our declaration of war, in the face of the greatest moral issue of modern times, when every element for a moral judgment was plainly in sight, they were asked to support a peace without victory between right and wrong. No wonder citizens were confused and listened to pacifists when they were suddenly called on to reverse every idea of the war, of our duty to the Allies, and of our own military policy that had been preached from Washington from the beginning of the struggle.

In dealing with the Administration Professor Hobbs is restrained in language, but severe almost to cruelty in the pitiless marshalling of the record. Less restrained is his characterization of others who seem to him to have been blind leaders, or teachers of false standards of patriotism. He speaks with wholesome candor about individuals and tendencies in our national life, and in striving for the concreteness of expression necessary for the platform he often turns to epithet. Sometimes he overshoots the mark. For example, to call Horace Greeley "one of the most influential of the Copperheads" is grotesquely to misuse that term. Greeley, for all his petulance and vagaries, was one of the most loyal and devoted lovers of the Union and had nothing in common with the Confederacy's Northern sympathizers and abettors, like Vallandigham, to whom the name Copperhead belongs. The statement immediately following, that Greeley edited "the great exponent of public opinion in the North," amounts in itself to a refutation of the epithet—unless the Northern people along with their great exponent of public opinion were themselves Copperheads.

Much that Professor Hobbs says on peace terms and in favor of an alliance making a balance of power in preference to a general league of nations becomes academic in face of the actual work of the Peace Conference. The lesson on American patriotism that he draws from the war is, however, of continuing and vital importance. He sees a country in danger of forgetting its priceless heritage of individual rights, which power, whether of a monarch or a majority, may not invade, and committing itself to intolerant and meddling bureaucracy, which confounds loyalty to the nation with subserviency to administration. Notwithstanding his indignation over the opportunities given to pacifists and German intrigues here, he is concerned lest the spirit of loyalty may be misdirected to the fostering of personal government. The meaning of free speech, free press, representative government, protection from arbitrary exactions, and the reign of equal laws does not reveal itself untaught, and unfortunately many natives, as well as immigrants without traditions of these inalienable rights, learn nothing of their value, or their cost. The landmarks of the American inheritance are, Professor Hobbs rightly believes, worth searching out and guarding while we are seeking to spread free government throughout the world.

Pax Japonica

THE MASTERY OF THE FAR EAST. By Arthur Judson Brown. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

IN assuming as a basis for his interpretation of Eastern affairs, the supreme strategic importance to Japan of the Korean Peninsula, Mr. Brown takes the position so ably expounded for nearly twenty years by such keen observers as Putnam Weale and others of his mind. His method is first to "describe the country and people, and then discuss the struggle between China and Japan for the possession of Korea, and its culmination in the China-Japan War; the diplomatic and military struggle between Russia and Japan for the coveted prize, and its culmination in the Russia-Japan War; the supremacy in the Far East that Japan won by her victory in that memorable conflict; the policies and methods of Japan in governing a subject people; the characteristics of Japan as the Imperial Power in Asia and a world-power of the first magnitude; and the place and influence of Christian missions as one of the most potent of the enlightening and reconstructive forces which are operating in the Far East and which hold the promise of a better world order." But the significance of Korea's position—a tongue of land jutting out from the continent to within 120 miles of Japan proper—is lost amidst the detailed description of rivers, towns, and mountains; only inferentially does one see why the Korean Peninsula became a highway of empire through which Genghiz Khan swept on his invasion of Japan, and which Japan, since 1894, has constantly used in the effort to penetrate to the heart of East Asia.

This lack of perspective extends to the political events unfolded in the period culminating in the annexation of Korea by Japan in 1910. The familiar story of China's relations with Japan, which precipitated the Chino-Japanese War in 1894, and the Russo-Japanese struggle in the ensuing decade, which hinged on the control of Korea, is rechronicled; but the high lights touched on are not new, nor are the historical judgments profound. For instance, in the discussion of Mr. Knox's scheme for the neutralization of railways in China we find dismissed as "a beautiful mirage" (p. 215) what is to-day pressed by the leading exponents of Chinese politics as the only solution for China's difficulties which duly recognizes the vested interests of the Powers and at the same time saves China from virtual partition. Mr. Knox's proposal also embraced concessions involving communications in China, something overlooked in this book and in other criticisms of Knox's diplomacy. Finally, it is not "all the more amazing that he should have allowed it to become public before he had confidentially ascertained the attitude of the Powers concerned." Those conversant with this chapter in American diplomacy know that Mr. Knox was the victim of much the same sort of premature announcement from which Secretary of State Lansing recently suffered in the case of the Ishii-Lansing Agreement.

In any discussion of the Japanese Empire's place in the world, it would seem that the economic structure on which its military power rests should be examined with relation to its strategic implications. Japan's effectiveness as a world Power turns on her ability to back up her military machine. But this is dismissed with the statement that "Japan realizes that its material resources are greatly inferior to those of other first-class Powers, and that the position and ambitions of the nation require wealth as well as an army and navy" (p. 274). Though Japanese statesmen know this, it appears that those men who at infrequent intervals turn from European realities to Oriental possibilities are not yet equally sure of it.

"However reassuring the public language of diplomacy may be," declares Dr. Brown in turning to Chinese complications, "any one who acts on the assumption that the Japanese do not possess an ascendancy in Chinese matters which they intend to maintain is likely to have a rude awakening." Yet, as he demonstrates, Japan is using this assumed paramountcy to China's ruin; and he is rightly suspicious of China's prospects (p. 437). But the solution presented is startling:

Meantime, we can only urge Japan to be just and fair to a sister people in a trying period of transition and readjustment, and to refrain from taking advantage of proximity and superior power. . . . It would be well also if other nations would be careful to refrain from acts and policies which might intensify an already tense and somewhat inflammable state of mind in this part of the world, and which might strengthen the feeling of the Japanese that they must aggressively push their interests in self-protection (p. 446).

In other words, we must not advise Chinese factions to compose their differences, must not support China's claim to her own territory in Shantung, must not propose the cancelling of railroad concessions, must not protest infringements of our prior rights by recent Chino-Japanese contracts—for, though we are doing all these things, they are undoubtedly arousing the bitter hostility of the Japanese statesmen of the old school who see their handicraft in Asia threatened.

Reverting, however, to the problem of Korea, we find a measured survey of Japan's stewardship. The petty and the serious aspects of mal-administration are balanced against the undisputed material benefits conferred on the Korean people under Japanese domination. Korea is a touchstone of Japanese purposes and methods. Under present hands, the policy of denationalization initiated by Prince Ito's military successors explains why Japan could not do in Korea what the United States has accomplished in the Philippines. Japan came into Korea with the accumulated dislike of centuries for its people, and embarked on a policy of political disintegration which made certain the hostility of the Koreans. The character of the present uprising of the Koreans and the Japanese methods of repression show how far Japan's militant bureaucracy is from understanding the proper control of backward races.

When dealing with spiritual factors Dr. Brown gives the impression of speaking authoritatively; "spiritually regenerated Japan would mean much for the Far East and for the whole world." The political point of view, usually overstressed, is supplemented by this admirable survey of the religious quickening in which lies the hope of a unification of East and West. In this connection, the discussion of Japan's moral responsibility for debauching the Korean and Chinese peoples by the systematic trafficking in illicit drugs and the social evil forms a serious indictment which has not been quashed.

Two actual misstatements may be referred to briefly. It is said that Princess Nashimoto was married on January 21 of this year to Yi, the ex-Crown Prince of Korea. This marriage, we are informed authoritatively from Japanese sources, has been postponed for one year on account of the death of the ex-Emperor of Korea.

A serious misstatement occurs in the following passage: ". . . If I were a Japanese I should feel that my country's claim to eastern Siberia and northern Manchuria was stronger than the claim of any Western nation. Russia has no title to these regions except that she took them under extorted treaties because she felt she needed them in the interests of national expansion" (p. 465). Russia's claim to predominance in North Manchuria, we recognize, is diplomatically not better than Japan's occupancy of South Manchuria. But to lump Eastern Siberia with Manchuria is flying in the face of facts of history. The treaties entered into between China and Russia embraced the region north of the Amur, a country which was peopled by tribes owing a divided allegiance of the most nominal sort and which the Chinese and Russian Empires both strove to control. Russia made good her claim because she colonized it effectively at the critical time; and Russia's possession of the Maritime Province was confirmed by arrangements with China in the middle of the nineteenth century because of this actual occupation. Siberia has been made an integral part of Russia in exactly the same way that the United States occupied the trans-Mississippi region and the Pacific Coast. Japan has neither racial nor historical claim to a foot of the continent of East Asia.

The Run of the Shelves

THERE have been many pilgrims to Palestine, from Sir John Mandeville, who didn't go at all, to Mark Twain, who journeyed thither from Missouri. But the two prime requisites of pilgrimage, that it be undertaken in a spirit of reverence and on foot, have seldom been more fully met than by President John Finley, of the University of the State of New York. Ostensibly a colonel in the American Red Cross he was quite right in calling himself and his book "A Pilgrim in Palestine" (Scribner). For this reason no one should quarrel with him for being sentimental; sentiment is the mother of pilgrimages. And if a pilgrim shall not be allowed to hang up a little tablet of verses at the shrine of his adoration, if he shall not have the right to think of—or to look up—every historical association that clings to the places he visits, why go on a pilgrimage? President Finley exercises such privileges to the full, but his book is saved from being a rather thin mixture of archæology and rhapsody by reason of the striking military operations—the British liberation of Palestine, including the real battle of Armageddon,—of which he was a fortunate observer. His pedestrian feats are little short of amazing. He walked, doing sometimes sixty miles in twenty-two hours on end, from Dan to Beersheba—in reverse direction.

The large advance orders for "The Story of the Rainbow Division," by Raymond Tompkins, to be published this summer by Boni and Liveright, may be taken as an indication that readers, having got the atmosphere of the Great War from many records of personal experience, are now ready for more extended and connected historical narrative. The exploits of the Rainbow Division afford a striking opportunity to open this larger view. Major General Menoher, in command of the Division, writes the introduction.

Mr. Norman Angell observes, in "The British Revolution and American Democracy" (Huebsch), that "the real question which presents itself to western civilization on the morrow of its victory over the Central Empires is not the future of Prussian militarism or even of political democracy. It is the future of the institution of private property and the degree and kind of industrial democracy which we intend in future to permit." There is a good deal of truth in this remark—as he proceeds to demonstrate by a description of the demands of the British Labor Party. The war debts of the European belligerents and the taxation which these debts will require raise the whole question in an acute form, and it is to be remembered that it will be settled by agencies vastly more "democratic" than have ever before conducted post-bellum readjustments. Mr. Angell believes that the adventure of establishing a new social order of an economically egalitarian kind is likely to appeal to men who have risked all in the great adventure of war. He insists that the war has shown the way; all that is now necessary is that the people shall have the will. It is a case for applied pragmatism. And for the generation of that will he mainly relies on the "heretic" and his influence upon the "mass," or the "common folk."

What Mr. Angell thinks is needed is that the "premises of learned folk" concerning property shall be put to question by the "common folk," aided by the effort of the "heretic"—for which efforts there should be guaranteed complete freedom. He must be allowed to put "fundamental questions concerning institutions like that of private property and the relation of social freedom thereto; we must ask why, if it is rightly demanded of the citizen that his life shall be forfeit to the safety of the state his surplus money and property shall not be forfeit to its welfare." Mr. Angell fears that there is a tendency to suppress such "heresies" as dangerous and he considers the removal of this tendency absolutely necessary to progress. By all means let us have talk—plenty of it! No sensible man will ever hesitate to accept any proposal to "talk things out"—even though he may question Mr. Angell's theory of the infallibility of the "common folk" on all matters. But would the Bolsheviki accept this principle? Would the "common folk" accept it? Or is it only good on one side?

plea for social and political revolution. In Kingsley's work they carried no such suggestion. The revolution that he desired was a moral and religious one. The solution of the most vexing social problems lay in the acceptance of Christ's doctrines of brotherly love and mutual consideration. Modern reformers would consider such a programme as vague to the point of futility. Christian socialism, to be sure, had none of the precision and definiteness to be found in the articles of the great Charter, which seemed to open a sure road to human freedom. Yet we now realize that this comprehensive legislative programme would have had almost no ameliorating effect on the economic abuses which it sought to correct. Is it not possible that our soviets and communisms may seem to some future day as pathetically irrelevant to actual social improvement as the Charter does now? If so, we shall then treat with decidedly more respect Kingsley's belief that human happiness depends primarily, not on forms of social organization, but upon the spirit which animates all human relationships.

Charles Kingsley: A Centenary Notice

THOUGH Charles Kingsley was born a hundred years ago, our times are singularly like those which loosed his native vehemence and made it partially articulate in pamphlet and novel. The social unrest of which Chartism was a kind of irrelevant expression is not unlike that of our own day. The turmoil in Kingsley's world made of his art a vehicle for excited social comment and moral exhortation. Similar conditions to-day have given contemporary novels of this sort a sanction and a popularity like that won years ago by "Yeast" and "Alton Locke."

Popular fiction of the present is wont to take the form of thinly veiled propaganda. The vogue of Barbusse's "Under Fire" is due, not to its story, but to its exhibition of the brutalities of modern warfare. We are patient with the artistic crudeness of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" because we see in it a dramatic confirmation of our present notions of German character and German methods of waging war. And Mr. H. G. Wells enlists our immediate approval by merely setting his characters afloat upon a stream of conversation on current topics.

Kingsley's novels are just this familiar sort of discussion of contemporary concerns. He believed that therein lay their chief merit. His fiction was not mere art; it was an instrument of social improvement—an echo of the voice of God. His "artistic knack of utterance" was the gift of the Lord. And that he might constantly realize that it was to be used in His service, God had made His word like fire within his bones, giving him no peace till he had spoken out. Such is Kingsley's own description of the social responsibilities of his art.

He told his pupil, John Martineau, that it was the sight of the Bristol riots of 1832 that made him a radical. This spirit was doubtless kept aflame during his formative years by the decade of Chartist agitation from May 3, 1838, when the People's Charter was published, to its culmination in threatened revolution on April 10, 1848. During these fateful years he expected that great and terrible social convulsions would occur in England. Consequently, he believed that the most important question for the nation was the condition, physical and mental, of the working classes in both town and country. Against the starvation wages, the filthy dwellings, the stifling workshops, and the foul alleys in which the poor lived he could, without instruction, hurl his indignation and his wrath. However, it is doubtful if he would have known into what moulds to pour his ardent sympathy, if he had not become acquainted with the philosophy of Frederick D. Maurice.

Maurice's religious achievement was his discovery in Christian theology of a Divine mandate for social reform. God, he taught, has a plan for the world and human civilization. There, is, therefore, a Christian ideal for society and a best social order towards which God desires the world gradually to move. To turn Chartism from destructive courses and to substitute Christian idealism for superstitious belief in a piece of political mechanism, Maurice and his friends organized the movement known as Christian Socialism. The adoption of this term was a direct challenge to the unsocial Christians and un-Christian socialists of the day. This organization offered scope and provided direction for Kingsley's belligerent activity. It showed him how, by fighting social abuses, he could perform one of the most urgent duties of a priest of God. In his "Letters of Parson Lot," contributed to the Christian Socialists organ, Politics for the People, which ran from May to July, 1848, all the force and fire of Kingsley's soul first found expression. It burned with greater intensity in his pamphlet, "Cheap Clothes and Nasty," written to expose the horrors of the sweat-shop system.

These articles were considered at the time to be dangerously radical. Such statements as the following sound so even now: "The Bible says at once that 'he that will not work, neither shall he eat' and as the Bible speaks to rich as well as poor, so is that speech meant for the idle rich as well as for the idle poor." Such phrases in the mouth of a modern reformer would be a preface to a

The pamphleteering of these years, 1848-1849, profoundly affected the nature of all Kingsley's subsequent works. They were composed in the same spirit of lashing indignation and journalistic immediacy. As Charles Reade said of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," they were written with red blood and biceps muscle. His first two novels, "Yeast" and "Alton Locke," were dashed off while he was under the influence of Chartist excitement. Their reformatory intention is almost as obvious as that of "Cheap Clothes and Nasty." The characters are seldom given leisure to be themselves. Kingsley once said that an author must make his characters talk about all manner of irrelevant things as people do in life; but that "the general tone shall be such as never to make the reader forget the main purpose of the book." This is an excellent formula for a didactic novel, but Kingsley did not follow it. The irrelevancies which he permitted his characters are stiff and very brief precludes to the presentation of the main moral ideas. Lancelot and Claude Mellot sit down beside each other on a log athwart a stream. Before they are fairly met, we hear Lancelot informing his interlocutor that "prudish Manichæism always ends in sheer prudery." Lancelot, on meeting the game-keeper Tregarva, remarks, naturally enough, "Beautiful stream this," and in a moment he is asked, "Are men likely to be healthy when they are worse housed than a pig?" Thus do his characters become preachers before they have developed any clear personality. If the reader can be caught by the briefest concession to art, Kingsley is satisfied. He can then go about his Father's business. For this reason the moral expositors in these books—Tregarva in "Yeast," and Sandy Mackay in "Alton Locke," are the most successful characters. It is of the essence of their natures to show violent anger at the horrible conditions in teeming city alleys and foul country hovels. Their sermons adequately characterize them.

As constructed wholes, the novels lack unity, largely because Kingsley did not know how to change the conditions which he holds up to our loathing. The spirit which was to usher in the new age was as amorphous as Shelley's Demogorgon. Men's hearts were to be changed through the sudden realization of the truth of the Scripture. Kingsley doubtless showed wisdom in realizing that vast social injustices can be cured by new forms of social organization only if they are animated by a fundamentally new social spirit. Yet this indefiniteness in his programme led to a corresponding indefiniteness in the goal of his narratives. They lead to places almost as near the shores of Avalon as the lonely wrecks of Paradise to which Shelley sailed so many times with his heart's sister.

"Hypatia" and "Westward Ho" did not emanate so directly from the spirit of revolutionary excitement. Less hurried and less heated than the novels of storm and stress, they are usually considered much greater works of art. That is an opinion which I can not share. Kingsley's divided allegiance is no less apparent in them. He says, himself, that in them he is fighting new foes with an old face. He might better have said old foes in new masks—masks which obscure the real enemies and make direct portraiture impossible. Only those who hold that a tropical jungle or a street-scene in Alexandria necessarily enlists more artistic skill than a waste of alleys in London will prefer these novels. Readers who are emancipated from these limited ideas of beauty will miss the tang of reality which it is the artist's business to communicate.

To be sure, Kingsley's bravura is in harmony with the dashing spirit of the Elizabethan adventurers and sea-rovers who stride through "Westward Ho." His Richard Grenville doubtless deserves some of the admiration that has been bestowed upon him, and the whole book readily enlists the enthusiasm of boys. To those, however, who have known the Elizabethan age from a nearer view, much of Kingsley's picture seems distorted. Amyas Leigh and his crew are a band of muscular Christians animated by mid-Victorian moral ideas. Witness the hysterical anxiety of everyone to discover whether Rose Salterne has been married to Don Guzman or not. The good ship Rose sets forth on her voyage of incredible hardships largely that this awful question may be answered. Eustace Leigh is "taught the science of villany on the motive of superstition" to aid Kingsley in stemming the neo-Catholic drift to Rome. Often these Elizabethan heroes, enacting the drama of Kingsley's age, as he saw it, seem as unlike themselves as Falstaff in love. Set "Westward Ho" beside "The Cloister and the Hearth," a novel written by a fellow muscular Christian, who for the moment forgot his social duties and wrote pure romance, and it will seem the largely factitious thing that it is.

There remain his poems. Leslie Stephen says that Kingsley "was primarily a poet, or at least, a man swayed by his imagination and emotions." This moderate statement is undoubtedly true, but he wrote comparatively little poetry. The world did not need it so much as sound knowledge and sound morality; so he told his pupil, John Martineau. The preacher within Kingsley could be laid to sleep only on the comparatively rare occasions when he faced nature in holiday mood or recalled vividly youthful encounters with her. For this reason the purest poem that he ever wrote is a part of a lecture delivered on the prosaic subject of the drainage of the fens.

The lyrics are often bursts of intense feeling which just fail to be supreme art. He had a sense of form which came out in his drawing, a talent which he believed to be his strong faculty. "When I get into metre," he writes in 1852, "I feel like an otter in the water, instead of an otter ashore." His short poems all show this sense for form. Unfortunately the bits of magic which they contain are usually strangely involved with commonplace sentiment. "Airly Beacon" ends "With his baby on my knee"; and "The Three Fishers," the most intense poem that he wrote, contains the line

And there's little to earn and many to keep.

It has been said that Kingsley's moments of sincere feeling in these lyrics were ill-sustained because of his unconscious desire to make them effective in a mid-nineteenth century drawing-room. Perhaps the most illuminating comment that can be made on these poems is that they are often perfectly wedded to the music of Ethelbert Nevin.

The truth is that only in "Yeast" and "Alton Locke" does the whole nature of Kingsley find expression. There his strong power of artistic realization and his reforming zeal have been successfully fused. Elsewhere his pure feeling is diluted to suit conventional poetical gestures or perverted to fit characters in Alexandria of the fifth century or in Elizabethan Bideford. He was at his best when he followed most faithfully the advice which Sandy Mackaye gave to Alton Locke:

Which is maist to your business? thae bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' the other side o' the world, or these—these thousands o' bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' your ain side—made out o' your ain flesh and blude? You a poet? True poetry, like true charity, my laddie, begins at home. If ye'll be a poet at a' ye maun be a cockney poet; and while the cockneys be what they be, ye maun write, like Jeremiah of old, o' lamentation and mourning and woe, for the sins o' your people.

In a recent number of the Review, Mr. Stuart P. Sherman has suggested that we are on the threshold of a new period of artistic endeavor. This he decides to call The Proletarian Millennium. He opines that the literature of such a time, preoccupied as it will be with economic interests, may be more humanistic than that of the Age of Biological Considerations from which we are just emerging. I venture to suggest that the character of such literature need not remain wholly problematic. Charles Kingsley wrote from the midst of an age that thought for a moment that it was on the way to a proletarian millennium. Labor then, as now, was afoot and Kingsley essayed to direct its march and to clear the path towards its goal. His work displays certain qualities that will probably inhere in all literature with the same preoccupations. Its limitations are the results of its exclusive interest, not in what man is, but in what he wants. Such a point of view is not conducive to veracity or fullness of artistic representations. The authors who regarded man as a specimen, at least kept him quiet enough to have a good look at him through the lenses of their microscopes, distorting though they may have been. If, like Kingsley, our socially and economically-minded artists of the future see man, not as he is, or even as he is in process of becoming, but behold him always on a forced march towards the satisfaction of his most elementary physical and economic needs, their art must have the essential characteristics of Kingsley's work.

Such a prospect is not a pleasant one for the humanist to contemplate. For he must become reconciled to the disappearance of well-tempered and well-rounded humanity and accord his welcome to the man whose faculties are all tense for a leap into the dark. He must learn to be satisfied with dissatisfaction, to expect from literature, not revelation, but conviction of economic sin. Finally, he must not hope to find in this art the repose which comes from emotional purgation. Instead, he must welcome a restless impulse to rush out to meet the future. Most disappointing of all, he must accept zeal and vaguely benevolent desires for human welfare as sufficient guarantees of the goal of his striving—the "one harmonious and truly human-life."

O. J. CAMPBELL

Dramatic Performances in London

IT is a far cry from the Five Towns to Bethulia, and Mr. Arnold Bennett, despite his prodigious literary agility, has not made the leap without misadventure. It was apparently Miss Lillah McCarthy who induced him to venture so far afield. She played Judith some years ago in a one-act handling of the theme by Mr. Sturge Moore, whereof I have vague but highly unpleasing recollections. It certainly was not adapted for presentation to the long-run public; but the actress seems to have taken a fancy to the heroine, and thought Mr. Bennett the man to popularize her. He may have succeeded in doing so; but he has certainly degraded her in the process.

I do not know whether the learned allow any historic authenticity to the Book of Judith; but whether it be historic or merely legendary, there is an unquestionable nobleness about it. Assassination, indeed, is scarcely approved by modern sentiment; but we must leave modern sentiment behind when we go back to the days of Nebuchadnezzar. No one pretended, in those days—at all events “east of Suez”—to observe any laws of war; and it would be affectation to profess ourselves shocked at the cutting off, in his drunken sleep, of a ruthless and reckless oriental conqueror. This granted, we can only admire the courage, the resourcefulness, and, above all, the dignity of the Hebrew heroine. It is her beauty, no doubt, that renders Holofernes so credulous of her not very plausible tale; but she uses no arts of seduction. She inspires the rude satrap with respect, and it is by that means that she obtains the freedom of movement which enables her to escape after the assassination. The Apocrypha, indeed, exempts her from the final sacrifice which she must have been prepared to face, by the rather naïve expedient of making Holofernes drink “much more wine than he had drunk at any time in one day since he was born”; but we feel this to be an artificial “happy ending.” The German poet, Friedrich Hebbel, is truer to the logic of the situation. His Judith, on her return to Bethulia, makes the Priests and Elders swear to grant her one wish—namely, that they will kill her should she demand it. Then she says to her handmaid—and these are the last words of the play—“Pray to God that my womb may be unfruitful. Perhaps He will be gracious to me.”

What Mr. Bennett does is to deprive the theme of all religious or moral elevation, the character of all dignity. His Judith greatly enjoys her adventure. She ogles, she wheedles, she “coos.” She plays the courtesan with evident relish, and with a thoroughness which would repel Holofernes were he fastidious and arouse his suspicions were he astute. How far the author is responsible for the actress's costumes it would be hard to say; but there is certainly nothing in his text to discourage the “daring” approach to nudity achieved in what the stage-direction describes as Judith's “indoor attire.” Except for the infusion of triviality and sensuality, Mr. Bennett follows the text of the Apocrypha pretty closely; but he scorns the subterfuge of making Holofernes helplessly drunk. On the contrary, he carries the seduction scene up to, if not beyond, the utmost permissible limit, and then makes Judith produce a knife which she has secreted about her person, and as the stage-direction puts it, “kill him while she is still caressing.” The episode seemed to me quite revolting. For one thing, if the satrap's guards were so imbecile as not to search this Hebrew woman for concealed weapons, there is no reason why she should have carried the study in concupiscence so far as she did. She might have stabbed her victim at least five minutes earlier, with great advantage to public decency, if not to popular appeal. Both in the Apocrypha and in Hebbel's play, the point of the scene is that Judith has to possess herself of Holofernes's “fauchion” before she can behead him.

As if to degrade the theme as much as possible, Mr. Bennett makes Judith's maid Haggith parody her mistress's action, by ensnaring a thick-headed and loutish Assyrian soldier: not in order to kill him, however—only to henpeck him. A happy ending, too, is secured by letting Judith marry the Ammonite Achior; while a ballet appropriately welcomes her return to starving Bethulia. Finally, after the manner of Mr. Shaw in “Cæsar and Cleopatra,” Mr. Bennett enlivens ancient history with numerous topical allusions. An old man, for instance, on hearing that Holofernes has come up against Bethulia with 120,000 foot and 12,000 horse, remarks: “At any rate this will be the last war. Plainly war can not continue on such a scale. Or if it does mankind is destroyed. Nebuchadnezzar has made war ridiculous.” Without any superstitious respect for Hebrew Literature, one may fairly deprecate this “guying” of fine things.

The most remarkable success of recent years has been that of Mr. John Drinkwater's “Abraham Lincoln.” The play was produced at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre, of which Mr. Drinkwater is manager. Then it was brought to the Lyric Opera House, Hammersmith, a tawdry little suburban theatre, in which, by the way, Mr. Arnold Bennett is interested. It was intended to run for a fortnight, or perhaps three weeks; and behold, it took the town by storm. At clubs, at dinner-parties, in the Underground—wherever two or three are gathered together—the air buzzed with the question, “Have you seen ‘Abraham Lincoln’?” It has now run for well over 100 nights, and shows no signs of flagging. I saw it for the second time a week ago, and found the house crowded.

What is the secret of the attraction of this intensely serious, poorly acted, shabbily mounted play, at an outside theatre of which, until three months ago, no one had ever heard? It may be very shortly stated: the success is a personal success for—Abraham Lincoln. It is the strength and beauty of his character, together with the historic magnitude of the action he dominates, which so entralls people that they go again and yet again into the wilds of Hammersmith—as who should say to Harlem or the Bronx. Mr. Drinkwater's merit lies in the sympathy with which he has studied the character and the adroitness with which he has seized upon typical episodes—his choice being obviously guided, in some instances, by the desire to point a moral in respect to events nearer home. One wishes that the whole Peace Conference—Big Four and Little Fifty—could be transported for a single evening to Hammersmith. They would learn a lesson in magnanimity that would be of incalculable advantage to the world. And by drawing upon common historic knowledge, and calling to mind the evils which flowed from Booth's “tyrannicide,” they might take warning against committing in Paris the crime of slaying anew the spirit of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Drinkwater, in a prefatory note to the printed play, disclaims all attempt “to achieve a local color of which he has no experience, or to speak an idiom to which he has not been bred.” In this, of course, he is wise; yet it is a pity he has not avoided one or two rather glaring anachronisms and blunders. In the very first scene, on the day in 1860 when Lincoln accepted the nomination for the Presidency, two of his neighbors are discussing the hanging of John Brown, and one of them says, “Stonewall Jackson was there”—thus showing a very remarkable prevision of the event of some eighteen months later, which earned for Jackson his famous sobriquet. Mrs. Lincoln dispensing afternoon tea at the White House is about as probable as Queen Victoria smoking a cigarette after a State Banquet; but this one readily forgives for the sake of the admirable scene in which Lincoln crushes the babbling wife of an embusqué profiteer, and shows his sympathy with a pacifist mother who has lost her son. Quite another matter is the dreadful transmogrification of Frederick Douglass in the second half of the same scene. He is made up like a comic darkey from Margate sands, and expresses himself in a sort of pidgin English after this fashion: "Mista Lincoln live here. You his servant? . . . You not slave. You servant, but you free body. That very mighty thing." Mr. Drinkwater might really have informed himself a little more about so well-known a personality as Frederick Douglass, and not mixed him up with Robinson Crusoe's Man Friday.

I do not know whether any arrangements have been made for the presentation of "Abraham Lincoln" in America, but I hope a few suggestions on the subject may not be thought impertinent. The piece might, I think, be a great success if some of the more glaring defects of local color were remedied; if it were carefully and completely mounted; if the last scene, that of the assassination, were wholly remodelled; if the two "Chroniclers" who speak a number of lyrical intermezzos, mainly incomprehensible on first hearing, were ruthlessly suppressed; and if an actor of some real physical and mental fitness could be found for the protagonist.

The mounting at Hammersmith is ingeniously economical. Almost the whole action passes in one square room with brown-paper walls, which is made to do duty for Lincoln's home in Springfield, for the White House, and for Grant's headquarters at Appomattox, by simply changing the furniture and shifting the position of a window and a fireplace. All this is very meritorious in a repertory production, but it would be affectation to pretend that the piece would not gain by some approach to pictorial verisimilitude. As for the actor who plays Lincoln, Mr. William J. Rea, his performance is the theme of fierce controversy. Many people admire him enthusiastically, most people think him quite good, a small minority (to which I confess that I belong) hold him to be almost intolerably grotesque. The truth probably is that he acts with considerable skill, and that people who have no clear vision of Lincoln's personality are not disturbed by his insignificant figure, his skating strut, his chronic stiff neck, and his habitual expression of abject misery. Lincoln, no doubt, was melancholy; but had he commonly looked so suicidal as his impersonator, the North would infallibly have lost the war, by reason of the miasma of pessimism emanating from the White House.

If I were Mr. Drinkwater, I would place my penultimate scene on the field of Gettysburg, and let Lincoln speak his whole oration, instead of making him deliver fragments of it from his box in Ford's Theatre. On a more roomy stage, there is not the least reason why the last scene of all should be so unhistoric and ineffective as it is at Hammersmith.

"Cæsar's Wife," a play by Mr. Somerset Maugham, has made a great success at the Royalty Theatre. An elderly proconsul—British not Roman—has married a girl-wife, who falls deeply in love with his private secretary. But they are extremely well-brought-up young people, who would not dream of anything wrong; and the husband, who sees all that is going on, wins the day in the end by dint of sheer magnanimity. Mr. Maugham's psychology is rather superficial, and the proconsul's ineffable superiority to all human weakness becomes at times just a little exasperating. But there are some very well-written scenes in the piece, and the heroine is played to perfection by Miss Fay Compton, an actress who has come much to the front of late. Miss Compton belongs to one of those old theatrical stocks in which talent is handed on from generation to generation. Her grandfather, Henry Compton, was one of the group of fine comedians of the old Haymarket Company, and played the Gravedigger to Irving's Hamlet at the Lyceum. Her father, Edward Compton, was the manager and leading actor of a famous Old Comedy company. Her mother, Virginia Bateman, was a sister of Miss "Leah" Bateman, and acted with Irving at the Lyceum. Miss Fay Compton herself is the widow of Henry Pelissier, a much-lamented comedian, and is, if I mistake not, a sister of Mr. Compton Mackenzie the novelist.

WILLIAM ARCHER

London, May 9

Mr. Dryden Meets Mr. Milton

THE meeting of Milton and Dryden makes an unusual appeal to the imagination because of the great and contrasting personalities of the two men, and because it is the one striking occasion on which the Elizabethan and the neo-classic periods of English literature came face to face and shook hands. Our sole record of this meeting has hitherto been these two sentences from Aubrey's Lives (first published in 1813; re-edited by Andrew Clark, Oxford, 1898, II, 72): "John Dreyden, esq., Poet Laureate, who very much admires him [Milton], and went to him to have leave to putt his Paradise Lost into a drama in rhyme. Mr. Milton recieved him civilly, and told him he would give him leave to tagge his verses."

I have just come upon another account with some additional details, in one of the numerous eighteenth-century ephemeral periodicals,—The Monitor, intended for the Promoting of Religion and Virtue, and Suppressing of Vice and Immortality perform'd by Mr. Tate, Poet Laureat to Her Majesty, Mr. Smith, and Others, which appeared in a single folio sheet three times (later twice) a week from March 2 to April 24, 1713. The seventeenth issue (April 6-10) contained an unrhymed poem to which was prefixed a defense of blank verse, with the following anecdote:

We shall here beg the Reader's Pardon for mentioning a Passage told a Gentleman of our Society almost Forty Years since by Mr. Dryden, who went with Mr. Waller in Company, to make a Visit to Mr. Milton, and desire his Leave for putting his Paradise lost into Rhime for the stage. Well, Mr. Dryden, says Milton, it seems you have a mind to Tagg my Points, and you have my Leave to Tagg 'em, but some of 'em are so Awkward and Old Fashion'd, that I think you had as good leave 'em as you found 'em.

This interview must have taken place about 1673, and, according to the account given above, must have been told by Dryden to the "Gentleman of our Society" shortly afterwards. The accuracy of any story which is repeated after forty years is open to serious question; but, if Milton really spoke of his lines as "Awkward and Old fashion'd," he must have done so with ironical reference to Dryden's own writings and the immorality, the smartness, and the monotonous mechanical finish of the new-fashioned poetry. If he had not been pleased by Dryden's visit and had not appreciated the compliment that the laureate intended to pay his epic, he would hardly have allowed the adaptation to be made, for what must the blind old Puritan have thought of the Restoration stage?

The most interesting new fact—if it be a fact—to be gleaned from this episode is that Waller accompanied Dryden on his visit; for there is no other evidence that the founder of non-dramatic blank verse and the supposed refiner of English numbers and the originator of the neo-classic couplet ever met. And what a meeting! There are few occasions in English literary history at which I should rather have been present.

RAYMOND D. HAVENS

Books Received

ART

Pictures of London. Pictures of Paris. By Celebrated Artists. Lane.

FICTION

Begbie, Harold. The Convictions of Christopher Sterling. McBride. $1.50 net.
Canby, H. S. Our House. Macmillan. $1.60.

Chipperfield, R. O. The Second Bullet. McBride. $1.50 net.

Dreiser, Theodore. Twelve Men. Boni & Liveright. $1.75 net.

Dunbar, Ruth. The Swallow. Boni & Liveright. $1.50 net.

James, Henry. Travelling Companions. Boni & Liveright. $1.75 net.

Means, E. K. More. Putnam.

Röhmer, Sax. Tales of Secret Egypt. McBride. $1.50 net.

Williams, Valentine. Okewood of the Secret Service. McBride. $1.50 net.

The Birth of the C-W Industry

"Way back in 1888, in a small loft in New York City, Francis B. Crocker and Schuyler S. Wheeler laid the foundation of the Crocker-Wheeler Company.

"The initial product was the 'Perfected Motor' acknowledged by leading manufacturers of that period to be the most perfect motor made.

"Crocker-Wheeler motors of 1919 carry a similar endorsement from America's most discriminating manufacturers."

Abbott Wheeler

President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.

Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

SILVER AND GOLD TABLEWARE

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Abbott, Samuel. The Dramatic Story of Old Glory. Boni & Liveright. $1.60 net.
Adams, G. B. The British Empire and a League of Peace. Putnam. $1.00 net.
Kellogg, P. U., and Gleason, Arthur. British Labor and the War. Boni & Liveright. $2.00 net.
Levine, Louis. The Taxation of Mines in Montana. Huebsch.
Mercier, Charles. Crime and Criminals. Holt. $2.50 net.
Merrill, W. P. Christian Internationalism. Macmillan. $1.50.
Moore, Frederick. The Chaos in Europe. Putnam. $1.50 net.
Myers, W. S. Socialism and American Ideals. Princeton University Press. $1.00 net.
Oppenheim, L. The League of Nations. Longmans, Green. $2.00 net.
Pack, C. L. The War Garden Victorious. Lippincott.
Phelps, E. M. A League of Nations. Handbook Series. H. W. Wilson Co. $1.50 net.

Poincaré, Raymond. How France is Governed. McBride. $2.00 net.
Powers, H. H. The Great Peace. Macmillan. $2.25.
Simons, A. M. The Vision for Which We Fought. Macmillan. $1.50.
Spargo, John. Bolshevism. Harper. $1.50 net.
Sutherland, George. Constitutional Power and World Affairs. Columbia University Press.
Trowbridge, E. D. Mexico: Today and Tomorrow. Macmillan. $2.00.
West, W. M. The War for Democracy. Allyn & Bacon.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Ameen, Rihani. The Luzumiyat of Abu'l-Ala. New York: Jas. T. White.
Cannan, Gilbert. Everybody's Husband. Huebsch. 75 cents.
Chapman, J. J. Songs and Poems. Scribner. $1.00 net.
Cheney, Sheldon. The Open-Air Theatre. Mitchell Kennerley. $3.00.
Foxcroft, Frank. War Verse. Crowell. $1.25.

O'Neill, Eugene. The Moon of the Caribbees and Six Other Plays of the Sea. Boni & Liveright. $1.35 net.
Robinson, C. R. Service and Sacrifice. Scribner. $1.25 net.
Wilson, E. E. Comrades of the Mist and Other Rhymes of the Grand Fleet. Sully & Kleinteich. $1.00 net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Report of American Bar Association. Forty-first Annual Meeting. Baltimore: Lord Baltimore Press.
Allen, L. The Emblems of Fidelity: A Comedy in Letters. Doubleday, Page. $1.25 net.
Kipling, Rudyard. The Eyes of Asia. Doubleday, Page. $1.00 net.
Marcosson, I. F. S. O. S.: America's Miracle in France. Lane. $1.50 net.
Lewys, Georges. The "Charmed American": A Story of the Iron Division of France. Lane. $1.50 net.
Dawson, Coningsby. Living Bayonets: A Record of the Last Push. Lane. $1.25 net.

The Addressing Problems of Industry

The addressing problems of industry are solved by the Belknap Addressing Machine.

Typewritten Addresses for All Your Lists

That is the modern way—the way of sure, prompt, 100 per cent. mail deliveries. In every office where a typewriter is used the Belknap Addressing Machine can be made to increase sales, double the day's work and save money.

If you value economy, accuracy and speed you will not hesitate to secure a Belknap Addressing Machine. It gives your literature that personal appeal which a typewritten address possesses. You wouldn't write your business correspondence in long hand—why write addresses that way? Banish the wasteful method.

Treat It As You Do Your Figures

Place this important work upon a basis of minimum expense—elevate it to its logical importance.

Systematize it with an error-proof machine that will save you the cost of twenty helpers, do neater work, assure prompter deliveries and obtain a more favorable audience.

No. 4 Rotary, on special stand. Speed increased to 1800 to 2000 per hour.

When you install a Belknap Addressing Machine, you get a service that means efficiency in every detail.

First, we study your requirements. Then we adapt the Belknap to fit those needs. We plan the handling and operating. We stay with you until the Belknap is actually saving you money by doing this mechanical work better and quicker than it can be done in any other way.

Your Typewriter is Your Stencil Cutter

The Belknap Fibrotype Stencil is the only one your stenographer can slip into her regular typewriter and cut without expensive equipment.

Our Reputation is Your Assurance of Satisfaction

For 35 years the Belknap Addressing mechanism has borne a large and responsible part of the commercial world's burden. It has in that time so capably conducted itself that—with all its numerous improvements—it stands today pre-eminently the most popular and widely used of all addressing machines.

Offices and Agencies in all Principal Cities

Rapid Addressing Machine Company "The Belknap System"

32-46 West Twenty-Third Street : : : : : : : : : : New York

BOOKS FOR THE TIMES

SLAVIC EUROPE. By ROBERT J. KERNER, Associate Professor of History in the University of Missouri. $3.50

A selected, critical bibliography of works in the western European languages pertaining to the Great Russians, the Ukrainians, the Poles, the Czechs, and other Slavic peoples.

THE LAW AS A VOCATION. By FREDERICK J. ALLEN, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Vocational Guidance, Harvard University. $1.00.

Young men about to decide on their life-work will find this an unusually clear and stimulating discussion of a most important profession.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE TARIFF QUESTION. By FRANK W. TAUSSIG, Professor of Economics, Harvard University. $2.00.

A complete text, including both general principles and specific applications, for all students of this important public question.

ESSAYS IN THE EARLIER HISTORY OF AMERICAN CORPORATIONS. By JOSEPH S. DAVIS, of Harvard University. 2 vols. $2.50 each.

A book that has had a wide appeal to all sorts of business men because it gives them the background for understanding modern developments in commerce and manufacture.

CORPORATE PROMOTIONS AND REORGANIZATIONS. By ARTHUR S. DEWING. $2.50.

A critical narrative of the promotion, financial history, and reorganization of fourteen large industrial consolidations, with some discussion of the effects of government regulation.

INQUIRE AT YOUR DEALER'S.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

7 RANDALL HALL, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
280 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK CITY.

FOR THE BOOK LOVER

C. GERHARDT, 25 W. 42d St., New York.

Rare books—First editions. Books now out of print. Latest Catalogue sent on request.

FOR SALE

UNPOPULAR REVIEW (Holt, N. Y.), complete, with indices, 22 numbers. $10 and postage. Address "D," The Review.

Memorandum for THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau St., New York:

I approve the purpose of

The Review

To "resist the unthinking drift towards radical innovation."

Send THE REVIEW for one year to me (or to the name below). Enclosed is my check for $5.00 (or bill me in due course).

Name.....

Address.....

R.6.14.9.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 6

New York, Saturday, June 21, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
1919

Brief Comment	113
Editorial Articles:
The Knox Resolution	115
Prophet or President?	116
Kolchak and the Peace Conference	117
Progress in Industrial Organization	118
Parting the College in the Middle	119
The Italo-Jugoslav Controversy. By Leo Pasvolsky	120
Conditions in Canada. By J. K. F.	121
Mobilized Philology. By Frederick Tupper	122
Correspondence	124
Book Reviews:
National Views of Industrial Recon- struction	126
The Sinclairs and Jimmie. By H. W. Boynton	126
An Autonomous Albania	127
Dante and Moslem Mystics. By D. B. Macdonald	128
The Run of the Shelves	129
Ignoring Modern Music. By Charles L. Buchanan	130
Drama:
"The Jest," "39 East," and "A Little Journey." By O. W. Firkins	131
Artists and the War. By James N. Rosenberg	132

Copyright, 1919, by The National Weekly Corporation.

represent something like the Lloyd George threats. Nothing is more important than to have them placed unmistakably on the basis of the armistice agreement. The present statement not only does this, but gives assurance that the actual determination of the reparation due will be arrived at by fair, humane, and honorable methods.

VISCOUNT ISHII, Japanese Ambassador at Washington, leaves regrets behind him as he relinquishes his charge. He is said to have misrepresented the policy of our administration as regards the pretensions of Japan in China. He may be more truly regarded as a victim of the ambiguity of our Far Eastern policy. An Ambassador has to make reports, quite as a journalist may have to write even in the absence of anything worth writing about. That Viscount Ishii should have found our intermittent and vacillating attitude towards China confusing and should have been led into misinterpreting some particular phase of it, will surprise no American who has ever tried to fathom what Washington means towards the Far East. Whatever technical infelicity he may have fallen into, the Japanese Ambassador has faithfully performed his main duty of fostering friendly relations between Japan and the United States. He carries home with him plenty of American good will.

THE labor demonstration at Washington against strict enforcement of the prohibition amendment portends a storm. Mr. Gompers, speaking before the Senate Judiciary committee, pointed out the serious discontent that would follow the proscription of light wines and beer. Workingmen do not understand such meddling with their personal habits, and bitterly resent it. Mr. Gompers' remedy was for Congress to write into the enabling act that light wines and beers are not intoxicants. To teach a needed lesson to the fanatics who imposed the Eighteenth Amendment on a careless nation, one could wish for the strictest enforcement. Let the slightest stimulation be regarded as intoxication, let innocent conviviality be interpreted as drunkenness. Legislation of this tenor would teach a proper lesson to the Anti-Saloon League, but it would also work widespread harm and irritation. If Congress and the courts can see their way to such an interpretation of the word "intoxicating" as Mr. Gompers urges, it will help the country round a pretty ugly corner. The alternative is bitterness, possibly violence, and the certain scandal of widespread disregard of law.

IT may turn out to the advantage of Alcock and Brown, who launched themselves into Atlantic fog and drizzle and, literally between morn and eve, pierced their way to the Irish bogs, that they concluded their magnificent venture at a time when the world was emotionally a little jaded to make full response. It may save them from the danger of tarnishing the splendor of their achievement by unconsidered oratory. "We had a terrible journey." Let it stand at that.

EVERYBODY is agreed that the removal of real grievances is one of the things that must be counted on for the lessening of industrial unrest. But very little attention is being paid to the question of the part that imaginary grievances have been playing in producing the general ferment. A startling instance of this is furnished in the closing article of a series by Sherman Rogers in the New York World. The writer was foreman in a logging camp near Seattle in 1917, and gives a detailed account of the way in which the lumbermen in the State of Washington were swept into the I. W. W. movement. They were getting, he says, an average of five dollars a day and were thoroughly satisfied not only with their wages but with conditions generally. Suddenly there was a change, the explanation of which seemed utterly mysterious until it was discovered that it had been brought about by I. W. W. emissaries who had filled the minds of the lumbermen with amazing fairy tales about the relation of their wages to the profits of their employers.

Both by word of mouth and by means of propaganda "literature," the men were made to believe that while they were getting five dollars a day their labor was worth sixty dollars a day to their employers; and nothing that Mr. Rogers or anybody could say to them was capable of removing the impression. Examination of the company's books or of anything else was of no avail, because the men had got it firmly fixed in their minds that everything that came from a capitalist source was deliberate lying, to protect those who were robbing the workingmen of their just dués. The story may be an exaggeration, and in any case it is, of course, highly exceptional in the degree of folly represented by the credulity of the laborers. But the same sort of misrepresentation in a degree sufficient to do a great deal of mischief is going on all round us in a thousand forms.

THE profiteers may well tremble," says Mr. Basil Manly, joint chairman of the War Labor Board, "lest the people avenge themselves for this shameless exploitation during a period of the nation's greatest necessity." The shameless exploitation in question is that which Mr. Manly finds to be shown by the figures of net profits for eighty-two corporations which "in the pre-war years had an average net income of $325,000,000, had net incomes in 1916 amounting to more than $1,000,000,000, in 1917 of $975,000,000, and in 1918 of $736,000,000," after the deduction of all taxes. These were large and extraordinary profits, but whether they were "profit-eering" or not, and whether they were "shameless exploitation" or not, depends upon an examination of facts which are apparently beneath the notice of the joint chairman of the War Labor Board.

The war necessitated a prodigious increase of industrial production. The only way to provide the stimulus for such an increase—involving as it did the creation of vast new plants and the utmost utilization of all existing plants, whether profitable or unprofitable in the past—was by means of a big rise of prices. Unless there were to be different prices for the same products at the same time, the concerns that were best equipped for economic production on a great scale were bound to make profits far greater than such of their competitors as were not so equipped. They might give away their profits, or their profits might be taxed away, but in the first instance the profits were necessarily there. The taxation was made as heavy as Congress thought best, with little or no protest from business interests.

To talk in this indiscriminating fashion about "shamelessness" and "vengeance" is to play the part of a reckless demagogue. Whatever profits may actually have been made by shameless methods should be exposed, but that is quite a different matter. By the way, does it happen to occur to Mr. Manly that the farmers of the country have been getting for the foremost of food staples about five times the price that they got in 1896? Can he point to any parallel to this among the great industrial staples? Does he think that the farmers also "may well tremble lest the people avenge themselves for this shameless exploitation during a period of the nation's greatest necessity"?

RENEWED evidence that our leading financiers are alive to the essential part which America must play in the restoration of prosperity in Europe is furnished by Mr. H. P. Davison's speech at a dinner of prominent financial and business men in Chicago. Mr. Vanderlip's recent address laid stress on the seriousness of the need and the urgency of the duty; Mr. Davison deals rather with the question of actual method, and bases his programme not on duty but on self-interest. It is because in this matter the dictates of duty and those of self-interest coincide that we can look forward to such enormous achievement as the case demands. Extension of American trade, security for Europe's obligations to America, and the rebuilding of European prosperity, all go together; and when the big business men of our country grapple in earnest with the problem of achieving these ends we may be sure that the results will be on a colossal scale. The central point made by Mr. Davison is that to meet the utterly abnormal conditions of the time, it is essential that both in Europe and America committees organized for the purpose shall systematically determine the legitimate needs of the various countries for our goods, and the amount of credit which can safely be extended to them; and that these credits should in a sense be pooled in each country by means of debentures guaranteed by that country. Upon the merits of this particular plan only an expert can pass any judgment, but it is safe to say that when the best thought of the American business world has been centered upon the problem a way will be found to make our vast resources and potentialities serve both the world's need and our own welfare.

CHAIRMAN HURLEY of the Shipping Board recommends the selling of the Government-built ships as fast as trade conditions shall permit. It is a counsel of economy and good sense. For the Government to continue indefinitely in the shipping business would be to stretch out unduly our special war expenditure. We need to cast up accounts with the war as soon as possible, and to begin the process of paying up with knowledge of what we are about. Every prolongation of war emergency activities obscures the necessary accounting. Nobody proposes that the Government ships should be dumped on the market, to the demoralization of the shipping trade. They should, however, be passed over to private owners as fast as American shippers can handle them. No sentimental consideration should delay or confuse the liquidation of our war bills. Mr. Hurley deserves thanks for a statement which required not merely clearheadedness but also courage.

LET there be no mistake—the Winnipeg business was an elaborately organized effort to "put over" a Soviet Government. The men locally in charge of the abortive revolution were of British antecedents—Ivens, Armstrong, Russell, R. J. Johns, even Robinson (Rubenstein), and for a few days they made a thorough job of it. Under the cloak of a general strike in sympathy with the Metals Trade Union which put forward as its aims the right to collective bargaining and a living wage, slogans by which some workers were doubtless really duped, the professional agitators set up an effectively unbearable dictatorship. William Ivens, pacifist, preacher, Socialist editor, and self-styled dictator, proclaimed to a mass-meeting in Victoria Park that Winnipeg was then under soviet rule. "The storm is about to break, and this time the lightning is going to strike upward and not down." That Winnipeg could abide the stroke, thanks to the finally excellent behavior of the soldiers and to the prompt formation of a Citizens' Committee of One Thousand, which drew its strength from all walks of life, must stand signally to the credit of the city. Our special correspondence makes it plain that the Federal Government is taking measures to insure that the storm now weathered shall not gather again.

A STREET car strike recently tied up business in the city of Pittsburgh completely for several days. The Public Defense Association of the city has brought suit for $2,000,000 damages against the officials of the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees and the receivers of the Pittsburgh Railways Company. This encouraging first manifestation of the public spinal column in the matter of the public's relation to strikes, whatever its outcome, deserves some quiet notice on the part of other American communities.

THOSE of us who have fancied that our "jazz" originated in Uganda or among the Igorotes are, according to the latest news, quite wrong. Le Matin of Paris maintains that the jazz band idea originated in Paris 120 years ago. "In those days as well as now," it says, "people did not know what to do to amuse themselves; so they made a noise. Those who had a great taste for noise went to the concerts of the Cat Orchestra. There were twenty cats with their heads in a row on the keyboard of a harpsichord. The performers by striking the keys worked a device which pulled the cats' tails, causing a caterwauling which—" Le Matin feels would leave us Americans little musically to desire. Is this an attempt to discredit us at the Peace Conference?

SECRETARY DANIELS has decreed in perpetuity for the navy the sartorial simple life which prevailed during the world war. Cocked hats and gold epaulets disappear from the quarter-deck and the ward room. If these departing glories are kept alive, thanks will be to comic opera. We can not contemplate without regret the eclipse of splendors that are as old as fleets. The various dress uniforms were good to look at, and did harm to nothing except the officer's pocketbook. Doubtless navy officers will regard the regulations with more friendliness than the sentimental layman. When wine was banished from the ward room, and regulations forbade to our navy the hospitalities customary among gentlemen, the old ceremonial uniforms became an anachronism. Service blues are good enough to drink water in or else sarsaparilla. Doubtless these changes make for efficiency. An admiral now travels with no more baggage than a broker, while his full-dress uniform, under the new orders, will remain slightly more impressive than that of the skipper of a Sound steamer. All's for the best in the best of navies, yet we are glad to have seen an admiral in special full dress—and not in the movies.

THE American Federation of Fathers and Mothers has petitioned Congress to drop all other business and repeal the daylight-saving law. The mothers contended that it was next to impossible to get the older children to sleep before dark. In compensation the fathers pointed out that the baby slept an hour longer in the morning. The mothers scored by demonstrating that under the present arrangement the fathers were always in the garden or on the golf field when they should be getting ready for dinner. A compromise was effected by unanimously adopting the mothers' motion for immediate repeal.

IN connection with the big figures of return-emigration which are appearing in the newspapers from time to time, there is one consideration that should not be overlooked. There is always a considerable percentage of our immigrants, especially from Southern Europe, who go back to their native land after having accumulated, out of their earnings as workers on the American scale of wages, enough money to put them on a very comfortable footing in the old country. The present outflow comprises not only the accumulation of such cases due to the stoppage of travel by the war, which of itself would account for an abnormally large showing this year, but represents also, no doubt, a great acceleration of the process of saving itself. The thrifty immigrant who designed to return as soon as he had enough money to settle on the land at home was able, in the past three or four years with their phenomenal wages for unskilled labor, to save as much as it might have taken him eight or ten years to save in ordinary times. This is not to say that other causes—possibly more important—have not been at work. In particular, as has been pointed out, the new status of the Slavic and Rumanian populations of what was the Austro-Hungarian Empire has been a potent influence; and doubtless the impending régime of prohibition has been a factor.

SOME fifty Minneapolis business men have organized an association to undo the work of Ptolemy, Julian and Pope Gregory, all of which have had a finger in the pie of our never monotonous calendar. The American Equal Month

Calendar Association desires to do away with all such fascinations as February 29th birthdays and Sunday Fourth of Julys, and substitute for our fickle calendar a beautifully regular one of thirteen months of exactly four weeks each. The perfect symmetry of such a year seems attractive, and the simple thought that under its rule it will be unnecessary to have a lithographed calendar on any wall makes one fairly enthusiastic. Under this system it is necessary to even up the year by creating two extra "floating" days—one a New Year day placed between the last day of December and the first day of January and the other, called "Correction Day," inserted in leap years after the New Year day. But what, we ask, will be the use, after July 1st, of a New Year day even though followed by a "Correction Day"?

The Knox Resolution

At the opening of the present session of Congress the leader of the Republican party in the Senate, in a formal statement, declared that he was "satisfied that a majority of the Senate feel very strongly that the League, as now presented, must receive amendment, that in its present form, without any change, it is unacceptable and would not be accepted." The first and most essential thing to be noted about the Knox resolution is that it represents an attitude going far beyond the position thus indicated by Senator Lodge. The Knox resolution pronounces not merely against the acceptance of "the League as now presented," the League "in its present form, without any change," but against the acceptance of any League at all. To vote for the Knox resolution is to declare an intention to vote for the rejection of the treaty unless the League Covenant is cut out of it altogether so far as the United States is concerned. Clause 1 of the resolution declares that the Senate "will look with disfavor upon all treaty provisions going beyond" the ends for the attainment of which war was expressly declared, the formation of any League of Nations being evidently excluded from these ends.

Nor does the resolution anywhere hold out the possibility of its object being attained by a mere qualifying reservation appended to the treaty. A redrawing of the treaty is throughout implied, and in clause 3 is expressly called for. That clause recommends that "the treaty shall be so drawn as to permit any nation to reserve without prejudice to itself for future, separate, and full consideration by its people the question of any League of Nations"; an end which, of course, could not be accomplished without a reconsideration of the treaty by its European signatories as well as by ourselves. Whatever, therefore, the merits of the Knox resolution considered in the abstract, and whatever the demerits of the League Covenant, there is no escape from the fact that to adopt the resolution, and to adhere to the position it declares, means to throw the whole result of the negotiations and deliberations at Versailles into doubt and to open up indefinite possibilities of renewed controversy and renewed delay.

These possibilities would have been sufficiently grave if the Knox resolution had remained as first presented. It was no doubt with a view to reducing the danger attending upon an upset of the existing understanding that the last clause, number 5, was put into the resolution. That clause was merely a declaration of national policy, but it was evidently designed to diminish, so far as possible, the impression that the intent of the resolution is to withdraw our country altogether from the responsibility of bearing its part in the future safeguarding of the world's tranquillity. The declaration was that "the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected, with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and coöperation with our chief co-belligerents for the defence of civilization." This clause has now been eliminated; and the moral effect of the elimination will be to heighten that significance of the resolution which it was the intention of the clause to mitigate. As it stands, the Knox resolution will be understood in Europe as pointing to a radical change in the relation of our country to the whole peace settlement.

To introduce into a situation like that of the world to-day a disturbing factor of this magnitude is to assume a responsibility the extent of which no man can estimate. The mere postponement which it involves, serious as that must necessarily be, is the least of its dangerous possibilities. With every country in Europe in a state of unparalleled unrest, with our own country by no means free from the menace of internal trouble, with Central and Eastern Europe full of misery and in a state bordering on chaos, there is no telling what disastrous consequences may follow upon a realization that the understanding which had apparently been reached by the leading nations of the world was to be made void so far as regards that one of them upon which the greatest reliance had been placed for its successful working out. No mere analysis of the precise part that might be played by any country or any combination of countries with the United States left out, no mere proof on paper that England and France can get along without us, will furnish any guarantee of the actual course of events. A treaty might have been made without immediate erection of a permanent League of Nations; in our own judgment it would have been infinitely better if that had been done. But as a matter of fact the League has been part of the negotiations from the beginning; and not only the governments but the peoples of the various nations concerned have taken it into consideration as an intrinsic part of the settlement. To suppose that its rejection by the United States will be viewed with complacency, that it will not open the floodgates to a thousand forms of discontent and revolutionary agitation, is to make a very hazardous assumption.

The only adequate justification for incurring a risk so tremendous would be the existence of some still greater danger which could be avoided in no other way. So far as the degree of the danger is concerned, it might be alleged in support of the Knox position that the perils in the Covenant, while not so immediate, are more far-reaching and more permanent. But it is not necessary to enter into this comparison. To avoid those permanent dangers, even granting that they are as great as the extreme opponents of the Covenant assert, it is not necessary to smash the Covenant or to hold up the treaty. From the beginning it has been thought likely that some form of reservation concerning America's participation in the League would be required in order to effect its prompt acceptance by the Senate; but those who expected the Senate to act with a true sense of its responsibility in this great crisis have looked forward to a sincere endeavor to give to the reservation such a character as would leave the general structure of the League unimpaired, and as could be expected to command the tacit assent of the other nations that are parties to the Covenant. But of this endeavor there is no trace in the Knox resolution, nor in the attitude that seems at present to prevail among the Republican Senators. And if it be thought that such reservations, though covering the points that are most stressed by opponents of the Covenant, would not suffice, there is the further recourse of limiting the period of our obligations to a fixed term of years. Surely no one can pretend that our country or its institutions would still be seriously imperilled if these precautions were adopted. Just what form they should take, or whether they should be adopted at all, could be deliberately determined by the Senate when the treaty was before it. The chief argument for the Knox resolution is that the country has not had time to weigh the merits of the Covenant; but the resolution itself proposes to pass judgment against the Covenant without even the pretense of adequate consideration either of its inherent merits or of the effect which its rejection would have upon the state of the world in the present crisis.

That the situation which has arisen in the Senate has been in large measure caused by the methods that President Wilson has seen fit to pursue can not be denied. He has gone out of his way to provoke antagonism and resentment. Not only has he ostentatiously refused to take counsel with any Republican leader, but he has repeatedly announced his intention to make effective consideration of the League plan by the Senate impossible. He might, without offense, have urged that the interweaving of the Covenant with the peace treaty was an unavoidable necessity, that peace could be made in no other way. But it has evidently been his deliberate purpose to impress upon the nation not so much the idea that it was inherently impossible to get peace in any other way, but that he himself was determined to make it impossible—that he would so arrange matters as to give the Senate no choice but to accept the Covenant or destroy the peace. The Knox resolution may be regarded as the answer to that challenge. It flies squarely in the face of the President's defiance. It attempts to put the President into the dilemma which he had prepared for the Senate.

But while this may be an explanation of the attitude of some Republican Senators, it is not a justification of it. On the contrary, the more it explains the less it justifies. Unquestionably a large part of the opposition to the League is perfectly sincere; but if the Senate should in any degree fail in its duty in a supreme crisis because of resentment, however natural, against Mr. Wilson's methods, it will do much more than merely pay him in his own coin. Mr. Wilson may have arrogantly flouted the Senate, but no one can pretend that his course was dictated by the desire to flout the Senate. He wanted to get the League, he thought that the only way to get the League at all was to put it into the peace treaty, and he thought that the best way to get the Senate to accept the League with the treaty was to defy it to do anything else. This was deplorably bad strategy, deplorably bad statesmanship; but it was a course which was directed, however mistakenly, to the attainment of a great end. Before the Republican party pits itself against him on the issue of the League, let it carefully consider the moral position in which it is likely to be placed. Can it show that it sought to do the best it could for the country and for the world? Can it convince the nation that the position it took was dictated by the vital needs of the case, and not by personal or party feeling? To demand some qualification of the Covenant is one thing; to reject the Covenant in such a way as to show that it would have rejected any form of a League of Nations that had substantial effectiveness is quite another. That is what the Knox resolution does; and upon this issue the President will be able to make an appeal to public sentiment which a more reasonable form of opposition would render impossible.

Prophet or President?

A SUBSCRIBER whose letter appears in another column expresses the hope that "the editorial in the second issue of the Review on 'The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson' does not strike a permanent note for the new journal." What the "note" is which our correspondent hopes will not be permanent is perhaps not entirely clear, but we take it that what he objects to is not any personal bias or unfairness as regards the President. The question is one of principle; and though our correspondent puts the matter somewhat naively there are doubtless many who in a general way feel as he does. In the article objected to we declared that if what Mr. Wilson said in such speeches as that of September 22, 1918, committed him to "an impossible programme, a programme which any clear and responsible thinker must have seen to be impossible, the good intentions by which Mr. Wilson's words were undeniably prompted afford little mitigation for his offense." It is this that excites the indignation of our correspondent. He finds it wholly laudable that the President has been "a prophet rather than a politician," that he "refuses to be responsible to those still bound down by individual and national selfishness and blind to the world that should be," and that like Christ in the Sermon on the Mount he has "called for action too high for selfish humanity." The issue is thus quite clear; and the "note" of the editorial as brought out by contrast with the "note" of the letter we fully expect to be a permanent note in the Review.

Whether it is the business of the President of the United States to be a "politician" or not depends on the meaning that is attached to that much-abused word. But we take it that few will deny that he must be a statesman. It may be possible for the head of a nation to be a statesman and a prophet too; but if he has to choose between being a statesman and being a prophet there is no question as to where his duty lies. In point of fact we have no doubt that within the limits of his ability Mr. Wilson has not hesitated, when clearly confronted with the issue, to make choice of the right alternative. The trouble with him has been that he has not realized the responsibility that he was assuming when, in attempting to combine the two rôles, he filled the minds of multitudes with grandiose expectations which the prophet aroused, but which the statesman never had the faintest chance of bringing to fulfillment.

True idealism is the seeking of an ideal, not the promising of its attainment at a given date. The Sermon on the Mount makes no such promises. It does not even counsel any kind of collective action for the attainment of its ideals. It is an appeal to all that is best in each individual man, that he may strive in his own way to make the world better; it does not undertake to dispose of the fate of empires or to do away with the complexity of human laws and institutions. If the proposal of beautiful impossibilities—not as ideals to be patiently striven for but as programmes to be immediately carried out—were enough to make a statesman, without reference to the political consequences of the counsel, statesmen would be as thick as blackberries. We think we have seen more than one programme laid down by Dr. Frank Crane for the ordering of the world which would remake it "nearer to the heart's desire" than anything that Mr. Wilson has set forth. Yet it will hardly be claimed that Dr. Crane is a great statesman, and it will hardly be denied that Abraham Lincoln was one. But Abraham Lincoln did not "refuse to be responsible to those still bound down by individual and national selfishness." On the contrary, he felt it to be the chief part of his duty to take into account the limitations imposed by the actual state of mind of men as they are. And so does Mr. Wilson when it comes to the scratch.

If the question were one affecting merely the personality of one man, even a man so important as Woodrow Wilson, it might be out of place to dwell upon it. In reality, however, it has at this time a most vital relation to all the issues with which we are confronted. If we are to think rationally about the League of Nations, or about Russia, or about the whole mass of questions which are indicated by the catchword of "social justice," we must firmly distinguish between desires and possibilities, between intentions and actions, between aspirations and achievements. It is right to think of "the world that should be," but it is folly to leave out of account the world that is. Even as to what the world should be, there is ample room for difference of opinion; but whatever our opinion may be, we must begin with the world that is. To refuse to do so may be high-mindedness, but it is high-mindedness of a kind that gratifies itself at other people's expense. The actual betterment of the world is a tough and tedious job; the utterance of fine thoughts about it is comparatively an easy and pleasant task. We would not for a moment belittle those who perform this task in a high and worthy way, but if it is suffered to take the place of responsible thinking about our duties and our difficulties the evil of it is infinitely greater than the good. It is well to have our eyes fixed on the distant goal, but to mistake it for the next object in our path, and consequently fall into the ditch, is a very poor way of advancing towards its attainment.

Kolchak and the Peace Conference

AFTER six months of negotiation and investigation, Admiral Kolchak's military dictatorship has been approved at Versailles as giving "satisfactory assurance for the freedom, self-government and peace of the Russian people and their neighbors." Apparently recognition as a de facto government is not yet accorded, presumably because Admiral Kolchak's effective control has not been fully proved. What the representatives of England, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States promise is a loan of $30,000,000 and needed supplies, especially for the railroads. It may be assumed also that every facility for buying arms and munitions will be given to Admiral Kolchak. The Entente, with America, agrees to finance Russia's own war against Bolshevism.

Admiral Kolchak, on his side, having met the test of scrutiny as to his democratic intentions, agrees promptly to convene a constituent assembly and to proceed with the formation of a representative government. The question of the future status of Finland he refuses to deal with, leaving it to the constituent assembly. It should be recalled that except for Mr. Wilson's fear that Kolchak was a reactionary, he would have been recognized long ago by the Versailles Conference. The Admiral now brings a bill of political health from the most seraphic of doctors. To Americans the anti-Bolshevist dictator remains a man of mystery. He has had the force to spread his dictatorship over three-quarters of the former empire, and adroitness enough to secure the alliance of all the anti-Bolshevist military leaders. He controls not merely the bulk of Russian territory but the part that has suffered the least from revolution. As a future, to employ the stock market phrase, he looks good enough to invest in.

Since his stipulations as regards Finland and the particular form of the constituent assembly are certain to be unfavorably criticized, it is well to examine them. Offhand, his recognition of the principle of independence for Finland would have been welcome. Since Europe is to be partitioned along lines of self-determination, Finland, with a peculiar civilization and language and an exceptional racial unity, should constitute an independent state. But we feel Admiral Kolchak showed prudence in declining to recognize the present Finnish government. The political color of the present government of Finland is as yet undeclared. It is accused, to be sure by the Bolsheviks, of being reactionary and even pro-German. To ascertain the character of the provisional government of Finland seems a proper task for the constituent assembly. The same reason that made President Wilson go slow in favoring the Kolchak government, properly makes the latter go slow as regards Finland.

The refusal to convene the constituent assembly elected in 1917 will again be severely criticized. It would seem as if a body which Lenin repressed as reactionary should not be too radical for Admiral Kolchak. He will probably be accused of wishing to pack the new assembly. There is no reason, however, to take any such sinister view of his policy. The delegates chosen in 1917 inevitably suffer from the discredit of the government, Kerensky's, which conducted the elections. Since 1917 Russia should have learned much. She should have a better idea of who are possible constitution makers than she had in the false glow of Kerensky's short prosperity. There are many sound reasons for creating a new body for the great task of making a constitution for free Russia. To-day Russia clings rather to the idea of a constituent assembly than to the particular delegates elected before the terror. In his decision Admiral Kolchak presumably represents the sound political sense of Russia. This should be said in advance of facile accusations of bad faith which are sure to be made.

American confidence in Admiral Kolchak's strength and character rests chiefly upon French and English authority. This is as it should be. What has hastened Mr. Wilson's favorable decision is doubtless the spread of Bolshevism in Central Europe. The sound strategy of supporting every strong Russian movement that makes for justice and order can not be gainsaid. What has been done at Versailles is merely to recognize the fact that Bolshevist Russia is now hemmed in by Russian bayonets. To refuse to support the Russians who are fighting our fight against our foe and theirs would be very foolish. We see after long drifting the hopeful beginnings of a real policy towards Russia. The world has taken courage to indicate the kind of settlement it desires. The decision marks the end of a not very creditable episode—for which Mr. Wilson and Premier Lloyd George seem chiefly responsible—of playing fast and loose with Bolshevism, as a sop to revolutionary radicalism generally. The game was evidently dangerous and a losing one. The understanding with Kolchak is by no means a solution of the Russian problem. But at least it is a long step in the right direction.

Progress in Industrial Organization

IN this country, there has been no such organized government effort towards the solution of the problem of industrial management as is represented in Great Britain by the Whitley report, the work of the National Industrial Commission, and the labors of various other government bodies which have been engaged upon special phases of the problem. But real progress has been made towards its solution in America by individual business men and industrial leaders who have quietly gone about the job of helping to put the industrial organization of the country on a higher plane. They have been actuated by a new sense of the needs and spirit of the times, but have used, after all, chiefly the same kind of practical intelligence and resourcefulness that has characterized the growth of American industry from the beginning.

Recently a group of business men from many lines of industry met to discuss one such notable but unobtrusive independent achievement, a plan of industrial coöperation which for two years has been in use in the plant of William Demuth and Company, the largest manufacturers of pipes and smokers' articles in the world. It provides for a representative body of employees and employers modeled on the lines of our Government, with a House of Representatives composed of elected employees' representatives, a Senate of foremen and department managers, a Cabinet of executives for the full discussion and control of all matters relating to working conditions, wages, hours, etc.

There is, of course, nothing in the central idea of this plan, and little in the details of its working out, that is new or essentially different from the various forms of works councils and shop committees which have been developed in England, and about which we have heard so much in the past two years. But the special interest of this type of American effort is that it is spontaneous and indigenous, and in some cases, like that of the Demuth Company, older than the British movement. And what is more important, it has revealed in its practical working out certain features which the British movement is not yet advanced enough or clear enough to show. In the Demuth plan the employee's profit from the plan is dependent upon his effective interest in it and in the prosperity of the plant, not upon his "bargaining power." His dividends, which are distinct from his wages, increase and decrease with the quantity and quality of output, individual and group efficiency, and market conditions. In this plant, therefore, the employee's representatives have not approached the question of hours dogmatically, but have experimented with various working schedules and adjusted them to output and market conditions with a view to the greatest profit to the company as a whole. In a similar scientific spirit they keep a close eye on labor turnover, have made a plant schedule of holidays for a great variety of races, and have set up their own Americanization classes. The plan was not introduced because of labor troubles, and there have never been any at this plant. During these two years it has been adopted by about a dozen establishments of varied types, including manufacturers of staple products, several textile mills, a piano maker, a chemical manufacturer, a copper producer and a manufacturer of metal ware.

This is merely one instance of the spontaneous and quite informal movement in American industry toward a closer coöperation of industrial factors on a basis of fairness and practical reason, and its value was so clearly realized by the business men present at the meeting that an organization was launched to assist the spread of the plan to other industries through coöperation with all other efforts of the same kind and through systematic investigation into other experiments independently made in this direction. As Professor Seligman, of Columbia, has pointed out, there is acute need in this country now for an organization free from any dogmatic bias and commanding the confidence of all groups, which should be able to devote itself to the impartial and scientific study of these problems of industrial management and coördination.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has already undertaken such a work separately, and the National Industrial Conference Board likewise. Meanwhile nineteen of the twenty plants of the International Harvester Company in the United States and Canada, the Standard Oil Companies of New Jersey and Indiana, and the Endicott, Johnson Company of Massachusetts, largest shoe manufacturers in the world, have each worked out definite programmes of this sort suited to their individual plants, but in a general way similar to each other and to the plans worked out under government auspices in Great Britain. The Indiana Standard Oil Company's plan, according to its recent announcement, will provide effective communication between management and employees on all industrial questions; give employees a voice in matters pertaining to working and living conditions; maintain the principles of coöperation and confidence by providing regular facilities for access by employees' representatives to the management; and promote the common interests of both employees and employers in matters concerning work, organization, industrial efficiency, and social well-being. This is substantially the same as the plan introduced some time ago by the International Harvester Company. The Endicott, Johnson Company's plan puts more emphasis on profit sharing, and really belongs in that class of industrial adjustments. As these separate efforts spread and progress, there should be no difficulty in coördinating them with each other on a national scale, and establishing means to compare experiences and devise improvements step by step in a scientific spirit.

This whole field of industrial and social engineering is open to earnest and thoughtful experiment, in the spirit of scientific inquiry, rather than that of religious or political dogma. It remains to be seen whether these plans will lead the workers to take thought for the larger problems of industry, the problems of raw materials, of marketing and of competition, as well as those of intensive production. If there is to be an extended control of industry there must also be an extension of risk and of responsibility.

Parting the College in the Middle

THE undergraduate who remarked, "If you could have a college without a faculty, how bully it would be!" expressed a sentiment shared by many students and parents and by most alumni. The view has the high authority of Emerson. It is tacitly the feeling of the historic universities of England. They make gentlemen primarily and scholars as they can. A college, from this point of view, is a place where young men educate each other despite distracting and extraneous studies imposed by the professors. What a father wants for his son is the companionship of college life and its delightful activities. These are more keenly relished because to attain them the curriculum has to be reckoned with. Student life is the feast, the curriculum is the skeleton. One helps the other, but the feast is the main thing.

Against this view of the college as finishing school, faculties are in a quite hopeless minority. Indeed they are themselves halfway on the majority side. Nobody knows better how much college students do educate themselves and each other than he who for years has tried to educate them. Yet the professor hardly likes to regard himself as a necessary evil. In roundabout ways he tries to secure respect for his subject by hinting, perhaps, that it is of vocational value. In simple self-respect he is bound to keep alive the notion that a college is a place chiefly devoted to study. Few colleges, however, live up to any such ideal. They very rarely impose standards which indicate that they take their own teaching seriously. There is an unwritten compact with the students, parents, and alumni that studies shall not too much interfere with the joyous on-going of college life. They do not. To impose a West Point standard might be to lose about half your students. No college takes any such chance.

In the long contest college life has constantly won. At length a long overdue reaction has come about. President Meiklejohn of Amherst has just made the audacious suggestion that the academic minority should rule, that the faculty should work not under terms laid down by college life, but that college life itself should be possible only under pretty severe terms laid down by the faculty. Where standards have been nominal, he proposes real standards. He writes to his board of trustees:

I would propose then that at the end of the sophomore year we establish a set of tests, or one comprehensive test, to determine whether or not in their two years at college our students have been making headway toward intelligence, toward culture, toward an apprehension of human knowledge as a whole. And at the end of the senior year we should have a second test which, taking the first for granted, should try to discover what students know of some one field of knowledge, what work is done within it and what it means. Passing the first examination would give admission to the senior college. Passing the senior test would qualify a student for his degree.

Here seems to be at least a reasonable compromise between college studies and college life. The popular theory of the finishing school is admitted to the extent of giving the student two years unmoled by difficult tests. This comes to saying that while it may be well worth while for an undergraduate to stay genially about college for two years, for the incidental advantages, it is a waste of time for him thus to put in four years. Accordingly a barrier is set up in the way of a comprehensive test midway in the path of his college life. He may not pass into the upper class years without proving that he has actually learned a good deal in the lower class years. Before trustees and administrators, dire visions of a depopulated college and a shrinking treasury will rise. We doubt if such losses would follow. Most students would work hard enough to qualify for the senior college.

For such as failed to qualify for the senior college, yet had passed course by course the freshman and sophomore studies, a solatium might be found in an invention of the late President Harper's, the degree of Associate in Arts. It would hardly be more popular than a silver chevron, yet it would show a clean record during residence and would keep the bearer's name on the alumni roll. The plainly poor yet tolerable student would be compelled to graduate as an A.A. at the end of sophomore year. The alternative would be to let him continue as a pass man, after the English precedent. President Meiklejohn, and we agree with him, thinks the weak brother should be eliminated after his probation of two years, making all students of the senior college (upperclassmen) really students.

What is most important in the project is the proposal of comprehensive examinations. The American college is the only institution of higher education in the world where such tests are not held. It is not possible for a Spanish student, or a Swedish, to "pass" Molière but not know French; it is possible for an American collegian to be in that paradoxical situation. The American college of today teaches nothing but courses. There is no guarantee that the student knows anything beyond the four or five courses he is following in any particular term. Normally he gets credit for a course and as promptly forgets it. Education under this system looks just about as impressive to a real student as the short smoke does to the real devotee of the weed. The intermediate test proposed by President Meiklejohn would answer such questions as these: here is a representative student who, between college and preparatory school, has regularly passed courses in Spanish for three years, in mathematics for five, in Latin for six—does he know Spanish, mathematics, and Latin?

Surely an educational system that is unwilling to have such questions asked is worthy of little respect. Few people realize how much American collegiate education has been cheapened in the past thirty years. Courses and names have been multiplied. Education has become a series of billboards, picturesque in promise, pictorially alluring, highly variegated, and structurally most flimsy. The programme grows scholarship just about as much as widely placarded remedies grow hair. As regards reasonable control through examinations, the colleges have gone steadily backward. Sentimental objections to all examinations were inconsiderately obeyed. We actually reached the point where colleges exempted from examinations precisely the students who most profit from a review, the good students. Examinations have come to be regarded not as an essential means of education, but as a hardly reasonable imposition. Against such prevailing softheartedness and soft-headedness President Meiklejohn recalls the colleges to their real task of fostering scholarship. Harvard, in a large measure the creator of the present educational disorder, has made amends by adopting similar controls. The American college can not afford to stand indefinitely on its record as a finishing school, honorable as that record has been. It must meet the standards of education that prevail throughout the civilized world. To-day it does not begin to do so. President Meiklejohn's plan points the right way.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Italo-Jugoslav Controversy

THE controversy between Italy and Jugoslavia over the problem of the Adriatic has been, since the beginning of the Peace Conference, the most baffling task before the Allied delegates, barring only the still more difficult and vastly more important Russian problem. The question finally resolves itself into five parts: Trieste, Istria, Fiume, Dalmatia, and the Dalmatian Islands. Italy claims the possession of all five: the first, second, fourth, and fifth on the basis of the Treaty of London, the third on the basis of self-determination of the city of Fiume. Jugoslavia also claims the possession of all five, invoking historic and ethnographic reasons for her claim. The possession of Trieste and of most of the peninsula of Istria was conceded to Italy from the start. The controversy over Fiume and Dalmatia, still unsettled, reached its culminating point with the President's declaration, in the middle of April, that America could never consent to Italy's claims. Attempts to harmonize the divergent views and to find some grounds for a settlement have so far proved unsuccessful.

The question of Fiume has loomed largest in the public mind. Its solution depends on both ethnic and economic considerations. During the height of the controversy, I had an opportunity to discuss the problem with Signor Barzilai, the Italian Minister of the Occupied Regions, and a member of the Peace Delegation, besides hearing the views of many other Italian authorities and experts. On the other side, I tried to get the Jugoslav point of view from Dr. Trumbich, the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Jugoslavia and head of the Jugoslav Peace Delegation. How these divergent views can be harmonized, I do not pretend to say, but it may be helpful to set them forth with some fullness and without prejudice.

Fiume consists of the city and three villages, all of which constitute what is known as the Commune of Fiume. The city itself consists of two parts. Fiume proper, the port and the town, lies on the right bank of a narrow river, and is predominantly Italian. On the opposite bank of the river lies the suburb of Susak, which is just as predominantly Croatian. Both Italians and Croats claim a majority of the city's population. But the only statistics available, based on the census of the Hungarian Government, are totally inadequate in the matter of classification.

Local feeling is well illustrated in the fact that on the banks of the narrow stream which cuts the city in two the Italians and the Croats live in voluntary segregation. There is much ill-feeling between them, and it is of old standing. The Croats in Fiume tell you that they do not mind so much the Italians who come from Italy, but that they hate those who live in the city. This hatred is natural when we remember that this region was administered and ruled in accordance with the famous Austrian formula of keeping the different subject nationalities constantly at daggers drawn.

Whether through favoritism on the part of the Hungarian overlords of the city or through a more energetic nationalism, the Italian population of Fiume has succeeded in maintaining Italian as the official language of the city. The charter granted to the city by the Budapest Government is in Italian, and all the official communications between Fiume and Budapest have invariably been in that language. This is undoubtedly a stronger argument in favor of the Italian character of Fiume than its beautiful Italian architecture.

Controversy bases itself further on the historical status of the commune of Fiume. The Croats assert that Fiume had always been a part of the Kingdom of Croatia and belonged to Hungary indirectly through belonging to Croatia. The Italians, on the other hand, say that the city, Roman in origin, had always, through the ages, maintained the character of an Italian free city, and that it was under actual Croatian domination only twice in its history. Coming under the power of the Hapsburgs in 1471, Fiume was united with Croatia in 1776 by the Austrian Empress Maria-Theresa. But after three years the Empress changed the charter to the city, making it a separate political body, attached directly to the Kingdom of Hungary. Since then, until 1848, Fiume remained an autonomous commune under Hungary. In the year of the Hungarian revolution that city was occupied by the Croats and held by them until 1867, when it was again restored to the dignity of a self-governing commune, constituting, with Hungary proper and Croatia-Slavonia, the kingdom of Hungary.

There is no agreement, of course, in the Italian and the Jugoslav analyses of the economic significance of the port. The Italians prove by means of the shipping statistics of the Austro-Hungarian Empire that only seven per cent. of the sea-borne trade of Fiume could properly be called Croatian and Slavonian. The rest was accounted for by the trade from the interior, particularly from Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia. The Jugoslavs, on the other hand, show that most of the important branches of commerce are in the hands of Croatian business men.

Whatever the divergent claims as to the economic importance of the city, a glance at the map will show that Fiume is really an outlet for the very important railway line running back to Budapest, through Lubiana, the capital of Slavonia, and Zagreb, the capital of Croatia. Even if serving nothing but the far hinterlands, Fiume unmistakably forms a part of this railway system. Whoever enjoys control over the city will always have to depend upon the good will of those who own the railroad for facilities in reaching it.

Of the solutions, barring those which would give the city outright either to Italy or to Jugoslavia, two deserve special attention. The first is that which would make Fiume an open port under Italian suzerainty for a number of years sufficient to enable the Jugoslavs to construct a new port, when Fiume would revert to Italy. The second is that which would make Fiume a free port under the control of the League of Nations.

The first of these plans is perfectly feasible. To the south of Fiume lies the good, sheltered harbor of Buccari (Bakar), entirely undeveloped, with only a small fishing village on its shore. I have not visited Buccari, but during my recent stay at Fiume I had an opportunity to see it from the heights overlooking the village and the harbor. A small mountain ridge separates Fiume and its environs from Buccari and the rest of the Croatian coast.

The plan is to develop Buccari into a harbor, the work to be done and financed by Jugoslavia and Italy jointly. Buccari would then be connected by a short railway line (a matter of a few miles) with the main railway line from Fiume to Budapest, which crosses the mountains just beyond Buccari. All these operations are technically possible. The result of the carrying out of this plan would be that the Jugoslavs would have a railroad running from their port of Buccari to Budapest and the rest of the hinterland, with a branch to Fiume. The entire line from the port to the borders of Hungary would pass through Jugoslav territory.

There is every reason to believe that Fiume would decline as a port under such conditions. Yet the Italians are willing to acquiesce in such a plan, believing, as they explained to me, that even under the conditions outlined they would still be able to compete with the Jugoslavs as far as commerce is concerned, at the same time realizing their aspirations for the possession of Fiume. The Jugoslavs oppose this plan on the ground that it would give Italy many advantages during the period required for the construction of the new port, even in the event that both Italy and Jugoslavia enjoyed equal freedom in the use of Fiume. Moreover, they consider the whole process economically wasteful.

The second plan would make Fiume a free port and the commune of Fiume a small state under the control of the League of Nations. The opposition to this plan comes most emphatically from the representatives of the city itself. The present communal council, headed by Dr. Grossich, is entirely in favor of joining Italy. And yet, the second plan offers, it seems, the best basis for a settlement, for a more or less adequate and satisfactory solution of the problem lies undoubtedly along some such lines of international control; especially since the problem really involves the interests of other nations besides the two claimants.

LEO PASVOLSKY

Conditions in Canada

IN a necessarily limited space, it would be exceedingly difficult to give an adequate idea of the upheaval, political, social, and general, that is taking place in Canada. Politically, the situation is one of grave uncertainty; socially, clashing interests have brought about confusion almost chaotic; in the breast of the people—the community at large—a feeling of unrest exists such as has never before been known. And yet the situation is not hopeless. The struggle lies between constituted authority, on the one hand, and resistance to the existing governing powers, on the other. To grasp the meaning of this open warfare, as exemplified in strikes, sympathetic strikes, demands for higher wages, for shorter hours, for regulation of the high cost of living, cloaked efforts to overthrow constituted authority, be it Federal, Provincial, or Municipal, and the necessity of resorting to the most drastic legislation ever enacted in the Dominion, one must be upon the ground, in the centre of the volcanic disturbance, and be, like the creature of Ezekiel's vision, "wheel within wheel and glistening with eyes."

Leaving the thousand and one details to the imagination of the reader, I will attempt an outline of the situation. Immediately after the declaration of the armistice, the Canadian Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, was summoned to London as one of the Dominion's representatives in the preliminary peace negotiations, leaving the Finance Minister, Sir Thomas White, in charge as Acting Prime Minister. While he was still absent growing unrest throughout the Dominion made it advisable to summon Parliament on February 20, always in the hope that the peace negotiations would be sufficiently advanced to permit of the Prime Minister's return before the more important issues of the session were reached. An exceptionally large amount of public legislation was prepared, due to the cessation of war conditions and consequent reconstruction; but the one great feature of the session—the Budget, or yearly financial statement—was delayed. The delay was due in part to the prolonged absence of the Prime Minister and the uncertainty as to ultimate results in Europe, but the legislators, while making allowance for this cause, were becoming restive, and throughout the country the feeling of unrest was growing intense.

The high cost of living was becoming unbearable; the consumers were feeling the pinch more and more as the prices of all necessaries were going up by leaps and bounds; each element of the population was blaming the other, and all were blaming the Government; higher wages, shorter hours, altered conditions were demanded; organized labor menaced; local strikes were becoming more frequent; returned soldiers were individually expressing dissatisfaction; and a dark cloud was gathering in the very centre of the Dominion, at Winnipeg, and threatening to burst and scatter East and West, deluging the entire country. In Parliament there were rumors of grave differences between members of the Union Government. These rumors seemed to find confirmation in the outcries for the Budget coming from East and West. The West, with its agricultural interests, demanded drastic tariff reductions; the East, with its manufacturing interests and larger industrial centres, held its breath in the hope that the coming Budget would maintain a protective scale sufficient at least not to endanger any of the expanding industries. While both of these elements were thus restlessly awaiting a delayed solution, labor and capital were facing each other in an attitude that foreshadowed a terrific struggle.

Such was the situation when the news came that Sir Robert Borden was about to return to Canada. It was hoped that this information would check, at least until his arrival, the storm that had been gathering. But it was a vain hope. While the Prime Minister was on the Atlantic events moved rapidly towards confusion.

The situation at Winnipeg grew worse and extended to other centres, such as Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Regina, and as far west as Vancouver. Toronto, meanwhile, was in the grip of a formidable strike; but the real storm-centre was Winnipeg. A kind of soviet government was there attempted; the mayor and municipal authorities seemed unable to cope with the situation; matters were carried to a point where the controlling power arrogated to itself the granting of permits to sell bread, milk, and other foodstuffs, to open theatres, restaurants, and places of public resort. All civic life was at a standstill. This was actual revolution against constituted authority.

At this juncture two Federal Ministers were sent to Winnipeg to lend their assistance in the solution of the knotty problem. One was the Minister of Labor, the other was the Acting Minister of Justice. Theirs was practically a fruitless expedition. While they did all in their power to bring about an understanding between the Unions on strike and the Citizens' Committee, they were handicapped on account of the lack of Federal authority to intervene.

Meanwhile Sir Robert Borden arrived at Ottawa. It was decided on Thursday, June 5th, to bring down the long-expected financial Budget. Expectancy was at its height; the fiscal statement was made; and the general debate on the same was fixed for Monday, June 9th. What effect the tariff announcements will have all over the country can be judged as the debate proceeds, which will reflect the opinions of the various groups of the Canadian people.

Some idea of the effect of the Budget speech may be gleaned from a few of the already evident results. Scarcely were the tariff changes announced when the Hon. Mr. Crerar, Minister of Agriculture, resigned his seat in the Cabinet, but retained his place in the House—in order freely to criticize the financial statement. This gentleman was President of the Grain Growers' Association of the West; he retired from that position to become a member of the Ministry; and now he resigns from the Ministry to mark his dissatisfaction with the readjustment of the tariff. It is presumed that several—any number from a dozen to two dozen—Unionist Government supporters from the West will almost certainly follow Mr. Crerar into the ranks of the dissatisfied.

While the Budget and the tariff changes have absorbed the attention of the financial world of Canada, the strike situation has become more acute than ever. The One Big Union has drawn to Canada from the United States a number of "Red," or social, political, and national agitators of the I. W. W. brand, and of the Hyde Park class, from England. There existed no Federal law empowering the authorities at Ottawa to deal summarily with this disturbing element. Urged to the very brink, the Dominion Government, last week, introduced amendments to the Immigration Act of a most drastic character. But it soon appeared that these provisions did not include immigrants from Great Britain. As it was discovered that some of the most dangerous of these revolutionary agitators were from England, a further amendment was speedily added. The bill was introduced, passed both houses, and assented to, in the record time of one hour and twenty minutes. That same night copies of the new law were despatched to Winnipeg. Thus the prohibited classes now include not only those who advocate the overthrow of constituted authority, but also those who "in Canada, defend or suggest the unlawful destruction of property, or by word or by act create or attempt to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who, without lawful authority, assume any power of government in Canada, or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belong to or are suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or by threat of bodily harm or by blackmail." Persons in the prohibited classes are liable to deportation except those who are British subjects either by reason of birth or of naturalization in Canada. Further, if a person by act or by word at any time since May, 1910, has done the things enumerated, he would prima facie be deemed to belong to the prohibited classes.

The Government has been severely criticized for delay in interfering in Winnipeg. But it must be remembered that it is not the business of the Federal authorities to interfere until Federal law has been attacked or threatened. This new legislation places the Government in a position to deal effectively, by armed force if required, with all attempts to overthrow constituted authority. The sympathetic strike on the part of the Post Office officials has been dealt with by the dismissal of all such employees; but a drastic general law was necessary in all other cases.

J. K. F.

Ottawa, Canada, June 9

Mobilized Philology

MEN have always felt the lure of the past, but the spirit and temper of their inevitable response to the appeal of yester-year has varied widely in different periods of their history. Man's way of looking backward has altered with the three stages of man's growth. The youthful phase of his interest in far-off things is romantic, not merely in its glad escape from the reality of the present, but in its transcendental disregard of historical truth and perspective. Romance, the great magnifier and magician, transforms its heroes, its Arthurs, its Robin Hoods, and its Rolands out of all likeness to their real selves; it leaps flamingly over all bounds of space and time, gathering in one close embrace worthies that flourished in different ages, Alexander, Cæsar, and Scottish kings; and grouping as what Mrs. Malaprop calls, "contagious countries," lands that lie as far asunder as Denmark and Mesopotamia. The response to history in man's second and more active stage is patriotic. Pride of country glorifies a Henry V, a Joan of Arc, a Washington; but as in Shakespeare's historical dramas, the strong national consciousness, which idealizes kings and captains, often recks little or nothing of the mighty constructive forces that are ever steadily at work beneath all the tumult and the shouting, the purport of Magna Charta and the true meaning of the Peasants' Revolt. And finally, when the years bring to the man and to the race maturity of thought and judgment, his attitude to the past becomes philosophical. The student striving to weigh and consider the thoughts and deeds not only of the great ones of the earth but of all sorts and conditions of men in every age has as the goal of his long analysis and reflection a sense of historic continuity, the power of "grasping in a single firm vision the long course of human history." Man turns to his book no longer in a spirit of wonder or of ancestor-worship, finding in brightly colored pages a refuge from the dull familiar things of the present, but seeking a forecast of present happenings in a scientist's study of those long-ago sprouts and seedlings that are now leafing and flowering in their later growth. And yet such study is not less but more efficiently patriotic, when it is the product of a large perspective.

Hence it happens that the avowed intent of the present professional student of literature, the maker of the latest text-book or anthology, is not the quest of "l'art pour l'art," art for art's sake, the expression of emotions that are always old and always new; but the very definite adventure of tracing landmarks in the march of the Anglo-Saxon mind—the dominant ideals of the national life of England and of America. Printed large on a dozen title-pages are "The Great Tradition," "The Heritage of Freedom," "National Ideals in Literature." The concern of editor or critic is now the interpretation of the spirit of the race in the light of the reaction of its men of genius to the most vital of problems, the working out of self-government. Shakespeare is no longer exalted merely as playwright or sonneteer; but is eulogized by his latest interpreter, Professor Gayley, as a disciple of law and humanity, a champion of "the unity and married calm of states," an opponent of Machiavelli and secret diplomacy—above all, an aristodemocrat, a poet of personal nobility or noblesse oblige; and he is revealed to us in sympathetic converse with those patriots of the London Company who in 1609 purposed "to erect in Virginia, a free popular state in which the inhabitants should have no government put upon them but by their own consent." Hereafter, I think, we shall never read our "Macbeth" without the reminder that here is exposed to all men's contempt the military autocrat, master of frightfulness and espionage, wading deeper and deeper in blood, until destroyed, by the aid of a very pretty bit of "camouflage," the moving wood; nor our "Henry V" without editorial comment upon the nice conscience of the English king who will make no war-provoking claim upon France, until fully assured of his legal right, and who, unlike the modern invaders of the same ground, gives express charge "that in our marches through the country, there be nothing compelled from the villages, nothing taken but paid for, none of the French upbraided or abused in disdainful language."

Nor have scholars limited their study of the political significance of great literature to the products of their own soil. Anglo-Saxon and German have each carried the war into the country of the other by finding apt illustration of the hated ideals and traits of the enemy in his supreme achievements of heart and head. What shall we say when three of our leading American philosophers, John Dewey and Santayana and Ralph Perry, independently assure us that Kant's categorical imperative, the gospel of moral duty divorced from all consideration of good and evil consequences, naturally lent itself to Prussia's adoption of universal service and to the thoroughgoing subordination of individual happiness and liberty of action to the state? And shall we protest when an English contributor to the Hibbert Journal asserts that in Goethe's "Faust" the workings of the moral law are not felt and that in the separation of reason and feeling, whenever Goethe and even Schiller discuss ethical questions, lies the explanation of Germany's crime and self-ruin? Can we find any occasion for wonder in the campaign of German scholars against the great traditions of our literature, in their felonious assault upon much that we cherish?

"Loved long since but lost a while," they now swarm back to the familiar corner of the library table—the busy, buzzing throng of German philological journals that gather their booty among the blooms of English gardens, Anglia, the queen-bee, and her attendant Studien, Beiblätter, Mittheilungen and Sonderabdrucke. Two or three years ago when we knew them last, they were loudly humming their self-satisfaction: "When a German scholar seats himself in his chair [thus Morf of Leipzig in October, 1914], he is able to contemplate with unjaundiced vision the ground of the enemy's culture and spiritual life, for no matter how patriotic the Gelehrter may be in his heart, he is also a citizen of the Civitas Dei, the City of God, which means in the present age a world-fellowship of spirit. Only in Germany is such communion possible. Let scholars in hostile lands rage in their weakness of soul and purposeless hate against our Kultur. We shall ever give truth its meed of honor, for we alone are strong enough to do this." The refrain is, of course: "Thank God, we are big German bumble-bees, not English hornets, nor French wasps, nor American yellow-jackets." And yet alas for such vaunting, even then the Anglistic hive yielded little enough of honey and wax—infinite labor and search ending disappointingly in editorial murmurings, monotonously fierce, against both Britain and America, the sudden moral collapse of the one, the more gradual, but not less shameful degeneration of the other. Anglia indeed! In like bitterness of spirit, old Cato the Censor, a Teuton in his hardness, might have put forth for Roman readers a monthly Carthago, tagging each number with his damnatory "delenda."

Now the swarm is once more with us in stinging force. The sweetness and light somewhat scantily offered are gleaned not only, as of old, from dissertations chasing the panting word and the elusive source, but from fresher and more fervent monographs of 1917-1918 duly listed as useful to scholarly students of English, exposing "The Anglo-Saxon Conspiracy" and "British Breaches of International Law" (Völkerrechtsverletzungen), extolling in the name of all that is fearful and wonderful "Germany's Final Offer of Peace and Guide for all Nations to Reciprocity during Time and Eternity" (Deutscher endgültiger Friedensvorschlag und Wegweiser für alle Völker auf Gegenseitigkeit für Zeit und Ewigkeit, by one Görlitz) and yet flaunting last year's lively hopes of "A Field-gray Peace" and "A U-Boat Peace." Not content with such sallies "over the top," subtler Teutonic minds found congenial occupation in the task of "driving a wedge" between the literatures of the Allies by the publication of long-forgotten acerbities and asperities. Did not Taine, the Frenchman, accuse John Bull of suffering from "hyper-trophie du moi," or megalomania, and picture the British Junker class as having the snouts of bulldogs with rolling eyes and apoplectic faces? Did not Trevisano, the Italian, declare that "the Englishman thinks that there is nobody but himself and no land but England?" And what did the American, Ralph Waldo Emerson, say of the robbing and plundering forefathers of the British nobility? Mark the fatal ease of this method of attack, and its speedy exhaustion of munitions! Let us bring up some other guns. What monstrous missiles have been hurled by Englishmen across the Channel at France: remember Tennyson's "blind hysterics of the Celt" and "blood-red fury of the Seine" and Landor's symbolic balloon, "flimsy, varnished, inflated, restless, wavering, swaggering." And as for America, Jonathan, Jefferson Brick and Sammy Slick, perennial butt of British and Gallic wit! Enough, and more than enough!

Most significant of all these German self-revelations is the shuddering dread of British imperialism, the quivering fear that the English mind, to the interpretation of which these so-called Anglists are themselves ostensibly pledged, may dominate the world. Hence Anglia's fortieth volume finds a fearful fascination in "Imperialistic Currents in English Literature." Such a study is epoch-making in its import, because it finally fixes, to the full satisfaction of the Teuton, the much-mooted responsibility of the World War upon a single person. This monstrum horrendum, heretofore unsuspected but now at last unmasked in all his specious criminality, is—though the betrayed innocence of the German shrinks from the impious horror of this tremendous exposure—one John Milton. And it appears that not the least odious feature of his guilt is his long and insidious deception of the Gelehrte themselves. A Shakespearean performance at Leipzig in the first October of the War was preceded by a prologue in which the dramatist was made to renounce his "first and native abode" and to adopt as his "only home" the genial and gentle land of his German audience—a defection which the rechristened "Schüttellanz" must now ruefully regret. In one of the very periodicals before me, an Anglist of repute marking the deep chasm that separates the idealistic philosopher, Lord Shaftesbury, from the English people, to whom he belonged only by the unhappy yet trifling accident of birth, claims him as intrinsically German in soul, admitting him to full spiritual communion with the children of light. Thomas Carlyle—so the Herr Professor tells us—long since parted with his British birthright for a mess of Hohenzollern pottage. And Milton very narrowly missed a Prussian reincarnation in 1914, when Alois Brandl of Berlin confidently affirmed of him that, "were he living at this hour, he would comprehend German championship of freedom, care of justice, love of truth." Fortunately for fostering Deutschtum, the revelation of iniquity was not longer deferred. As soon as the parentage of British imperialism had been traced by approved seminary methods to Puritan consciousness of victory at the time of Cromwell and the Commonwealth, who so blind as not to see that its mother's milk was the Old Testament conception of the chosen people and of the New Zion, and that this Milton was its too kindly nurse (our infantile imagery preserves, we hope, all the original naïveté)? Then burst the mud-storm of a mighty academic wrath, and never was poor poet more besmattered and beluted.

To Herr Professor Friedrich Brie, whom I remember to have met at Weimar, a mild-mannered man enough, belongs the Hibernian honor of "tearing off the mask of godliness and revealing the cloven hoof"; and from Heinrich Mutschmann, writing "im Felde," comes a soldier's stern approval of the very efficient anti-Milton propaganda conducted by a pro-German Swede, Liljengren of Lund. A wondering world of Teutons thus learns how deeply the roots of Calvinism penetrated English soil, and what bitter fruit is borne. Milton exhibits all the detestable traits, only too easily developed in the Puritan nature of Englishmen—a measureless conceit, contemptuous of fellow-beings, a gross hypocrisy, which carries constantly in the mouth the words, "virtue, justice, truth" without ever practising them towards one's opponents, and a conviction that the ends justify the means. "Can such things be?" asks the kindly German audience. Milton was like all his tribe an individualist. The imperious Cæsarean temperament of his Satan in Paradise Lost—so declared these champions of the Kaiser's Empire—is the key that apparently unlocks the inmost recesses of Milton's own character. He, too, would rather rule in hell than hold second place in heaven. This passion, which burnt in his core, to lord it over and look down on a worshipping world at his feet was seemingly his deepest source of emotion and therefore irresistibly broke forth in the creation of a congenial mind, Satan. However faithfully Milton may have meant to work along lines befitting a Christian (mark the gracious concession), his irresistible sympathy with a personality, mind, cause, and fate all but identical with his own and those of his time elicited, in spite of his reason, the passion that centuries after his death emanates from the mouth of Satan. Through such logic as this, the German critic reaches a twofold conclusion damning to both England and her representative poet: that Milton was accursed with a Satanic megalomania, then and now a specifically English trait; and that the revolt of Milton and his Puritan fellows against a conservative, traditional, authoritative ruler can be matched in sacrilege only by the rebellion of the fallen angels against deity. At the very moment when German scholars are thus demonstrating Milton's diabolism, an American, Professor Dodge, is suggesting in the leading article of the University of Wisconsin Studies (1918) that "the theology of Paradise Lost to our modern apprehension has issued in a God who is a kind of super-Teutonic Junker and in a Heaven which is a kind of glorified Berlin." Here, it would seem, is a partial explanation of the German animus.

In the German impeachment of Milton, which I give just as I find it, there is undeniably an alloy of truth—the half-truth which lies loudest to high heaven. Milton and the men of the Commonwealth were individualists, nay more, rebels against royal authority. As Macaulay's schoolboy knows, "they bowed their heads in the dust before their Maker, but they set their feet upon the neck of kings." Their manly fortitude and self-reliance are undoubtedly Calvinistic. Wherever the influence of Calvinism has been strongest, a spirit of independence has been most active. Milton's heart cry of passionate devotion to "strenuous liberty," which the German pundits denounce as of the deuce damnable, men of English blood and speech are now proudly echoing, "Thou canst not touch the freedom of my mind." In the long struggle that justice and law have waged against tyranny, Milton was a protagonist and hence a shining mark for imperial shafts. The furious Teutonic onslaught upon Milton strikes at the very source of our Anglo-Saxon tradition of personal freedom, for the liberal England of the seventeenth century, which spoke in the poet's organ voice, was, as has been well said, "the nursing mother of the triad of modern democracies—the United States of America, the union of free commonwealths styled the British Empire, and the French Republic."

It is the colonial and territorial policy of England that draws the heaviest fire of these fully mobilized German brains. They all agree that the very foundation of British imperialism is Puritanism. Carlyle with his theories of the right of the stronger to power and of mankind's mission of civilizing the world gave to colonial expansion a mighty impetus. But Carlyle was a Puritan, preaching the gospel of duty and exalting work into a religion. Hence it follows, as the night the day, that the spirit of British imperialism is also the spirit of Puritanism performing each task to the glory of God, working both at the merchant's desk and at the helm of state for God's kingdom which on earth is called England. This spirit, whose dark side (says the Herr Professor) is commercial greed and unscrupulous money-getting, has made England great. In contrast to the intolerable arrogance of this world-spirit, how modest seems the ethical German imperialism ("ethischer Imperialismus")! Carlyle and his disciples, Ruskin and Kingsley, are dear to true

German hearts, but they merit thus much of rebuke. Carlyle and Ruskin were panegyrist of war as a necessary contribution to human progress (how strangely this sounds in German ears!); in like temper the battle-loving, piratical, English imperialism of today (this was written in 1917) refuses to end the most frightful of all wars by a fair peace, which will be lasting. Nothing could be farther from the thought of either Carlyle or Kingsley than the present oppression of other civilized people (Kulturvölker) for the greater glory of England. And yet to both of them Spain's war against England in Elizabeth's days was nothing else than an assault of the Prince of Darkness upon the Light. Carlyle and Kingsley never asked whether the Spaniards had anything to say for themselves, and yet the very recent history of their own empire repeats that of Spain. Thus reason the Professors. Roman imperialism, Spanish imperialism, British imperialism—the German scholars apparently see no difference between them nor yet between a state rule like the English which follows, and a state rule, like their own, which precedes the task of colonizing and civilization. How many shattered hopes of Germany were based upon the delusion that the British colonies, like hers, were the victims of a tyrannical central government and hence ripe for revolt, instead of being, as General Smuts, who can speak with authority, said recently, "a system of nations, not an empire but far greater than any empire which has ever existed, a whole world by ourselves, consisting of all sorts of communities under one flag—a dynamic system growing, evolving all the time, towards new destinies"! Our purblind German Anglists seem to have read not at all or else to little purpose the English poetry of imperialism during the past forty years—magnificent verse, much of it, ringing with the notes of pride and affection and a sense of service to backward peoples. And German philologists might well consider such a figure as Oswald Sydenham, V.C., the directing agency of H. G. Wells's educational novel of 1918, "Joan and Peter," devoted to his task of making an imperial citizen according to the ideas that prevailed before the advent of what he calls "the base imperialism of Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes." He extols the works of the English colonist, a policeman, whose beat is all the world; he eloquently expounds the text of the great tradition of the race; and, germanely to our present discussion, he, too, quotes Milton. "It was Milton who wrote long ago that when God wanted some task of peculiar difficulty to be done, he turned to his Englishmen. And he turns to us today. Old Milton saw England shine clear and great for a time and then pass into the darkness. Church and crown are no part of the real England which we inherit." Thus may mobilized philology be met with the weapon of its own choosing.

FREDERICK TUPPER

Correspondence

The President's Idealism

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Nothing but lack of capital keeps me from founding and editing an independent paper in Colorado—a State hag-ridden by a journalism always personal and often corrupt. Were I editing such a paper, nothing would be more appreciated by me than the frank expression of the views of my thoughtful subscribers.

I have watched with keen interest the launching of the Review and am in hearty sympathy with its announced purposes. I hope the editorial in the second issue of the Review on "The Psychology of Woodrow Wilson" does not strike a permanent note for the new journal.

You deny that Wilson is a "clear and responsible thinker" and speak of his "impossible programme" as an "offense." Fundamentally you seem to blame Wilson because he is a prophet rather than a politician. You would not deny the ethical and ideal elevation of the fourteen propositions formulated by Mr. Wilson? The blunder worse than a crime, is it that they are unworkable?

Is not the same true of the Sermon on the Mount? Would you deny that Christ was a "clear and responsible thinker" and say that the sermon was a "mistake," because it called for action too high for selfish humanity? The fourteen points are, so it seems to me, a step in applied Christianity. Was it a mistake to take this step because the Allies, though solemnly pledged to it in the armistice agreement, have since refused, some in part and others almost entirely, to carry out their agreement?

Is it not possible that Wilson, well aware of the suspicion and selfishness of Europe and the vitality of the old diplomacy based on international grand larceny, judged rightly, made no "mistake" in promulgating this new diplomacy? If only partly successful, will it not be a gain for civilization? That it may not be at once and completely successful is an indictment not of Wilson's programme, but of the nations which, though they agreed to it, have failed and refused in part to carry it out.

I am not a partisan in my feeling for Mr. Wilson. Born and bred a Republican, my "natural man" is averse to much of the Democratic doctrine, but this is not a partisan matter, not even a national matter, but a world matter, and one on which hinges the future of civilization.

While it is true that this programme was formulated by Mr. Wilson, its essential doctrines were enunciated by Lloyd George in Parliament some ten days before Mr. Wilson's formulation on January 8, 1918. Lloyd George in his recent speech in Parliament said that, when he laid out these principles of settlement, he was supported by every shade of opinion in England. Would you say that Lloyd George and Bryce and Asquith and Cecil are not "clear and responsible thinkers"?

It is not that Wilson is not a "clear and responsible thinker," but that he thinks too clearly and refuses to be responsible to those still bound down by individual and national selfishness and blind to the world that should be.

CHARLES W. HAINES

Colorado Springs, Colorado, June 2

The Covenant

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In his able and comprehensive "Examination of the Covenant" Mr. Corwin seems especially to single out for attack the preponderant power assigned to themselves by the Big Five in the Council of the League. Two questions are really involved: whether such preponderance is proper when exercised with respect to the executive activities of the League, and whether it should be admitted in the settlement of international disputes. As regards the first question, one would be interested to know what alternative such an authority as Mr. Corwin would be ready to propose. Previous to the war, acknowledgment of the particular status occupied by the Great Powers was compelled by the fact that, in controlling more than three-fourths of the world's population, territory, and wealth, and very much more than three-fourths of the world's armaments, the Big Eight were plainly responsible for the well-being of mankind. With the disappearance of Austria-Hungary and the collapse of Russian government the Big Eight has become the Big Six; but the armaments of America and the British Empire have become so swollen, actually and potentially, that the power and responsibility of the Great Powers seem scarcely less than before. Is it desirable that authority should be in hands other than those in which rest both responsibility and power? And if not, where else in the League can authority rest than with the Big Five? Should we expose the League during its infancy to the strain inevitably involved by the immediate admission to the Council of Germany in her present state; or should the decisive word lie with the warm-blooded and rather inexperienced statesmen not rarely produced by some of the smaller nations of both hemispheres? Mr. Corwin himself refers to the fate of the proposed court of arbitral justice in 1907 (a court, by the way, in which the Big Eight would have had a permanent majority) and thinks that the creation of such a court should have been "imposed" by the Peace Conference on the smaller Powers. After all, since the Big Five will have only a bare majority, our own representative on the Council will be able to break its domination at any time; unless we too shall develop the spirit of selfishness and the taste for combination under all circumstances which seem to be taken for granted in the case of the other four. And the Covenant, as Mr. Lovejoy has pointed out, will, in eliminating secret understandings, scarcely leave room for "Shantungs."

Mr. Corwin's objection to the settlement of international disputes by the Council raises other questions. Personally I regret that the framers of the Covenant did not see fit to accept the suggestion, made by Mr. Root and by several British publicists, that all justiciable disputes should be settled by arbitration or a court of arbitral justice, and that the court of the League, and not the disputants, should decide what disputes were justiciable and what were not. But, in the process of mediation which is applied to non-justiciable disputes, the "political and governmental" outlook of the Council would scarcely be a serious drawback. Moreover, since unanimous decision is required in the Council, and since either disputant is at liberty to secure the removal of a case from the jurisdiction of the Council to that of the Assembly, it is hard to see how "the adjustment of international difficulties, from whatever quarter or source arising," should "invariably be entrusted to a particular set of nations."

There are a number of points on which I agree with Mr. Corwin and several others on which I should like to argue with him, but only two of the latter seem of sufficient importance to justify my asking more of your space. He closes his article with a plea for American "independence," and elsewhere registers protests against our sacrificing the freedom of choice in self-defense, and against our having to "remain indefinitely the member of a coalition having for its primary purpose the maintenance of a solidarity of interests among its principal members and so a balance of power against another potential coalition." It is difficult for me to follow these arguments. Does a nation sacrifice sovereignty or free will in choosing to enter into a contract from which it may, upon proper notice given, choose to withdraw, suffering no impairment of its former status? Were entrance into the League to involve immediate disarmament the case might be different. But the difficulties of framing a practical scheme of disarmament seem so nearly insuperable, and the task of securing the adoption of any scheme is likely to encounter such strong objections from states to which powerful armaments are far more necessary than to ourselves, that few even of the optimists expect reduction to commence within a generation. And, when the time for reduction does come, we shall not only be able to reject the plan proposed but shall be as free as ever to leave the League, if that should seem the better course. Our delegates need never in a single case be instructed to cast their vote with the other members of the Big Five. How then shall we be bound to the League, or, much less, to any "coalition" which it may contain? And is it not rather a mistake to treat the Covenant as though it possessed such finality? Does any one suppose that it will retain its membership unless there shall be radical amendments which others will be as likely, as competent, and as privileged to demand as ourselves?

Nor can I finally endorse Mr. Corwin's suggestions regarding the action of the Senate. Because we had the honor of giving unstinted and indispensable aid to the Allies when they delivered the knock-out blow to the leader of the Central Powers, it would scarcely be generous to demand a privileged place in the League. Yet, if we are to reserve a special interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine, which is "based primarily, . . . upon the security and self-interest of the United States," we could scarcely refuse to allow similar reservations to other Powers. If we limit our period of membership in the League to three years, why should not others limit theirs to two, or four, or five? What a League we should have! But why any reservation of this latter sort when the privilege of withdrawal is at our disposal?

Our position in international affairs has indeed been a proud one; but other nations have contributed in like manner to the maintenance of the world's peace—with what results we know. And it seems to me that we have already resigned our old place in the world. By our whole-hearted and largely unselfish participation in the war we have attained a rank far higher than any to which we could previously lay claim. By whole-hearted and unselfish coöperation in the League, by sacrificing rather the feeling than the substance of independence, we may do much to shape the "coalitions" of the future and retain the moral primacy which we have lately enjoyed in the family of nations.

HERBERT C. BELL

Bowdoin College, June 10

Book Reviews

National Views of Industrial Reconstruction

LABOR AND RECONSTRUCTION IN EUROPE. By Elisha M. Friedman. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THIS is a book that will bring joy to the historian's heart because it contains, within reasonable compass, a fine collection of "sources," together with numerous references and a well-selected bibliography. More than half of the space is given to labor problems in England, half of the remainder to Germany, while a scant quarter of the book is allotted to the rest of Europe; but this lack of balance may be forgiven an author who abhors verbiage and padding, advocates no policy, sponsors no scheme, and offers to the reader the delicate flat-tery of presenting only the facts.

But the facts in question are nothing but a collection of schemes and policies designed to show, not the economic and social condition of European wage-earners, but the prevailing and increasing discontent, and the general agreement among those who know that something must be done to improve those conditions and to allay the discontent. Not labor leaders and socialists and politicians, merely, are asking for reforms; but business men and economists have something to suggest. There is, indeed, a bewildering array of proposals, although, fortunately, there is a certain unity in the multiplicity that shows a common origin of the troubles, and indicates broadly a common treatment.

Practically all the reports agree in advising that normal production be resumed, and that the armies of soldiers and war-workers of every kind be demobilized as fast as they can be absorbed in the arts of peace. There is general agreement in the belief that unemployment can be for the most part prevented, in the demand that the wealthy bear the burden of financial reorganization, and in the recommendation that the manufacture, import, and consumption of luxuries be for some time restricted.

Students of the problem in various countries differ in the general character of their suggestions. Gide, and other French economists, for instance, lay stress on the need of making good the wastes of war by encouraging the increase of population, by a new spirit of enterprise and daring in business men and statesmen, by developing water-power, encouraging export, and making France economically independent of enemy countries. For the traditional policy of laissez faire is substituted coördination of all forces, both public and private, for the upbuilding of the country. Method in industry, rather than oratory in politics, is to be the mainstay of industrial reorganization.

Germans, on the other hand, seem to be more concerned about raw materials than anything else, although they are troubled also about the scarcity of tonnage, the loss of foreign commerce, the tremendous debt, and the badly deranged condition of foreign exchange—all this, of course, before the war turned decisively against them. It is worth remembering that on April 1, 1918, Prince Loewenstein proposed that Germany should receive, as part of the indemnity, large supplies of raw materials from the Allied countries. From all sides come demands for public control of private business, with compulsory syndicalization of the leading industries.

In England the cry is for a national awakening and a spirit of coöperation among all classes. The experience of the war has shown that production can be enormously increased if capitalists will be less grasping, and if laborers are willing to abandon unreasonable restriction of output. The Government has solemnly and repeatedly promised to restore the union restrictions after the war, but now even the laborers do not ask for this, knowing that England's foreign trade can not be maintained without increasing production and reducing cost. On the other hand, employers are beginning to see the economy of high wages, when the laborers are willing to do their best. Everybody calls for efficient management, and it looks as though the Taylor system and similar schemes, rejected by union labor in the United States, might become important in the rehabilitation of European industry. Even in soviet Russia we find Lenin preaching the advantages of scientific management.

Among the many plans for reconstruction in England the most complete are those of the Liverpool Fabian Society and of the Garton Foundation. The former of these demands maintenance of wages, labor exchanges, unemployment insurance, and the like, but no marked approach towards socialism. Even in his New Charter, Sidney Webb does not ask for anything more socialistic than workshop committees or shop stewards, and national joint councils of employers and employed for each industry. The Garton Foundation, of which the Hon. A. J. Balfour was a trustee, goes almost as far as this, and two committees of the British Association for the Advancement of Science agree in the main with their proposals.

The reports of the Whitley Committee, of which Professor S. J. Chapman and Mr. J. A. Hobson were members, take strong ground in favor of joint standing industrial councils, not for the purpose of introducing an element of state interference, but to encourage the voluntary settlement of industrial disputes, and to set up joint representative bodies which can speak for the industries as a whole, expressing the joint opinion of employers and workers.

Altogether, the British proposals, though far reaching in their character, favoring more democracy in industry, and calling for a considerable degree of state activity, recognize clearly the necessity of doing justice to capital as well as to labor, if industry is to be established on a sound and permanent basis and the British Isles are to retain their primacy in foreign commerce.

A striking exception to this rule is the draft report on Labor and the New Social Order, submitted by the Executive Committee of the British Labor Party at the Nottingham Conference, January 23-25, 1918, and widely heralded in the United States as the voice of the British workman.

This report, which reads like an apocalypse, predicts the end of present European civilization and the speedy coming of the New Jerusalem. It bids goodbye to the old order, waves the private capitalist off the stage, and hails the coming of a "genuinely scientific reorganization of the Nation's industry on the basis of the common ownership of the means of production and the sharing of the proceeds among all who participate." Such thoroughgoing reconstruction from the bottom up will, as its protagonists hope and believe, cause "a great bound onward in the Nation's aggregate productivity"; but if not, they will have the satisfaction of blaming themselves alone.

The British Labor Party may wear the clothes of the British workman, but its voice is the voice of German state socialism. However, the party won seventy-five seats in the elections of December 14, 1918—a great gain over their former representation of thirty-eight. For all that, it is a far cry to the social revolution.

The Sinclairs and Jimmie

JIMMIE HIGGINS. By Upton Sinclair. New York: Boni and Liveright.

THE French critic Régis Michaud has found room for a study of Upton Sinclair in his recent "Mystiques et Réalistes Anglo-Saxons." But for the company of Jack London (romancier de l'énergie américaine) he might feel some awkwardness in appearing on the same bill with Emerson and Pater and Henry James as well as Mrs. Wharton. M. Michaud sees him in his place there as "the Zola of the United States." His books, whatever they may lack, are "touffus, emphatiques, pleins à éclater d'information et de petits faits selon la formule naturaliste." Moreover, like Zola, this socialist who began as a romancer has never outgrown, even in the most realistic of his works, a certain lyrical and sentimental bent. He can never let well enough alone, never stop at the right point in his eloquence or his satire, never cease jumbling crude fact and passionate fancy, never, with the great artists, succeed in transfiguring without falsifying reality. All this has been said repeatedly by American criticism, which for the rest would agree with M. Michaud that Mr. Sinclair's work, for all its defects as art, is of immense documentary value, "d'un véritable intérêt historique."

This last is true in a special sense of his latest exhibit, "Jimmie Higgins." Here is an immense mass of data, the "little facts" of American life in our own time, the searching and dramatic time just past, or passing. They are facts upon the plane of the observer's peculiar experience and interest, facts concerning the proletariat, "the people" of America: at their toil, at their play, in their strife as a class against other classes. This is usual; what is not usual is our sense, during the first third of the narrative, of being permitted to observe these people, their sufferings, their virtues, their aspirations, their faults, with sympathy and yet without undue bias. We seem almost to be finding a clear path: if we have not yet set foot on it, our guide is confident of his landmarks, and presently. . . . Presently there is a shrill cry, and we perceive that the thing he has been carrying under his arm is a folding soap-box, and that he has suddenly mounted it, here in the open; and so an end of our inquiring ramble and our hoped-for path. Once again our worst suspicions are confirmed. The world is a muddle and a mess. All rich men are tyrants and profiteers, mean of spirit and filthy of habit; all poor men are venerable and honest, pure of heart and desirous only of their modest place in the sun; which in the end they will probably have to take by force.

However, we have had those first hundred pages, with their portrait of Jimmie, and may well be grateful for them. They are enough to justify the author in thinking this his best book. Jimmie is an insignificant atom of the industrial and social system, except as he represents a Cause. We see him through the eyes of that visiting Socialist candidate who stumbles on him in Leesville: "A bowed, undernourished little man, with one shoulder lower than the other, a straggly brown moustache stained with coffee, and stumpy black teeth, and gnarled hands into which the dirt and grease were ground so deeply that washing them would be obviously a waste of time. His clothes were worn and shapeless, his celluloid collar was cracked and his necktie was almost a rag. You would never have looked at such a man twice on the street—and yet the candidate saw in him one of those obscure heroes who are making a movement which is to transform the world." Jimmie has taken a wife out of a brothel and made her a good mother of three children. He is a hard worker, a steady enough citizen, and the handy man of the Leesville "Local." He has an ardent faith in his kind (that is, his class) and in their eventual control of the world through orderly means. Already he feels himself a part of a new world order, with his host of comrades in Germany and France and Russia whom no petty cause of national passion or interest can sunder. Then of course comes the war, and the spectacle of German socialism hailing the Day of the Kaiser, not of humanity; of Local Leesville torn by racial controversy; of American industrial life diverted to the channels of war. Socialism, that mild counsel of perfection, has failed, and there remains a single choice for Jimmie's kind—surrender to the ancient fetters of class domination and to the sacrifice of the many for the convenience of the few, or joining the forces which plot for a violent overthrow of whatever is. Jimmie tries everything, is tried by everything: the insidious bribery of the war-wage; a revulsion towards the anti-war methods of sabotage and secret propaganda which he presently discovers to be pro-German; washing his hands of it all by turning hobo . . . and finally enlisting under the flag of America because he feels at last that her victory is tied up with all hope for the world's future.

Here, as we have outlined it, is the substance of a moving and a true story, which might be lifted without the change of a word from the larger bulk of the narrative—"separated" without loss of a single rich particle, as cream is separated from milk. We should have this human Jimmie, with his dreams, his toil, his griefs, his ultimate sacrifice of the treasured class-consciousness to something larger if vaguer than class: we should feel him as in his way typifying the pain, the doubts, the courage, the hopes of these last confounding years. The artist in Mr. Sinclair knows and shows him, with not a little skill, with not a little tenderness. But the other people in Mr. Sinclair, the Socialist, the reformer, yes, the muck-raker, would not put up with this. Great Heavens! are we to forget what dubious forces lie behind this war, quite outside of Germany? Are we to lose sight of the fact that the capitalists are at their old game, under the shadow of war? Shall we fail to mention the abuses of the police system and the possible brutalities of military discipline? Shall we leave our Jimmie, bound up with all this rotten fabric, anything to hope for or live for—or die for unless as a pitiful item of protest "from the weak side"? Not if most of the Mr. Sinclairs know it. There is a melodramatist among them who is really their chosen spokesman. It is he who brutally murders Jimmie's wife and babies, who contrives and executes and gloats over unnamable vengeance on the young and foul-living capitalist of the story, who makes Jimmie out to have been the chief hero at Château-Thierry, and thereafter (lest we rejoice) ships him off to Archangel and has him tortured to madness by the American authorities as a pro-Bolshevist.

H. W. BOYNTON

An Autonomous Albania

ALBANIA PAST AND PRESENT. By Constantine A. Chekrezi. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THE reputed dead nations are rising again, right and left, and some of them are very lively corpses. But among these the Albanians can hardly be reckoned, for, mostly under the name Arnauts, they have been known as soldiers of fortune everywhere in the Levant. Mehemet Ali of Egypt was one, and the readers of Sir Richard Burton's books will remember occasional references to "Arnauts and other ruffians." Mr. C. A. Chekrezi's book about them and their country professes to be the first written by an Albanian, and the claim is probably correct. The Albanian always has been a man of deeds and not of written words; even his ballad-notes have been few, and Scanderbeg's "bit of treason with the Scribe" was characteristic for his attitude to letters. The earlier part of Mr. Chekrezi's book is compilation, greatly from the Britannica article—some sentences verbatim; but the later part, from the Turkish revolution down, and especially from 1912, when Albanian autonomy was perforce recognized by Turkey, is a contemporary document of high value. Not that we are to take the author as an unbiased witness; he is far from that. Much he does not tell, and what he does tell is highly colored with lurid adjectives and adverbs. The great enemy is Greece; but Serbia, Montenegro and Bulgaria are nearly as bad; Italy is a friend, but to be watched. Yet he does give a feeling for the whole unhappy Balkan situation, with its millennial history of ruthless wars of extermination and its unescapable prospect of wars and yet wars to come. These were no wars of kings but of peoples, and through them there echo the lines,

Once there was the People,
And it made a hell of earth.

To deal with them a League of Nations would need to have behind it the Chancery of Heaven and would certainly come to have a fellow-feeling for the tribulations of the Unspeakable Turk.

More hopeful is the story of the Albanian colonies in foreign lands and especially in Italy and the United States. There they have turned to the arts and crafts of peace, and the swashbuckler of the Levant is a mechanic in New England. Hopeful, too, is the fact that the Albanians, like all soldiers of fortune, are of an easy disposition in point of religion. The greater number of them have, to suit their own ends, embraced Islam—they are the only European race of which this largely holds—but it sits lightly and has not changed their national attitudes. Their non-Moslem kin are still their kin and even the Porte recognized that a Moslem Arnaut was still an Arnaut. The internationalism of Islam for once failed to work. But this same indifference has been an element in rousing against them the enmity of the other more perfervid Balkan races. Already marked as the household troops of Abd al-Hamid, they stayed out of the great rising against the Turks, and naturally, when all was over, the victorious allies turned upon them.

Yet some kind of autonomous Albania is coming, if not come, and there Mr. Chekrezi's book should do good service. With it should be taken, however, the Britannica article written in 1908 by J. D. Bouchier and chapter ix in the "Turkey in Europe" of "Odysseus" (Sir Charles Eliot). They are in many ways infinitely more exact. And why does Mr. Chekrezi call a mufti an archbishop? That is wilder than even the usual oddities of the Christian Levantine, pronouncing on Islam.

Dante and Moslem Mystics

LA ESCATOLOGIA MUSULMANA EN LA DIVINA COMEDIA. Por D. Miguel Asín Palacios. Madrid: Estanislao Maestre.

OF the many ways on which East and West meet one of the commonest of all is the pleasant path of story-telling. To the Story all the world is open; there are no barriers of politics or race or language or religion. The Story is truly catholic and because the Buddha's life made a good story he stood for a time as a saint on the Roman calendar. Through every age and along every road stories have worked their way. It might be only as mere folk-lore elements seeping through, carried by the unconscious memories and tongues of the people, or it might be by true literary tradition, the magnificent conveyers stealing in full consciousness their brooms ready made. And when these latter tales have reached us only in broken-down fragments, used and re-used and again returned to a life on the lips of the people, it is hard to tell whether they are simple folk-lore or were once literature.

We all know how in the Arabian Nights, the "Magic Horse" is the "Cléomedès" of Adenet le Roi, Camaralzaman and Budur are Peter of Provence and the fair Magalona, and Tawaddud is the Doncella Teodor of the Spanish folk-tale and Lope de Vega's comedy. Not so well known is it that the Cave Xa Xa in the "Deutsche Volksbücher" goes far back through Italy to the East and to our Aladdin of the Lamp and the "Nights," that the legend of Virgilius the Magician is modeled on that of Avicenna and that the "old captive" who told the tale of Aucassin carried over from popular Arabic the form of the cante-fable, just as Straparola conveyed from more "refined" Arabic his ambiguous sonnets. The relation, again, of "Ali Baba" to "Simeliberg" and other German and Slavonic stories in Grimm is evidently by folk-lore only.

In so many ways and along so many paths the story-telling East has come to the West. But it is no such simple connection and relation that Professor Asín essays to demonstrate in the case of the Divina Commedia. With him the Story is the garment of theology, philosophy and the vision of the mystic. For more than twenty years his studies have led him along these paths in Islam, and it is largely through his publications that students of the philosophical theology of mediæval Europe now recognize the great influence exerted by Moslem thinkers, lasting even into the pragmatism of our own time. The vague Averroism, of which the histories of philosophy used to speak, has been indefinitely clarified, both as to its Plotinian origin and its Thomist effects, and names of theologians and their books, systems, and threads of influence have sprung into the light in almost bewildering detail. On the other side the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas has come again to its own, and it is not now possible to dismiss him with "the schoolmen" in a contemptuous phrase. As we find our modern questionings in Plato, so, too, we may find them in the Summa. Aquinas was struggling with the eternally put and eternally unanswered problems of ultimate human thought. In 1914 Asín, in a note (p. 120) to his "Abenmassa y su Escuela," a study of the origin of the mystical Spanish-Moslem philosophy and perhaps the best introduction to the whole subject, drew attention to some curious parallels of expression in Dante. It was natural, therefore, that when he looked for a theme of broad human interest to use in his Discurso on being received into the Royal Spanish Academy he should turn to Dante. The result is this book.

His thesis, then, is that Dante was no exclusive Thomist; but in philosophy was a mystical eclectic with strong leanings to Averroism and still stronger to the Spanish-Moslem mystic, Ibn Arabi. He thus explains the placing of Siger of Brabant in Paradise and, indeed, the whole structure of the Divina Commedia. But his proof is not so much philosophical, like that of Bruno Nardi on the same question, as storiological; it consists in tracing the origin of elements, broad and minute, in Dante's narratives and descriptions to preceding Moslem accounts of visits to the regions beyond the grave. This he does in the most astonishing detail and with the most bewildering apparent success, in both points contrasting brilliantly with his predecessor, E. Blochet. It would be hopeless to attempt here to give any idea of this overwhelming detail. It makes the book by far the most complete study of Moslem eschatology which has yet appeared, and henceforth all Arabists will have to make use of it on that subject. And this value will remain, however much the Dantists—no peaceful folk—may arise and smite Professor Asín as a rash invader of their realm. He begins with Mohammed's Night Journey and Ascent to heaven and analyzes for the first time the different recensions of this legend. He then takes up the additional stories which occur in the theological commentaries on this legend and, in still greater detail, the later adaptations of it, mostly allegorical and mystical. Here the connection is made with Ibn Arabi, a mystic of the first rank, who had visions—real, or symbolical and allegorical—based on the Ascent of the Prophet. The parallels with the Commedia, both as to incidents and idea, even to the use of a Beatrice, a beloved lady as heavenly guide, and the Mystical Rose of Paradise and the whole impassioned spirituality of the conception, are so worked out that the hypothesis, to be sound, evidently requires a close contact between Ibn Arabi and Dante. Further, there has survived in Arabic at least one purely literary imitation of the Ascent by Abu-l-Ala al-Ma'arri. This is almost a travesty—at least an unbelieving use for literary purposes—of the religious legend, but it, too, furnishes an interesting quota of "sources" or accidental coincidences. From all these the topography of the Commedia is worked out; the four-fold division of Limbo, Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise is found in Islam, but Professor Asín rather over-emphasizes the status of Limbo. Moslem theologians are still as dubious upon it as were those of Christendom in Dante's time; it is certainly not of faith. He finds Lucifer, too, plunged and held fast in the middle of the earth and supporting it; but that is a hard strain on his Arabic texts. The best to be said is that in this and in some other elements Dante must have seen the possibilities in certain concrete Moslem details and have developed a meaning for them. Very dubious, too, in point of Arabic, is the Moslem source found (pp. 28, 38, 64) for the "little torch . . . coronal" in Par. xxiii, 94, and the Arabic parallel (p. 10) to Inf. iii, 26, 28, indicates only the howling of dogs, either real or metaphorical.

But what of the so-called precursors of Dante, whence did they draw their material? Here Asín brings out the curious fact that it was only in the twelfth century that these legends assume distinct form. That there was then a sudden leap in their development which European investigators, such as Graf, have been quite unable to explain. There are traces, for example, of the Seven Sleepers as far back as Gregory of Tours who used a Latin version of a Syriac text of their legend (p. 281), but it was more than six centuries before such legends of sleepers suddenly began to appear in Europe. So, too, with the visions of Tundal, Alberic, etc., and with St. Patrick's Purgatory. Details in the voyage of St. Brendan, e. g., the whale-island with trees growing on it, he finds already in Jahiz, who died in 869. Here the difficulty, of course, is that those Irish Imrama are claimed by Celtists and used by them as a foundation for Celtic mythology. The question might also be raised as to what extent the Celts and Jahiz, for example, were not all drawing on the great reservoir of common folk-lore which antedates everything. But, however that may be, the sudden outburst, in the twelfth century at the earliest, of such voyages, experiences, and visions must be explained, and Asín has certainly produced an immense mass of evidence pointing towards Islam as the source.

But, as to Dante, a persistent question remains. If he was so deeply affected not only as to details but as to the whole structure of his poem and as to the essential culminating ecstasy in the Paradiso by Moslem influences and especially by the system of Ibn Arabi, how have we no slightest hint of this, either in his life or in any express words of the poem? Asín develops very fully the different ways in which Moslem learning might have reached Dante, especially through Brunetto Latini. But have we any positive evidence as to how it did? We have the mysterious station of Siger of Brabant beside St. Thomas in Paradise; we have Saladin, Avicenna and Averroes in Limbo, but the description of Averroes, "who the great comment made," does not suggest deep knowledge; we have Mohammed and Ali among the schismatics in Hell. Again, there can be no shadow of doubt that Ibn Arabi's mystical odes, with their heroine and two-fold meaning and commentary in self-defense do most powerfully suggest Dante's "Canzoni" and "Convivio" and move into new light the whole question of the "dolce stil nuovo." But why, then, is Ibn Arabi not somewhere in Paradise or, at least, in Limbo? These questions are for the Dantists to answer, who know elaborately Dante's environment. Professor Asín's mass of evidence, though it may be criticized in details, has left the case with them and they can not evade it. They and the Celtists are now to be heard from. But it may already be said that the coincidences are too many and too close to be explained away by common sources, Biblical, ecclesiastical or classical, or through elements of broad pre-historic folk-lore. The question comes down to this—How can we bridge from Ibn Arabi to Dante?

An English translation is already in preparation.

D. B. MACDONALD

The Run of the Shelves

IN the advertising pages at the end of his "Beyond Life" (McBride), Mr. James Branch Cabell makes the amusing experiment of quoting all the most unfavorable comments on his earlier books that American newspaper criticism could be made to yield. This reversal of the publishers' custom really shows courage, for though we all know that the Squantum Journal's or Podunk News-Leader's opinion of a piece of literature is naught, we are so accustomed to be fed with their encomiastic phrases that it is a shock to find there can be books they do not look upon as masterpieces. Mr. Cabell is not a quiet writer, he has more than a touch of the preciosity which the nineties esteemed and the present hour rather signally distrusts. Attitudes as well as objects and qualities have a value for him; it is plain that he does not see why the word pose need be said with a sneer. Therefore it is quite natural that a newspaper lad or lass who spontaneously adores the latest models, from "O. Henry" to Will Irwin, should be put out by this writer who is not satisfied with obvious ideas and plain United States. And Mr. Cabell is irritating. The idea and structure of the present book as a whole are of too patent an artifice. After all, there is health in our modern notion of whimsy—that it must go with a rush, as an ebullition and not a contrivance however artfully planned and adjusted. The mincing and supercilious novelist, John Charteris, who is supposed to utter the greater part of these pages in the form of a midnight or all-night monologue, is a somewhat distressing person. He serves, at least, as stalking-horse for a witty if eccentric commentary on modern life and letters. "It is well enough," he says, for example, "that 'earnestness' should have its little hour along with the ukelele, just as the a 'red-blooded reversion to primal instincts' coincided in its fleet vogue with that other parlor-game called pingpong, and in the remote era of progressive-euchre parties pretty much everything was 'subtle' and 'perverse' and 'fiery-colored.' . . . 'Ah, yes, but just what, precisely, is my reaction to this?' is considered nowadays, I am informed, the correct attitude towards art and life alike, among all really earnest thinkers." Whether one likes its gesture or not, there is substance in this book.

"Robbia Heraldry," by Allan Marquand, is of more general appeal than the title would indicate. It includes all coats of arms on monuments by the Della Robbia school. In all 392 are registered, and 277 pictures. These arms often afford dates, and are useful in classifying the monuments. Such is the primary intention of a work of solid scholarship, which is carried through with Prof. Marquand's characteristic thoroughness and good taste. The coats of arms are frequently medallions or rectangular plaques, beautifully enameled, and made to be set in the walls of public buildings. The shields are often enwreathed with colored garlands of flowers, foliage, and fruit. By their handling of these incidentals, the various members of the Robbia family may be distinguished. Indeed, Prof. Marquand finds that even the punctuation of inscriptions is individual and valuable for attributions. Where a coat of arms appears incidentally on a larger composition, the entire monument is reproduced. So the illustrations cover pretty broadly the work of the Robbia clan. As affording many exquisite examples of elaborate heraldic design, often with inscriptions, the book will be useful to sculptors, architects, and decorative draughtsmen generally. It is a beautifully made quarto in the familiar format of the Princeton Monographs in Art and Archaeology. (Published by Princeton University Press.)

By far the greater part of the matter in George Moore's forthcoming "Avowals," to be issued for private circulation next month by Boni and Liveright, is new. Perhaps the world has pretty well traveled over Moore's mind, but he keeps remembering things about his Paris days which he hasn't told before or wants to tell again from a new angle. The world, apparently, rather likes being told.

An historical work which bears every mark of lasting merit is William Harbutt Dawson's "The German Empire, 1867-1914." It is in two substantial volumes, to appear this week under the imprint of the Macmillan Company; it offers a scholar's matured consideration of his field.

American curiosity about the literature of Spain will soon be able to satisfy itself by means of "Outlines of Spanish Literature," by J. D. M. Ford, Smith Professor of French and Spanish at Harvard, to be issued by Holt. The book will possess at least one advantage over Ticknor's monumental work—it will bring the story down to the present brilliant group of writers for whom the American public is acquiring a taste.

Mark Twain was indisputably Mark Twain in 1870-1871, the period of the sketches from the Galaxy and the Buffalo Express which Messrs. Boni and Liveright were quite justified in reprinting. The "Curious Republic of Gondour," which extends its title like an awning over the whole volume, supplies the subject for only one of its seventeen divergent sketches. Mark Twain is there with his air of a fallen cherub (not strictly in the Miltonic import of the phrase), his effect of sapience in fatuity or fatuity in sapience, his bearing as of a wise man whose wisdom, after the fashion of a hat, has been accidentally mislaid for the time being. The quality varies of course. In the remark: "When I say that I have never composed but one poem in all the long third of a century that I have lived, persons who know me will be sincerely grateful," he is purveying journalism with the customary salts. But he is wholly himself in this account of a boy who has incurred the wrath of an energetic father:

"I kind of dodged, and the boot-jack broke the looking-glass. I could have waited to see what became of the other missiles if I had to, but I took no interest in such things."

Ignoring Modern Music

DOES a public indifference to modern music discourage the professional musician from performing it, or does the professional musician neglect modern music from either a personal prejudice or a mistaken notion of what the public wants? According to its initial announcement, the New Symphony Orchestra, of New York, was organized for the commendable purpose of supplying a medium through which the contemporary musician could reach the public. Why then, one wonders, did this organization abandon its original policy in favor of the stereotyped programme presented by it at its second concert? We had expected to hear Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," and instead, we were offered Brahms' C minor Symphony, Debussy's "Faun" and the "Tannhäuser" Overture. The fact that Mr. Arthur Bodanzky's reading of Brahms' Symphony marked him as one of the two finest symphonic conductors in this country to-day was scarcely adequate compensation. Patently, Brahms' C minor Symphony, Debussy's "Faun" and the "Tannhäuser" Overture are of greater intrinsic importance than Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem": the point is that we have a half dozen or more orchestras playing these compositions for us season after season, whereas Mr. Loeffler's work, composed approximately a dozen years ago, has had, in so far as my memory serves me, only one performance in New York.

In earlier times, when orchestras and great soloists were far less numerous than they are now, it was obviously essential to discriminate in favor of music upon which the consensus of the best opinion had set its mark of approval. It was of more importance that the public should become familiar with Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, and Wagner than that it should be kept abreast of the extraordinary developments of the music of the last quarter of a century. But surely, under conditions obtaining to-day, there is room for a judicious exposition of modern music. Is it to remain unheard by our generation? Are we to be allowed no opportunity to familiarize ourselves with the wealth of harmonic development that has marked the progress of music from César Franck down to the immediate present?

There are in this country at the present time at least a dozen orchestras of admirable capacity. The country is literally overrun with pianists and violinists of pre-eminent quality. Never, perhaps, in the records of music were the opportunities for the exposition of musical talent as great as they are to-day. And yet the contemporary composer is ignored. By this I do not mean that an occasional novelty does not find a place on the programmes. Take the Philharmonic, for example. No good end could be served by placing American composers upon a programme haphazardly. The cause of American music may have been hindered by this policy of indiscriminate exploitation.

No doubt some one will say, Who shall determine what shall and what shall not be performed? Well, it is fairly obvious that if a man has sufficient musicianship to qualify as a first-rate conductor or pianist, he must possess some capacity for determining the essential importance of a composition. In the case of a composer of established reputation, a negligible piece of work possesses the historical interest of its relation, however incongruous, to the greater works of its creator; but what justification can there be for giving a sterile imitation of Debussy? I am concerned with our neglect of men of a more or less established significance—Mr. Gilbert, for example, whose "Dance in Place Congo" I can not sufficiently praise. How shall we expect that Mr. Gilbert will try to progress, considering that the Metropolitan Opera House neglects to include this piece in its repertoire? Certain reviewers urged the importance of this work upon the consideration of the Metropolitan management, which, for some reason known only to itself, saw fit to retain, instead, Mr. Cadman's vacuous and banal "Shanewis." I am not sure that Mr. Gilbert is not the most competent musician that this country has produced, but I should not blame him if he had become somewhat discouraged.

No doubt Mr. Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stransky, of the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Gabilowitch, of Detroit, present their audiences with the works that are, to the best of their ability to judge, most representative of contemporary tendencies. The point I would make is that the intentions of these men are hampered by a kind of obligation that they feel they are under to supply a more or less stereotyped kind of programme. Tradition, on the one hand, and box-office receipts, on the other, exercise their restraining influence. The result is obvious. Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, and Tchaikovsky continue to be played year in, year out; Delius, D'Indy, Loeffler, Scriabin, and the less familiar work of Debussy, such as "La Mer" and "Iberia," are almost neglected. As a result, not only the public, but the professional musician as well, is prevented from acquiring that degree of familiarity with a piece of music which is absolutely essential to forming a just estimate of it. Gabilowitch once told me that he never allowed himself to form an opinion of a new work from one hearing of it. He knows that he can not appreciate a musical composition unless he considers it with the utmost care. If such a musician admits this inability, we can hardly expect the average audience, ninety per cent. of which has no technical training, to form any estimate whatsoever. Consequently, works that might become popular in their generation, if they were given often enough, remain practically unrevealed to the public. Grainger's suite, "In a Nutshell," is an instance in point. With all that may be said against Grainger (and I am compelled to count myself an affectionate enemy of most of his preposterous idiosyncracies), the fact remains that the "Nutshell" is one of the most original and entertaining compositions of its kind that has been written in modern times. It is rhythmically vivid, melodically interesting, harmonically beautiful. (Observe the closing pages of the second and third movements.) I can not believe that the public would not enjoy this work if it heard it often enough to become familiar with it. Instead, the work was performed at one pair of Philharmonic concerts in March, 1917, and has not been heard since. Under such conditions, we can not determine whether this particular composition or any other piece of contemporary music is important or negligible.

Some time ago, I very respectfully suggested to Leo Ornstein's manager that perhaps it was a mistake to make Ornstein play Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Rubinstein, etc., to the neglect of Ravel, Debussy, Scriabin, and Ornstein himself. I was told that Ornstein's earning capacity had increased between fifty and seventy-five per cent. since he abandoned his preference for modern music and returned to the conventional Bach, Chopin, Beethoven programme. The thing that is regrettable is that the thankless effort of popularizing modern music should be left to the younger musicians, who are, in the nature of the case, incapable of commanding a public consideration for novelty. Would it not seem as though established musicians like Josef Hofmann, Paderewski, Gabilowitch, and Kreisler were almost under obligation to abandon the stereotyped formality of their programmes? Season after season, Mr. Hofmann plays in New York, and Carnegie Hall is sold out. And what does Mr. Hofmann play? A Beethoven sonata (the "Moonlight" or the "Appassionata"); a Chopin nocturne (and of all Chopin nocturnes, the one in E flat, Opus 9); a Liszt composition—in short, the kind of programme we have been hearing for the last twenty-five years. Mr. Hofmann is a very great pianist, the greatest, it may be, the world has ever known. It is natural we should be curious to hear his interpretation of Debussy, Ravel, etc. Does Mr. Hofmann contend that in all the great mass of music that has been written since Chopin and Liszt there is nothing worthy of his attention? Did piano music cease for Mr. Paderewski when Liszt penned his last rhapsody? Can Mr. Gabilowitch blame us if we suffer a bitter disappointment at the prospect of another one of his Schumann-Chopin recitals? And why does not Mr. Harold Bauer—who gives us more varied programmes, as a rule, than the majority of pianists give us—progress beyond a repetition of Debussy's "Estampes," "La Cathédrale engloutie" and "Les Collines d'Anacapri"? The bulk of the piano music of Debussy, D'Indy, Ravel, Ornstein, Scriabin, and Scott is practically undiscovered for the public. Can we not persuade Mr. Hofmann or Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabilowitch to give to this music the attention which it manifestly deserves?

CHARLES L. BUCHANAN

Drama

"The Jest," "39 East" and "A Little Journey"

AMERICAN managers are so successful in making the play a screen rather than a dais for the playwright that I was actually turning into the Plymouth Theatre before I grasped the fact that the "Jest" was the well-known "Cena delle Beffe" of Benelli. I had read it in Italian, and recalled the beauty of its diction through the sombreness of its catastrophes, like the Bay of Naples livid in some outpour of Vesuvius. At the Plymouth, it is not so good; in the transition from Italian to English, from the page to the stage, the leakage on the side of literature is considerable. The main motive is rather simple. Jest darkens into malignity in one of those ruffians who passed for nobles in the uncritical Italy of the Renaissance. It is matched and overmatched, in the person of the painter who is his victim, by malignity crisping into jest. Perhaps the subtlest, though not the most stirring, moment of the play as acted in English is the opening narrative, in which the painter lays bare to us that moral abasement of physical weakness before physical strength in which human nature reveals to us at one stroke its humanness and its irrationality.

After this the psychology is obvious. With the possible exception of the painter's forbearance with Ginevra, there is nothing further in the play which one would be distressed to explain to Mr. Rupert Hughes or Mr. Owen Davis or Mr. Jules Goodman. It is a contest of the vulpine with the leonine, or, even less, with the ursine, wherein the fox bears off the mixed honor and disgrace of a facile, though insidious, victory. The craft is not Mephistophelian. Too often in plays of cunning it is only the success of the plots that apprises us of their brilliancy. Neri, the bully, is artistically stupid. A double ration of brains to the dupe would have doubled both the dupe's humiliation and the triumph of his adversary. It is the wit in us that smarts at our folly, as it is the virtue in us that bleeds at our sin.

The dramatic summit of the play is the end of Act II, where the painter, having fastened the charge of insanity upon his enemy, with all the ignominies inseparable from that charge in an age without insight and without pity, insults him almost within earshot of the woman whom the trick has wrested from his talons. Triumph can go no further, and the play should end. Unfortunately, the clock points only to half-past nine, and an unsated audience, which reckons its pennies by seconds in the theatre, is insistent on its money's worth. In the third act we have trills and quavers, variations on the original theme, and, at last, a preparation for the reascend for which the fourth and final act imperatively calls. A new contrivance makes the ruffian the inadvertent slayer of his own brother. The brother's concern in this act is negligible, though one suspects that it may have interested him; we are quite engrossed with its effect on Neri. That effect is presumably inadequate. The penal value of remorse clearly depends on the dominance in its subject of that human feeling the defect or destitution of which in Neri has been one of the capital points in Benelli's exposition. It is difficult to rehabilitate a climax.

The brothers Barrymore monopolize the interest of the acting; the other parts are acceptably taken, except where the itching to be powerful is consumptive of power. With all respect to Mr. Lionel Barrymore, I think the addition of bestiality to inhumanity in Neri was a mistake. We were prepared for the ursine; the porcine is too much. What do we want in an Italian miscreant? Plainly, polish in wickedness—a poniard in which, if the blade be dipped in venom, the haft is set with mother-of-pearl. Shakespeare did not put his Caliban in Naples, much less in Florence; he relinquished that novelty to Mr. Lionel Barrymore.

Mr. John Barrymore was successful in his impersonation of the painter who was hare and fox at the same time, first cowering and then crouching or couchant. It was this mixture that gave quality to his portrayal. The nervelessness of the first act gave point to the ensuing tensions, and one remembers (or imagines) a border of weariness and disillusion that added meaning and relief to his vindictiveness. His signal, though infrequent, error was the attempt to rival Neri in brutality, an undertaking to which the Shakespearian "Nay, an thou'lt mouth, I'll rant as well as thou" might serve as placard. The contrast between himself and Neri was his weapon, and he erred in permitting that weapon even for a moment to dull its edge.

Playwrights, like other workers, are entitled to vacations, and no critic so friendly to Miss Rachel Crothers as myself would think of denying to her any perquisite of her guild. Employers, however, have long since regretfully observed that workmen are indisposed to spend their holidays in the workshop. Miss Crothers is peculiar in the fact that she is taking a vacation from the practice of drama at the Broadhurst Theatre in the play "39 East." I might vary the figure by saying with pointed literal truth and beautiful symbolic propriety that she is spending the vacation in Central Park in the rehearsal of a skirt dance under the stimulus of ginger ale. Acerbity itself can not say of "39 East" that it is ill made; it is not made at all; the unborn can not be the guilty. I will spare its pointless and plotless fable the harshness of a summary. The comfortable theory that anybody can do anything under sufficient provocation has given place to the still easier theory that anybody can do anything anyhow. Composition on these terms becomes delectable.

Good workmen, however, are prone to work a little even on their holidays, and wit and force will peep in at the window of Miss Crothers's play, no matter how roughly the door is slammed in their faces. "39 East" is inane, but it contains a half-act—the first half of Act I—which is delightful, and which reappears, in lessened afterglow, in the first part of the concluding act. The opening of the breakfast-table scene in the pretentious boarding-house, which, lying practically outside the plot, is secure from the infection of its limpness, has been handed over to expert and racy comedians. Miss Skipworth as Mrs. De Mailley, Mr. Alberni as Count Gionelli, Miss Friderici as the inimitable Miss McMasters, capture us from the start, and Mr. Sutherland as Timothy O'Brien, in spite of his Judge Pyncheon smile and his Laurence Boythorn laugh, adds himself preemptorily to the list of our conquerors. But the principals supervene. It is as difficult to exclude the principals from a play as the bridegroom from a wedding. Miss Constance Binney furnishes all the beauty and rather more than all the fatuity which a part, exigent in both particulars, requires. In his trivialities as Napoleon Gibbs Mr. Henry Hull is artistically sound and serious, but, in rising to moral seriousness, he sinks to artistic triviality.

The play imagines itself to be morally tonic, an idea wherein, if nowhere else, the strength of its imagination is demonstrable. The heroine is a girl whom a few weeks' stay in New York has divested of all the shielding scruples of the country, without endowing her with even a tittle of the protective knowledge of the town. The play vindicates imprudence. Probably three girls fall from imprudence for one who is betrayed by sensuality; yet plays in which sensuality flourishes are decried, while those in which imprudence prospers pass unscathed and brag of their virtue. Morality might sometimes echo the Spaniard who prayed: "May God deliver me from my friends; from my enemies I can defend myself."

New York is probably not eager for a Westerner's opinion on "A Little Journey," at the Vanderbilt Theatre, on which its own ratifying seal of nearly two hundred performances has been emphatically set. My conciseness will respect that probability. "A Little Journey" is not unlike "39 East." A series of plump and agile sketches is transformed, at a skillfully retarded but always premature moment, into a meagre and sluggish play. A group of pictures which independence might have made respectable are reduced to the footing of dependents and parasites by the fobbing-up of an arbitrary relation to a makeshift play. The idealisms are very tedious. I do not mind worldlings; I do not mind church: but I hate to go to church with a worldling.

O. W. FIRKINS

Artists and the War

LAST winter, at the Anderson Galleries in this city, there was an exhibition of paintings by British artists, paintings made at the front, authentic records of actual warfare. At present there is another such exhibition of the work of Canadian artists. England, France, Italy, Canada, Australia have made lasting memorials of the war and of their part in it. They have recognized that photography does not suffice and that if art is made to touch life and to come into contact with events, a great and inspiring record can be preserved. The United States sent a few illustrators to the front, one or two artists, such as S. J. Woolf—patriotic men who managed with great difficulty to get to the front and paint—but we missed the great chance of having contemporary records in art of St. Mihiel, Château-Thierry, and of the many other battles whose names will be an inspiration to future Americans. The lost opportunity can not by any possibility be regained, yet there still remains a chance, a vanishing chance, indeed, to do something of lasting value.

We have read recently that a $9,000,000 memorial edifice is to be erected in Washington. I wonder what this edifice is to contain. Is it to hold Liberty motors, photographs, rusty relics? There is still time, though little of it, to send some of our foremost artists abroad to paint from actual observation our historic battlefields, the life of our Army of Occupation on the Rhine, the scenes of war, the stupendous results of our efforts in engineering, railway building, hospital equipment, shipping, and all the other branches of our war activity.

While time's rapid hand is obliterating these records to a great degree, they still remain to an extent sufficient to make it greatly worth while to undertake what is here urged. Such pictures in a memorial building would serve two purposes. They would show, as photography can not do, the grim aftermath of war. Hoping for peace, our minds are beset to-day with endless problems. Is the League of Nations a League of Peace or is it a League of War? Who knows? When doctors disagree, how shall the ordinary man, the patient, know what is the remedy for the disease of war? One thing, however, is incontrovertible. Paintings of war's grim aftermath, of ruined orchards, of once fertile fields now masses of shell holes, of devastated villages, of tumbling churches, and all the wreck and destruction of war will be an object lesson to the eyes of future Americans, a warning as well as a reminder. So as an argument for peace, where peace can by any possibility be preserved, these paintings would constitute a most important record.

But there is another reason, and, indeed, a greater one. At a time when our allies were at the last ditch, their backs against the wall, we entered the conflict, and the tide of battle turned. It is well that future generations, not merely of Americans, but of the entire world, should remember what our country, without an army and without an organization, accomplished, and in how incredibly brief a time our great results were achieved, results which turned the scales of battle and determined the fate of the war. Such pictures would be reproduced in Sunday supplements and in magazines, not only in this country, but in Europe and would serve to remind the world at large, for many years to come, that America is a friend to be counted upon and a foe to be reckoned with. Treaties of peace are too long, too intricate, and complicated to be read by the average man. The treaty with Germany has finally been published after a great hullabaloo. How many men have read it from cover to cover? One in ten thousand? But the paintings of our part in the war would be a story clear and simple, so that he who runs would read. They would be an account for the average man of the war and of our part in it that would be a thing to be remembered.

Is it too late to send a dozen of our foremost painters to France? Can not a group of men be found who will be willing to furnish the small sum necessary to finance such a project? Hundreds of millions of dollars have been poured by us into the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., all to mitigate the suffering of war, but the war is over and memory is short. We forget that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Since our Government has failed to realize the invaluable services which art can render, may it not be hoped that the eyes of some Mæcenas will happen upon these words?

JAMES N. ROSENBERG

“Hold Fast That Which Is Good”

“The founders of the C-W Industry are still its controlling officers.

“The principles laid down by the founders are still the C-W principles.

“The needs of the electrical field and the problems of electrical engineering are now as always the cardinal consideration and the ceaseless study of the C-W organization.

“The continued dominance of the C-W product proves the correctness of C-W principles.”

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

Books Received

FICTION

- Bailey, H. C. The Gamesters. Dutton. $1.75.
- Begbie, Harold. The Convictions of Christopher Sterling. McBride. $1.50 net.
- Bonner, Geraldine. Miss Maitland, Private Secretary. Appleton. $1.50 net.
- Beresford, J. D. The Jervaise Comedy. Macmillan. $1.50.
- Browne, G. W. Ruel Durkee. Manchester, N. H.: Standard Book Company.
- Galsworthy, John. Saint's Progress. Scribner. $1.60 net.
- Haggard, H. R. When the World Shook. Longmans, Green. $1.60 net.
- Merrick, Leonard. Cynthia. With an Introduction by Maurice Hewlett. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Merrick, Leonard. The Actor-Manager. Introduction by W. D. Howells. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Tagore, Rabindranath. The Home and the World. Macmillan. $1.75.

- Vandérem, Fernand. Two Banks of the Seine. Dutton. $1.90 net.
- Williams, B. A. All the Brothers Were Valiant. Macmillan. $1.50.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

- Beck, J. M. The Reckoning. Hodder and Stoughton.
- Bond, B. W. The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies. Yale University Press. $3.00.
- Chekrezi, C. A. Albania, Past and Present. Macmillan. $2.25.
- Colcord, J. C. Broken Homes. Social Work Series. New York: Russell Sage Foundation. 75 cents net.
- Hall, F. S., and Brooke, E. W. American Marriage Laws in Their Social Aspects. New York: Russell Sage Foundation. $1.00 net.
- Hill, D. J. Present Problems in Foreign Policy. Appleton. $1.50 net.
- Morman, J. B. The Place of Agriculture in Reconstruction. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Nevinson, H. W. The Dardanelles Campaign. Holt. $5.00 net.

- Penty, A. J. Guilds and Social Crisis. London: Allen and Unwin.
- Robinson, C. E. New Fallacies of Midas. McBride. $2.00 net.
- Willcocks, M. P. Towards New Horizons. Lane. $1.25 net.
- Wilson, L. E. Community Leadership. New York: The American City Bureau.
- Wilson, Woodrow. International Ideals. Harper. $1.00 net.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

- A Christmas Garland. Woven by Max Beerbohm. Dutton. $2.00 net.
- Holmes, Roy J. War Stories. Crowell. $1.25 net.
- Keeling Letters and Recollections. Introduction by H. G. Wells. Macmillan. $4.00.
- Kummer, F. A. The Battle of the Nations: A Young Folks' History of the Great War. Century. $2.00.
- Millais, J. G. Life of Frederick Courtenay Selous. Longmans, Green. $6.00 net.
- Osborn, C. S. The Iron Hunter. Macmillan. $2.00.

TIFFANY & Co.

MEMORIAL AND SERVICE TABLETS OF BRONZE

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

The Addressing Problems of Industry

The addressing problems of industry are solved by the Belknap Addressing Machine.

Typewritten Addresses for All Your Lists

That is the modern way—the way of sure, prompt, 100 per cent. mail deliveries. In every office where a typewriter is used the Belknap Addressing Machine can be made to increase sales, double the day's work and save money.

If you value economy, accuracy and speed you will not hesitate to secure a Belknap Addressing Machine. It gives your literature that personal appeal which a typewritten address possesses. You wouldn't write your business correspondence in long hand—why write addresses that way? Banish the wasteful method.

Treat It As You Do Your Figures

Place this important work upon a basis of minimum expense—elevate it to its logical importance.

Systematize it with an error-proof machine that will save you the cost of twenty helpers, do neater work, assure prompter deliveries and obtain a more favorable audience.

No. 4 Rotary, on special stand. Speed increased to 1800 to 2000 per hour.

When you install a Belknap Addressing Machine, you get a service that means efficiency in every detail.

First, we study your requirements. Then we adapt the Belknap to fit those needs. We plan the handling and operating. We stay with you until the Belknap is actually saving you money by doing this mechanical work better and quicker than it can be done in any other way.

Your Typewriter is Your Stencil Cutter

The Belknap Fibrotype Stencil is the only one your stenographer can slip into her regular typewriter and cut without expensive equipment.

Our Reputation is Your Assurance of Satisfaction

For 35 years the Belknap Addressing mechanism has borne a large and responsible part of the commercial world's burden. It has in that time so capably conducted itself that—with all its numerous improvements—it stands today pre-eminently the most popular and widely used of all addressing machines.

Offices and Agencies in all Principal Cities

Rapid Addressing Machine Company "The Belknap System"
32-46 West Twenty-Third Street : : : : : : : : : : New York

Marie Bashkirtseff: The Journal of a Young Artist. Translated by Mary L. Serano. New and Revised Edition. Dutton. $2.50 net.

Osborn, E. B. The New Elizabethans. Lane. $4.00 net.

Roberts, S. C. The Story of Doctor Johnson. Putnam.

Ronges, J. Des Vignes. Bourru, Soldier of France. Dutton. $1.90 net.

Whitlock, Brand. Belgium. 2 volumes. Appleton. $7.50 net.

Wiggins, R. L. The Life of Joel Chandler Harris. Nashville, Tenn.: Smith & Lamar. $2.00 net.

EDUCATION

Century Readings for a Course in American Literature. Edited and Annotated by F. L. Pattee. Century. $2.50.

Dewey, Evelyn. New Schools for Old. Dutton. $2.00 net.

Dobbs, A. E. Education and Social Movements. Longmans, Green. $3.50 net.

Ponsonby, Arthur and Dorothea. Rebels and Reformers. Holt. $1.60 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Babbitt, Irving. Rousseau and Romanticism. Houghton Mifflin. $3.50 net.

Clemens, S. L. The Curious Republic of Gondour. Boni & Liveright. $1.25 net.

Pater, Walter. Sketches and Reviews. Boni & Liveright. $1.25 net.

Stone, W. M. The Divine and Moral Songs of Isaac Watts. Privately printed for the Triptych.

Symonds, J. A. Last and First: Two Essays. New York: Nicholas L. Brown. $1.50 net.

The Great Modern English Stories. An Anthology Compiled and Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Boni and Liveright. $1.75 net.

Van Dyke, Henry. The Valley of Vision: A Book of Romance and Some Half-Told Tales. Scribner. $1.50.

Walston, Sir Charles. Truth. Putnam.

MISCELLANEOUS

Booth, Evangeline, and Hill, G. L. The War Romance of the Salvation Army. Lip-pincott. $1.50 net.

Cable, Boyd. Air Men O'War. Dutton. $1.75 net.

Dubrule, Noëlia. Le Français Pour Tous. Ginn.

Hurd, Archibald. Italian Sea Power in the Great War. McBride. 50 cents net.

Pezet, A. W. Aristokia: Comedy in a Colony of Kings. Century. $1.50.

Shelby, Gertrude. How To Face Peace. Holt. $1.50 net.

The Hatchet of the United States Ship "George Washington." A reproduction of the daily newspaper published on the High Seas. Washington: Navy Relief Society. $2.00.

Wheeler, F. R. The Wonder of War at Sea. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard. $1.50 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Brunner, E. B. Bits of Background in One-Act Plays. Knopf. $1.00 net.

Sayers, D. L. Catholic Tales. McBride. $1.00 net.

Tree, Iris. Poems. Lane. $1.50 net.

Whitworth, Geoffrey. Father Noah and Other Fancies. McBride. $1.00 net.

The Oxford Book of Australasian Verse. Chosen by Walter Murdock. Oxford University Press.

Theis, Grover. Numbers and Other One-Act Plays. New York: Nicholas L. Brown. $1.35 net.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Dresser, H. W. On the Threshold of the Spiritual World. New York: George Sully and Company. $1.50 net.

Pope, R. M. An Introduction to Early Church History. Macmillan.

Swift, M. I. Can Mankind Survive? Boston: Marshall-Jones Company.

De Bunsen, Victoria. The War and Men's Minds. Lane.

SCIENCE

Flint, G. E. The Whole Truth About Alcohol. Macmillan. $1.50.

Murrill, W. A. The Naturalist in a Boarding School: The Natural History of Staunton, Virginia. Both published by the Author. $1.50 each.

Nelson, E. W. Wild Animals of North America. Wash.: Nat'l Geographic Society.

TEXTBOOKS

Briggs, T. H., and McKinney, I. A Second Book of Composition for High Schools. Ginn. $1.24.

Norton, H. R. A Textbook on Retail Selling. Ginn.

The Workers' Educational Association Year Book. 1918. Ginn.

Delano, J. A. American Red Cross Textbook on Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick. Blakiston. 60 cents.

THE REVIEW

135
1919

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 7

New York, Saturday, June 28, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	135
Editorial Articles:
Germany Submits	137
Root versus Knox	138
The Italian Imbroglia	139
Academe Unbends	140
Summer Reading	141
Debate on the League. By Harold de Wolf Fuller	142
The Example of British Labor. By J. Laurence Laughlin	143
The Republican Party's Opportunity. By L. F. Loree	144
Correspondence	146
Book Reviews:
Man's Immortal Fortitude	147
Geography and The War	147
Scholarly Realism on Eastern Europe	149
Two Ways of Faith. By H. W. Boynton	149
The Run of the Shelves	150
Mr. Yeats and Others. By O. W. Firkins	151
The British Press. By E. S. Roscoe	153
Anne Thackeray Ritchie. By B. U. Burke	154
Copyright, 1919, by The National Weekly Corporation.

GERMAN acceptance of the terms of peace was a certainty; the only question was whether it was to happen at once or after an interval fraught with fresh calamities. That the world was spared this experience is owing solely to the unyielding pressure of the Powers at Versailles. In the Nation of a week ago there appeared an article by Norman Angell, under the flaming title of "Child Massacre as a Political Weapon," protesting against the threat of renewal of the blockade in case Germany refused to sign. But that threat has been a chief, probably the chief, influence in preventing a renewal of the war. A Weimar dispatch states that the Socialists expressly based their acceptance of the terms upon the impossibility of getting the working people "to confront worse conditions through a renewal of the blockade and an advance of the Allied armies." Would it have been more humane to send the armies into Germany and get assent a month or two hence than to secure that assent now by the threat of a blockade? But perhaps Mr. Angell and the Nation think that Germany has a right to get what she wants by means of a hunger strike—an interesting view which might lead very far.

IN the cool rarefied air of the Harvard Commencement platform Senator Lodge remarked:

It is a melancholy reflection that the best assurance of the future peace of the world lies in the destruction of the German war power, which is worth all it cost.

Why is the reflection melancholy? The world is well rid of its worst nightmare. Irrespective of future arrangements, we have gained tremendously, in proving that the lust of universal empire is impossible. Whether or not the League of Peace is adopted, whether it works or not, no nation for a century is likely to repeat the German adventure. Germany's defeat is a lasting warning that the aggressor, however unrestrained by moral considerations, and with whatever superiority of military preparation, is in advance doomed. Bernhardt's dilemma "world power or downfall" (Weltmacht oder Niedergang) has been once for all settled, and settled right. Since our future benefits from the world war are highly speculative, it is well to remind ourselves hardheadedly of those great and enduring benefits which can not be taken away from us. Naturally we hope for more, but even if more should be denied, we agree with Mr. Lodge that the benefits in hand are worth all that has been paid for them.

THERE remained one untried ignominy for the German Navy. There now is none. The sinking of the surrendered fleet at Scapa Flow by the German officers is an act of singular treachery. They were treated as honorable persons, left in charge of their own ships, without British guards. In such a case, according to the law of war, the officers and crews are trustees of the surrendered vessel for the captors. The history of the sea shows very few cases in which this trust has been abused. The German officers who have planned or tolerated this treacherous act are, of course, liable to court martial and death. Their case is that of a commander who destroys his own ship. That the ship was interned does not alter the legal aspect of the case. What happens to these forsworn and dishonored officers does not greatly matter. At the moment when Germany is about to sign the peace treaty, they have done a good service in giving a startling demonstration of the worthlessness of any German promise the execution of which depends solely on German honor. As for Admiral Reuter, since German opinion seems to regard his dishonorable act as gallant and clever, it would be well to hale him before the ordinary courts and imprison him for criminal destruction of ships at sea. As a naval officer he deserves no consideration.

IT is cold comfort to say that the sinking of the interned German fleet solves a difficult problem. The ultimate disposition of the vessels was not an easy matter, and it was perplexity over this which doubtless led to the internment of the fleet, with only German caretakers aboard, instead of their surrender to the victorious Powers. It is painfully evident that some way should have been found to make the latter course possible. For it is not good to be outwitted even by an action that according to all naval tradition is essentially base and stupid. To the perpetrators of the act it can not be made to appear in that light. When Reynard the fox gets out of a tight place, by whatever means, he is a clever fellow in his own conceit and in that of all who accept his ethical code. Germany from the beginning has played Reynard the fox. She now of necessity agrees to everything, but she does it with complete mental reservation. Hereafter her whole energy will go to the search for opportunities to wriggle out, and it may be accepted as axiomatic that no hole is too small for her to crawl into. The Allies can not for a long time relax their vigilance without grave risk that Germany will duplicate Reynard's ultimate triumph in defeat.

THE little police raid at Juarez is an unwelcome reminder that we still have to do with Don Pancho Villa—and Mexico. We have prevented the Villistas and Carranzistas from fighting too near El Paso, in conformity with our general policy that neither Mexican regulars nor revolutionaries shall shoot across our border. The administration has never strongly objected to the intentional shooting of American citizens domiciled in Mexico, but it properly objects to the accidental shooting of our borderers in their own homes. One may admit the distinction without taking much comfort from it. The best feature of the case is that the army apparently acted on its own initiative without consulting Washington. These Mexican brawls require promptest action, and if it is generally understood that our army is on the trigger and unhampered by Washington, there will be fewer border raids. The difficulty remains that such irksome police duty can always be given the color of a political intervention. Villa, on his side, has once more put us in the position of supporters of reaction before his half-naked bandits. Meanwhile, the broader Mexican situation has been enlivened by the canard that England has asked the privilege of cleaning up Mexico as a mandatory. This absurd rumor has at least the merit of pointing out certain permanent features of the Mexican tangle, features which are not covered by persuading Don Pancho Villa to shoot south rather than north when he makes a diversion on the border.

NO better item of news has come over the cables for a long time than that which tells of President Wilson's decision to appoint a commission to investigate reported pogroms in Poland. If it be further true that the commission will be headed by Henry Morgenthau, our late ambassador to Turkey, and that two other members of the commission will be Jews, our grounds for satisfaction will be complete. Premier Paderewski requested the appointment of a commission and expressed the desire that its inquiry be thoroughgoing. Assurance to this effect could not be adequate unless the work of the commission were in large part in the hands of American Jews of the best type. Mr. Morgenthau's long and crucial experience at Constantinople, and the hold he has established on public confidence, gives the best guarantee that the findings of the commission will serve their purpose—that of establishing beyond reasonable cavil the essential truth of the matter. Details, of course, will always remain more or less in dispute. But the vital question, the question of the degree in which governmental connivance or negligence has been responsible for the atrocities, need not be left unsettled. And whatever the fact may prove to be, publication of the truth will be an effective protection against future outrages.

IT is no novelty for Senator Sherman to beat everybody else's record for silliness, but to beat his own is another matter. This difficult feat the gentleman from Illinois performed the other day in the wonderful speech in which he exposed the League of Nations as a scheme for putting the world under the rule of the Vatican and destroying religious liberty. The brilliancy of the idea is equaled by the convincingness of the arguments with which the distinguished Senator supported it. In this collection of jewels it is not easy to select the prize gem. But apparently the discovery that Mr. Sherman himself values most is that of the malign significance of President Wilson's visit to the Vatican, of which the Pope said in an interview:

President Wilson put the matter so clearly that my doubts began to melt, and before our interview closed I agreed with him on the main lines of his plan. The President struck me as being far more interested in his League of Nations than in fixing the frontiers of the newly created States.

"The great pontifical dignitary gives no random interviews," says Mr. Sherman, and who can deny the truth of this profound remark? Would that it were equally true that United States Senators make no random speeches, and that United States constituencies send no random specimens of the genus asinus to represent them in the Senate.

THE article contributed by Mr. L. F. Loree to the present number of the Review affords interesting evidence of the prominence which the issue of the establishment of a budget system has come to occupy in the minds of all men who have given serious study to the problems of our national finance and administration. It seems proper to mention that as regards the initiation of the budget Mr. Loree's view is at variance in an important particular with that presented by Mr. John T. Pratt in a recent number of the Review and held, we believe, by most advocates of the reform. Mr. Loree's ardent desire to "eliminate executive control, either direct or indirect," is doubtless responsible for his proposal that the budget should originate with the Ways and Means Committee of the House instead of being prepared in the first instance by an executive bureau. Mr. Loree's article as a whole will be read with interest as the vigorous utterance of a stalwart Republican whose standing as a railroad administrator is among the foremost. His statement concerning the record of the Republican party and its unique claim on the confidence of the country is a presentation, of course, of his own views, not those of the Review.

THERE is only one way of dealing with such a case as that of the Sterling Accounting and Audit Company. The two men who have been carrying on its business, an accountant employed by them, and an inspector in the United States Internal Revenue Bureau have been arrested as principals in a conspiracy to defraud the Government of income taxes. If the charge is proved, punishment not only of these men but of any firm or corporation that has sought to avail itself of their services to escape taxation should be of most exemplary severity. Leniency is utterly out of place in the punishment of such systematic fraud. The apparent absence of wholesale evasion of the income and excess-profits taxes has been most gratifying; but we must make sure that that absence is real. This assurance can be had only if terrifying punishment follows in every case of unmistakable intent to cheat the Government. Petty and harassing inquisition in cases where at most there may have been some minor inaccuracy is a thoroughly bad policy; it produces the maximum of irritation with the minimum of effective result. Heavy punishment in any clear case of deliberate deception, on the other hand, disturbs no honest man but deters a thousand dishonest men from the commission of fraud. With taxes on their present scale, such deterrence is essential to counteract a great and ever-present temptation.

IT should escape no one that the Winnipeg war cry, "one big union," is being bandied about freely in the United States. In Winnipeg it meant overthrowing the government; here it intends no less. In Winnipeg it was only an improvised union of the law-abiding forces that crushed the temporary dictatorship of the Strike Committee. It is at once a warning to those who believe in our democracy to stand on the alert, and a reassuring evidence that even without special organization the forces making for order are sufficient.

THE New York police are overdoing the work of exposing Bolshevism. To attack revolution in its secondary outposts is like suppressing the liquor traffic at the drug stores. Everybody knows that the various socialist schools are more or less dabbling in seditious literature. The revolutionary propensities of the I. W. W. are perfectly familiar. To ventilate notorious facts in a spectacular way does no good. To harry

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

the remoter agents of revolution only gives an undue importance to people to whom notoriety is a great asset. Really to deal with the revolutionary movement one must go beyond its light advertising staff. One must reach the leaders who are taken seriously from the inside—not the vendors of seditious literature, but its authors, not the pink advocates of the social revolution but its Red leaders. In the endeavor to get quick and sensational results the New York investigation is in danger of stultifying itself. The result of its fishing, thus far, is a not very impressive catch of minnows.

THE overwhelming vote by which the American Federation of Labor, in convention at Atlantic City, rejected all resolutions of a Bolshevist color has a significance far beyond any question of the Federation's own stand. In a time of ferment like the present, there is always a tendency to magnify the extent to which revolutionary ideas have obtained real lodgment in the public mind. The revolutionists are extremely vocal, while the sober people for the most part say nothing. The Federation has not been, and is not now, notable for extreme regard for established institutions, and if these were really on their last legs the fact would be very apparent in a poll of its members. If the sympathizers with Bolshevism could muster only a corporal's guard at the Atlantic City convention, a poll of the American people as a whole would be sure to show them in a still more pronounced minority. But this will not prevent the dilettanti from speaking of everybody who thinks there is still some life in the established order of society as a hopeless survival from the past.

SECRETARY GLASS has announced that the sales of savings stamps and certificates will be indefinitely continued during the transition period and that the thrift campaign built up around them will remain as a permanent part of the Government's fiscal policy. Here is one of the good little things of the war, borrowed from Europe, that has proved astonishingly useful and that should not be lost. More than any other plan that has been devised, it puts the possibility of Government investment within the reach of everyone at all times, and, like the system that has made the French peasant so closely interested in the welfare of his Government, it is a small but highly effective weight in the balance against social chaos.

THERE will soon be in every American town of any size some kind of memorial to its living and its dead who gave themselves to the country's need. There could not be many better chances than this for an exhibition of intelligent choice in the manifestation of patriotism, and it is to be hoped that more of it will be shown than appears in the monuments of the Civil War and the war with Spain. Few of the memorials of these wars bear looking at to-day, and none of them are of any considerable use to living Americans. If we are not to have æsthetic merit, let us eschew æsthetics and go in for utility. The Chicago Chapter of the War Mothers of 1917, in planning to build a $2,000,000 hotel as a memorial to the Chicagoans who fought in the war, deserves congratulation for definitely leaving the era of cannon-ball stacks and village colosseums behind.

THERE is in the whole course of the war no episode more satisfying than the story of the will-o'-the-wisp little newspaper, Libre Belgique. Published under the very German noses to which it delighted to administer a hebdomadal tweak, it kept during four bitter years a smile on Belgian lips and hope inextinguishable in Belgian hearts. Its thrilling career, which makes Martin Marprelate and his fitting press seem tame by comparison, is admirably told in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes by Albert van der Kerckhove, who under the name of "Fidelis" was one of its important contributors.

Started at the beginning of the German occupation by the veteran journalist Victor Jourdain, then seventy-four years old, ably seconded by Eugene Van Doren, the little sheet, published in a "cave automobile" and advising prospective advertisers to keep their money for better times, was enormously successful. Under the most adverse conditions imaginable it eventually succeeded in issuing twenty-five thousand copies, nearly every week, which were finally worn out by the eager hands of some three hundred thousand readers. Van Doren carried the copy to the printer typed on onion skin paper and concealed in a hollow cane. It was set up in the bathroom of an empty apartment in a retired quarter, but a few feet away from the German guard, and printed in a skillfully devised hiding place in Von Doren's own factory. Wilhelm was on the free list and received his copy regularly, and it was promptly on the desks of the German Kommandantur. In the matter of distributing the sheet the Belgian people made monkeys of the Germans, in the case of Bissing twice a monkey, bis singe as they punningly put it. Try as they would they could not catch up with the little rag. German officers found it pinned to the skirts of their field-grey uniforms. Once on a very straight tip a squad goose-stepped to the Place des Barricades to apprehend the arch-offender in the person of one André Vésale and found that worthy literally turned to stone. Beneath the statue which they had come to arrest they read an inscription in honor of Vesalius, the renowned sixteenth century anatomist. As "Fidelis" says, there were times when the Germans really exceeded their privilege to be stupid.

How they managed to furnish themselves with paper, even sometimes with illustrations, how the torch was caught up from the falling hand of one editor and passed flaming on by another, how Fidelis himself contrived to send regular contributions from the interior of a German prison, is beyond conceiving. It would have been impossible save for one thing, the unquenchable determination of all classes, from the cleric to the boy in the street, to preserve for a better day the country they all loved. If in some future day the world should be so unhappy as to be a little vague about the meaning of patriotism, it can set itself straight once more by repairing to some museum and there viewing, carefully cherished under glass, a worn and tattered fragment of Libre Belgique. Nowhere in the history of the world has its flame leaped hotter and more joyous, nowhere has it so refined the hearts of men, as in the days of which this little scrap of paper is the most satisfying relic.

Germany Submits

GERMANY has accepted the inevitable. Almost to the last moment there remained some doubt as to whether she would submit at once or take the chance of incalculable suffering for herself, and of possible disorganization among her enemies, which a temporary refusal would entail. But there was little doubt of what the decision would be. The absolute steadiness of our stock market has borne impressive witness to this state of mind among qualified observers, and has once more sustained the long tradition of the trustworthiness of that barometer in stress of weather.

If there was little of surprise in the fact of Germany's acceptance, there was still less in the form of its expression. Nor do we mean by this to harp upon the string of "German psychology," which has been decidedly overworked. We can not see in the brief note of acceptance and protest sent to M. Clemenceau by the German Foreign Minister that character of "whimpering surrender" which some appear to find in it. The Allies, he says, "have decided to wrest from Germany by force acceptance of the peace conditions, even those which, without presenting any material significance, aim at divesting the German people of their honor"; the German Republic, "yielding to superior force," accepts the Treaty "without renouncing its own view of the unheard-of injustice of the peace conditions." This is not whimpering; to a fallen enemy, however guilty, we can not begrudge such little refuge for self-respect as a protestation of this kind may furnish. Nor do we find in the previous assertions of the impossibility of fulfilling the terms anything either contemptible or peculiarly German; one has only to recall the like protests which M. Thiers made in the name of France, when the billion-dollar indemnity was imposed upon her in 1871, in order to remind himself that some things which we glibly ascribe to German nature are simply human nature.

It is not in the manner of Germany's acceptance, but in the actual facts of the past and the present, that warning is to be found of the difficulties that are still before us and that will long continue to be before us. Germany will not willingly fulfill the conditions which have justly been imposed upon her. She will violate them soon if she can, she will bide her time if she must. The necessity of a strong and trustworthy agreement among the victorious nations to secure the result of their immense sacrifices has been manifest from the beginning. It is neither more nor less manifest to-day than it was on the day the armistice was signed. Fortunately, there is every reason to believe that the necessary watch will be firmly maintained. Whoever lightly promotes any move that will endanger it assumes a terrible responsibility. In every phase of the discussions that are still before us in this country relating to the peace settlement, this consideration must ever be kept firmly in mind.

But while Germany will have to be watched, this does not mean that Germany will have to be constantly cowed. On the contrary, within the limits imposed by necessity she must in every possible way be helped. Her punishment has been decreed by the terms of peace. To the honest fulfillment of them we must resolutely hold her. To go beyond this, to worry her by petty persecution, to thwart in any way her endeavors at economic and social restoration, to interfere with any chance of happiness that the situation in which she finds herself permits, would be at once unjust, inhumane, and inexpedient. The world is interested in Germany's prosperity not only because it is necessary to enable her to pay the indemnities, but because the happiness of sixty million human beings can not be a matter of indifference to mankind at large. And, not less important, it is after all upon the restoration of the German people to a normal frame of mind that the prospect of the future peace of the world largely depends.

For five long years the world has been filled with amazement and horror at the spectacle which German ruthlessness and megalomania have presented. While those appalling facts were before us it was impossible, and it would have been wrong, to fix our minds upon the better side of the German nature. But to deny that there is a better side, and that it can be appealed to, is a counsel of despair. No reasonable person, we believe, deliberately asserts such a proposition. Unspeakably evil as has been the conduct of Germany, it has been the result not merely of ineradicable qualities of character, but in an immeasurable degree the outcome of false teachings. The gradual spread of teachings of a wholly different kind will be the natural sequel of the humiliation and disaster which to-day for the first time she fully realizes. Whether the better mind will ultimately prevail, only the future can tell. But surely the rest of the world can do no less than to give to those Germans who represent that better mind every possible chance to eradicate, among their countrymen, the poison of the past, and to make possible in a not too distant future the return of good will between them and the rest of the world.

Root versus Knox

THE hand of the master is visible in every part of Mr. Root's letter to Senator Lodge. It is as observable in the opening remark in which he suavely expresses approval of the general object aimed at in the Knox resolution, while gently but firmly turning away from it as a possible solution of the actual problem before the Senate, as it is in his powerful presentation of the case for the solution which he himself offers. Mr. Root would "be glad to see the peace terms and the League of Nations Covenant separated as proposed in the resolution offered by Senator Knox," but not another word does he have to say about that resolution in the whole of his lucid and comprehensive letter. Indeed, the letter was generally accepted on all sides as giving the coup de grace to the Knox proposal.

The contrasts between Mr. Root's position and that into which Senators Lodge and Knox had plunged the Republicans of the Senate are many. But the cardinal one is that Mr. Root fixes his mind first of all upon what the situation actually before us demands, while Mr. Knox and the Foreign Relations Committee acted as though the difficulties of that situation had little or nothing to do with the case. There is nothing contentious about the way in which this appears; it simply pervades the whole letter. The object of the Knox resolution, implied throughout and to some extent explicitly declared, was to compel a reconsideration of the treaty at Versailles; Mr. Root is quite as distinctly animated by the desire to avoid such reconsideration. "The condition of Europe requires prompt action," he says; and his question is, "Under these circumstances what ought to be done?" The three reservations which he proposes are his answer to this question; and having stated them, he adds:

When included in the instrument of ratification they will not require a reopening of negotiation, but if none of the other signatories expressly objects to the ratification with such limitations the treaty stands as limited between the United States and the other Powers.

The effect of the Senate's action upon a world-situation of unexampled difficulty and danger is clearly the foremost subject of Mr. Root's concern.

This, however, is not the only contrast. Mr. Root does not make a lawyer's list of all the possible objections that there may be to the Covenant, but singles out those things which to his mind are of cardinal importance. He does not magnify all the possible troubles that may be involved in minor features. Moreover, he says not a word about any mortal peril to the Constitution in the general provisions of the Covenant. There are few public men who are more attached to the Constitution than Mr. Root, and it is safe to say that his silence on this point is due, on the one hand, to the fact that these perils are by no means so serious as they have been represented, and on the other, to the obvious consideration that the obligations necessary for participation in any effective League of Nations would be open to the charge of unconstitutionality on the part of strict constructionists of an extreme type.

Not less marked than the contrast between the two positions is the contrast between the character of Mr. Root's letter and that of Senator Knox's speech. The difference is not only that between the statesman and the lawyer, it is also that between the statesman and the campaign orator. "This League," exclaims Mr. Knox, "once entered upon and perpetuated, will under the compelling force of the combined armies and navies of the whole world control our destiny from now down through the full remaining period of recorded time." Such an expression would be as much out of place in Mr. Root's close-knit argument as a bit of jazz in a Beethoven sonata. Mr. Root says nothing about "recorded time." He takes account of the fact that withdrawal from the League of Nations upon two years' notice has been provided for in the amended form of the Covenant, but quietly insists that that provision be made more absolute by elimination of the attached condition that prior to the withdrawal all obligations under the Covenant shall have been fulfilled to the satisfaction of the Council. In a word, Mr. Root places before the country a serious question to be discussed in a calm and rational way, and his argument sets the keynote for just such a discussion. This of itself is a public service of the first order.

The reservations which Mr. Root proposes are three in number. The second of them covers the point just mentioned. The third declares that nothing contained in the treaty "shall be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions, or to require the submission of its policy regarding questions which it deems to be purely American questions to the decision or recommendation of other powers." Of course the chief object of this is to remove all doubt as to the safeguarding of the Monroe Doctrine—concerning which the language in the revised Covenant is curiously inept—and also to place beyond doubt our freedom from interference by the League in questions like that of the regulation of immigration. Whenever an issue arises between ourselves and another nation upon any such question, it will naturally be regarded by us as a purely domestic question, while the other party will equally naturally regard it as an international one. We either do or do not wish to refer the settlement of this point to the Council of the League; if we do not, the only safe way is to declare our refusal in advance, as is done in this third reservation.

In favor of these two reservations there is every reason to believe that there will be rallied sufficient sentiment, both in and out of the Senate, to compel their adoption as a condition of ratification. And this for two reasons. First, the objects themselves are such as command the general approval of American public opinion; and secondly, there is no reason to fear that the adoption of them by the Senate will arouse overt objection on the part of other Powers and thus require a reconsideration of the Treaty. America's wholehearted assent is essential to the success of the settlement; a challenge of it on points of such distinctly American interest hardly comes within the range of practical probability.

The reservation which Mr. Root places first is open to more question on both heads. That reservation excludes Article X of the Covenant outright. It is thus a clear emendation of the Treaty, while the other two are in the main interpretative rather than amendatory. Both for this reason and because the European Powers have an incomparably greater stake in Article X than they have in the matters covered by the second and third reservations, it must be considered highly doubtful whether this first reservation, in the absolute form in which it appears in Mr. Root's letter, would meet with that tacit acquiescence to which he looks forward. And aside from this the complete rejection of Article X withdraws our support from the immediate settlement of the war in a degree which it is by no means clear is justified. Mr. Root himself, in his letter of March 29th to Chairman Hays, proposed our acceptance of the obligation contained in Article X for a limited term of years; and it does not appear upon what grounds he has modified his position.

To guarantee the territorial settlement for five years is an undertaking not only less serious, but of a wholly different nature from guaranteeing it indefinitely. To bear our share, if it should be necessary, in preventing for a limited time the disturbance of the result which we had borne our share in bringing about is but to perform a duty that naturally falls upon us; to guarantee it for an indefinite future would be to enter upon an entirely new rôle. No part of Mr. Root's letter, perhaps, is more effective than that in which he points out that the obligation to take part, in an unknown future, in wars relating to territorial issues that make no appeal to the American conscience or to American patriotism is one which we not only ought not to assume, but which in point of fact we should find ourselves unable to fulfill. But, convincing as this is in relation to the unknown contingencies of the future, it applies with but little force to such undertakings as the mere temporary safeguarding of the peace settlement would involve.

There will, however, be ample opportunity for a full consideration of this point. In addition to all their other differences, the Knox proposal called for a snap judgment, while Mr. Root's is one that can be deliberately threshed out when the treaty comes before the Senate. Although Mr. Knox's leading argument was that the country must have time for deliberation, the adoption of his resolution would have meant the decision of a practically vital issue without deliberation. Theoretically, it might have given us unlimited time to consider the League; but it would have cut the Covenant out immediately, and nobody can say what would have become of the treaty. Under Mr. Root's plan the treaty is entirely safe for the present, and at the proper time the reservations that ought to be made concerning the League can be deliberately decided upon.

To the Republican party, as well as to the country, Mr. Root has done an invaluable service. If the party leaders in the Senate shall have learned a lesson from their experience, they will take steps to avoid a repetition of the tactics which have come so near to putting them in a most humiliating position. They will use the time still at their disposal before the treaty is formally presented, to work out with due care a programme adapted to the actual situation with which they are confronted. And the first condition of their success is that it be a programme that will impress the country as embodying a sincere and single-minded effort to make the best of the material with which they have to deal. We can not undo what has been done at Versailles; we are not in a position to write our wishes upon a clean slate. But, as Mr. Root has so clearly shown, and as moderate men have felt all along, it is possible to safeguard America's vital interests without sacrificing what is good in the League Covenant, and without inviting the infinite possibilities of evil that would attend a prolongation of the world's unsettlement and suspense.

The Italian Imbroglia

NO one who has not studied the art of combinazione on the spot will make much of the Italian political situation. On one hand we have the fact that Orlando and Sonnino have suffered a disastrous vote of no confidence in the chamber for not being stiff enough at Versailles. On the other side we have the contradictory fact that the new ministry, with Signor Nitti as premier and the veteran financier Luzzati as leading associate, is emphatically a "soft" cabinet as regards the Adriatic claims. Orlando is rejected for lack of sufficiently resolute Irredentism and is replaced by a Prime Minister who can hardly be regarded as an Irredentist at all.

The simplest and probably truest explanation of the paradox is that it is a political trick with rather little international significance. Giolitti, to be sure, with diminished personal prestige, but with almost unimpaired political influence, has been waiting his chance to get back. He went into temporary obscurity early in the war for his pro-Germanism. The Italian political memory is short-lived. Since Italy learned to hate Germany she has acquired half a dozen newer grudges among her friends of the Entente. In short, Giolitti's offense has been pretty well outlawed, while his hold on the smaller strings of politics has never relaxed. It has been easy for him to capitalize in Parliament the general chagrin over the apparent failure of Orlando and Sonnino to secure any concessions in Istria and Dalmatia. We have no details of the adverse vote of 259 to 78 in the Chamber. But it appears that all groups except Baron Sonnino's stalwart personal supporters of the Right have fallen away. The parliamentary vote followed Premier Orlando's strong hint that he might be forced to compromise the Adriatic claims in the interest of loyalty to the Entente. This drew an uproar and the anti-ministerial vote. We may look at it as what the Italians themselves call a sfogo, a relieving of mind without ulterior significance. After relieving his mind vehemently, an Italian is all the more ready to do business.

The appointment of Nitti is undoubtedly an attempt to change the objective of Italian policy from territorial to commercial expansion. The parliamentary mind has grown too hot and one-sided, seeing everything in terms of ports and boundaries. Somebody has wished to cool things down, and has had the ear of the King sufficiently to obtain a moderate ministry. Unless it can advance a policy appealing enough to offset Irredentism, the Nitti Cabinet will be short-lived. It is possibly merely a transition to the rehabilitation of Giolitti.

Signor Giolitti's opportunism has been a powerful factor in Italian politics for more than a quarter of a century. He thinks publicly in trade figures, and privately in electoral districts. His vision is an Italy great through world trade. To this end he subordinates patriotism, and for that matter feeling of all sorts. He is the legitimate descendant of those Venetian magnates who carried to their height political intrigue at home and commercial intrigue abroad. In their spirit Signor Giolitti knows not friends and foes, but sellers of necessary raw materials and customers for Italy's finished products. He is a curious blend of a hopeful economist of the Manchester school and of an old-school New York boss. He represents a canniness permanent in the Italian character. It seems to be his calculation that Italy is tired of heroics and ready to settle down to business, in which case, he believes, Italy will have to come to him.

For the Entente, as for any League of Peace, the rehabilitation of Giolitti in Italy would be something of a calamity. He is capable of any kind of bargaining with foes of the Entente. For such tactics there are the richest possibilities, from Berlin to Sofia. It seems likely that the Nitti Ministry has been set up chiefly to do the disagreeable duty of surrendering on the Adriatic issue. It is, of course, easier to surrender what you have not fought for. While theoretically the new Italian Ministry is a feather in Mr. Wilson's cap, as likely to be more amenable than the old, practically the breaking up of the war unity of Italy is full of possible trouble for the Entente. Italian expansionism had its modicum of idealism, supported the principle of self-determination, was contingently an asset at Versailles. Had she been handled with any considerateness, Italy might have remained a moral resource for her Allies. As things have actually turned out, Italy has been sharply alienated. If the sacro egoismo of Orlando and Sonnino has been trying at Versailles, it at least had something compatible with a general programme of liberation. The kind of national egotism which Giolitti represents, and into which Italy is ever prone to fall in moments of disillusion, offers very little that the Entente can use and much that may do the Entente harm.

Nobody who has dealt intimately with the Italians will fail to recognize the elementary fact that they generally act according to the amount of confidence you repose in them. They are scrupulously honorable when you trust them. Suspicion they will repay with craft. Italy is tired of being suspected. That is perhaps the simplest formula for a complicated political situation. A certain responsibility for producing this state of mind rests with the negotiators at Versailles. They have failed to do business with two singularly honorable delegates, Orlando and Sonnino, apparently because discussion was limited at the outset by an ultimatum as to Fiume. It is hard for an Italian, or for anybody else, to do business on the theory that his major contention is not negotiable. By letting the Orlando Ministry go to shipwreck an immediate convenience has been obtained at the cost of impairing the moral integrity of the Entente and the League.

Academe Unbends

SINCE Hawthorne described a New England commencement of the 30's that peculiar institution has run true to form. He saw an odd blend of the idealism of scholarship with the rowdy features of a country fair. With modern improvements the spectacle has remained unchanged in essentials, save that educational features have given place increasingly to mummery. Hawthorne's rather drunken crowd was after all ready to listen to all the orations of all the graduating class. The exhilarated alumnus of to-day is willing to listen only to himself and his own kind. We have fortunately been able to borrow the pen of a much experienced alumnus of several universities, the survivor and eye-witness of many commencements and reunions. For convenience he speaks of Suffolk University, but what he gives is a composite picture, the features of which with appropriate change of names and dates are true for any American college or university of established historic prestige and fully mellowed tradition.

Friday, A.M. A general raising of reunion tents in the open spaces near the Suffolk campus, the arrival of class secretaries, pianos, bands, crated goods, and a few girls.

Later. Arrival of several hundred alumni, among them the Rev. Cephas Smith, D.D., '65, for fifty years a missionary at Fiji, and now frankly afraid of his company. Bands play jazz melodies at the station, elated girls arrive in swarms with a modicum of mothers. Greetings, jollity, confusion, infinite motor cars.

Later, P.M. The great Norfolk Game. The Alumni have blossomed out as cowboys, highlanders, jockeys, pierrots, locomotive oilers, sailors, toreadors, and cooks. As a prelude to the game, there is a casual carnival, which continues informally for three days. Smith, '65, enjoys the spectacle with mental reservations, some of the mummies being already palpably in liquor. The game is won or lost. Corresponding celebration or consolation ensues in the reunion tents. Increasingly cacophonous singing of "Mother Suffolk."

Evening. The Boardman Prize speaking to empty benches. The winning undergraduate, a lad with a fine face and evident delicacy of character, is fervid on the topic of The Greek Ideal of Temperance. Nothing mars the proceedings except the charivari arising from the fact that in the neighboring naughty-six tent naughty-five happened to make its visit of courtesy while the speaking was going on.

Saturday, A.M. Class Day Exercises. Eager and able youths surrounded by an admiring multitude of mothers and sisters, celebrate in prose and verse the joys of friendship and the sorrow of parting. These eternal commonplaces gain new force under the Suffolk Elms. It is the only wholly real incident of the commencement celebration.

In the evening the banner reunion class of ninety-nine held a special celebration. President Mixer made a short address of welcome on the topic of efficiency, and then effected an opportune escape to meditate his baccalaureate sermon. The platform from which he spoke turned out to be a disguised boxing ring wherein, to the joy of a liberally educated public, the Fitchburg Pet proceeded to wallop the Newport Nipper into insensibility. Later in the evening a stranger, apparently efficient, though without academic affiliations, won $1,500 at craps from "Red" Iverson and "Tank" Wilkins of the aforesaid banner reunion class.

Sunday. Baccalaureate sermon by President Mixer on the text "Hold fast that which is good." Attended by a small majority of the senior class, the remainder recovering from the hospitality of the alumni, apropos of the victory (or defeat) of yesterday. The seniors were exhorted not to think too highly of themselves as educated men, but to look forward to a career of service as bank presidents or Y. M. C. A. secretaries. As the President perorated on the privileges of ideality, Snifter Robinson, ninety-eight, in the back rows broke into tears at the thought of his misspent life.

For the rest of the day a dampened enthusiasm befitting its sacred character. In the evening, Smith, '65, gets his innings at the Missionary reunion, very thinly attended, with an outer perplexing fringe of transient toreadors, cooks, and highlanders.

Monday. The usual doings of the Glee Club Dramatic association. In the evening impromptu snake dances and conflicting band concerts up and down Main street.

Tuesday, 1 A.M. A deplorable incident. Smith, '65, returning from his class reunion, looked in on the Prom. Having been for fifty years habituated to the modest ways of the Fiji Islanders, he was amazed at the way the girls dressed, and generally at their manner of taking on with the boys. It was his first experience of modern dancing to jazz music. Outraged in the deepest sensibilities of a missionary, he proceeded to the Presidential Mansion, got President Mixer up and demanded that the Prom be stopped. The President expressed sympathy, and promised to refer the matter to the Committee on non-athletic activities.

All night bedlam in reunion headquarters with heavy gambling. All join, hardened "townies" and downy undergraduates. The quiet citizenry cower sleepless behind closed shutters, while the savage snake-dance and the competitive band concerts consume the night. Smith, '65, and a handful of his superannuated classmates discuss the sainted character of old President Bradley, declining meanwhile pressing invitations from the cowboy class to limber up and make a real reunion of it.

Tuesday. Commencement exercises amid lassitude. Conferring of degrees ordinary and honorary. President casually announces gifts amounting to a quarter of a million, and firmly appeals for a three million dollar endowment.

Alumni luncheon. Half-hearted picking at the emergency ration provided by the graduating class. From the platform a mixture of appropriate anecdote and of inappropriate laudation of Suffolk University.

Followed by the President's Reception, thinly attended by the faculty, receivers of honorary degrees, members of the Phi Beta Kappa society, and their faithful women folk.

The end is folding of tents, collecting of bottles, taking of trains and departure of motors. The university settles down to a recuperative summer sleep before continuing the delicate task of liberally educating the youth of the land. Smith, '65, leaves in some bewilderment, asking his taxi driver if it had been a usual commencement. The driver, a manly fellow lately out of a Whippet tank, thought it was slower than usual, and added philosophically "If we townspeople got up this kind of a show, what would happen to us?" On the train Smith, '65, met Lieut. Chevreul, late of the Blue Devils, former instructor in trench warfare at the Suffolk Student Army Training Corps. On being cautiously questioned, the Lieutenant said: "Ze debauch, I understand it pairfectly—but ze debauch among ze well educated—wizzout wit and based uniquely on a high procent of alcohol—zat I do not understand." Neither did Smith, '65.

Summer Reading

HOW far is summer reading, in the strict sense, really wanted? The demand for light reading the year round and the world round is undoubtedly very great. The human mind in the average person, being at once very restless and very lazy, insists that one and the same object shall provide it with repose and occupation. This demand, however, is unrelated to the calendar. The majority of the Four Hundred and the majority of O. Henry's Four Million are independent of season in the quality of their reading. The class of persons who, like Ariel, though in vehicles more commodious than the bat's back, "fly after summer merrily," for whom roses bloom in December and strawberries ripen in February, rejoice doubtless in a reading in which summer never ends. The man who works six days in the week from January 1 to December 31 has no occasion to thank the advent of July for a release from the obligation to study. The demand for light reading in relation to a specific season is the demand of a special class—the class which, while capable of serious reading, finds its leisure for books abnormally increased at the precise moment when its faculty of concentration is relaxed by heat and overstrain.

The relaxing of mental tension is right, but relaxations that last three months are unnatural. A mind capable of profiting by so long a furlough might almost be entitled to an honorable discharge. The body's interest in temperature is certainly far more vivid and direct than the mind's, but the modification of physical diet through the increase of heat is much less radical than the transformation in mental food which is indicated by the phrase "summer reading." Soup, fish, meat, salad, pastry—the broad features of the menu are untouched by the revolution of the year. More ices, more salads, more fruits, fewer fats—these changes are important, but not revolutionary. Why should the mind give up its sirloins and veal cutlets for three months?

The sacrifice will be made in fact only by what might be called the consistently vegetarian mind. Let us by all means consume more salads and ices, and more light literature, when we are hot and tired, but let us avoid the exclusive or excessive assimilation of light reading as we refrain from the consumption of ices by the gallon or salads by the peck. The value of summer leisure to the lover of reading does not lie in the suspension of mental activity, but in the invitation he finds in it to the play of individuality along lines where that play has been restricted by the stringencies of routine work or, in these days of storm and stress, by the pressure of the world's news. Tastes, affinities, sympathies, have been denied or postponed. When leisure comes, he goes back to the lapsed taste, the suspended affection; he reverts to the faithful volumes that had solaced his youth; he reads the new book at which he had longingly glanced through a cleft in his preoccupations; he is restored to that part of himself which his vocation had paralysed; he reintegrates his mind.

Summer reading may even play its little part in the restoration of the mental balance of mankind. We may at last react against the coercion of that grim necessity which, in August, 1914, broke up not only the balance of Europe but the natural and wholesome equipoise of interests in the individual mind. It is quite possible that our mental picture of these calamities has been at the same time far in arrear of the facts and far in excess of what is normal and sanative for the human constitution. We have a double relation to the past or passing cataclysm. Its warning it is imperative to remember; its hideousness it is almost a duty to forget. In ordeals the human race probably owes its protection from insanity or suicide to the feebleness of its imagination and the shortness of its memory. When Perseus fought with the Gorgon, he averted his eye, while he lifted his hand; he feared justly lest the horror of the object should petrify the arm that was raised to overthrow it. War is a Medusa with whom the same tactics are expedient. Its exclusion as picture from the imagination, for periods at least, is as imperative as its inclusion as datum among the objects with which the understanding tirelessly wrestles. Let our summer reading persuade us of the actuality of the quiet and kind and gracious things which fled from our minds in 1914 as civilians fly from an imperiled town on the approach of a hostile soldiery. When the war is over, the civilians come back, and the reëtrance of grace and amenity and humanity into our shaken lives may find a symbol and a furtherance in the nature of our summer reading.

Debate on the League

THE President, speaking at Brussels in the Chamber of Deputies and in the presence of the King and Queen of Belgium: "Any nation which declines to adhere to this Covenant deliberately turns away from the most telling appeal that has ever been made to its conscience and to its manhood." And again: "You can not see one great nation violate every principle of right without beginning to know what the principles of right are and to love them and to form the firm resolve that such violation shall now be punished and in the future be prevented." Standing on the soil of that same Belgium which he, without one murmur of protest, saw so brutally invaded five years ago, Mr. Wilson now promises that no future President will urge the people of this great nation to be neutral in their thoughts if Might again attempts to hew its way past Honor and Truth.

President Wilson has a quick sense of the dramatic, and whether or not he regarded the Belgian Chamber of Deputies as a magnificent setting for a confession of former weakness, it was eminently fitting that as the representative of America he should take this occasion to surround this great issue of the day with the glow of moral fervor. For America, when permitted to react normally, has always responded to big questions with a feeling of righteous conviction, which is natural when one considers that the nation is not yet too old to remember its origin from the Declaration of Independence. However complicated the issues of the Civil War, the present generation at least thinks mainly of the slavery question; it likes also to remember that we freed Cuba and minimizes the possibility which existed of settling the dispute without war; John Hay's Open Door policy in China is regarded as something more than an economic settlement; and even in the campaign of '96, in spite of all the technical arguments used, those for or against free silver sought to magnify the crime which, to their thinking, their opponents were attempting to perpetrate.

A similar reaction was seen at the outset of the European war. The wrongs done to Belgium and France excited an enormous volume of righteous indignation. If, through the President's mistaken notion, it remained largely unorganized for nearly three years, he is at last determined that henceforth international dealings shall be placed upon a moral plane on which the technicalities of law and precedent shall not be viewed as permitting one nation to regard another nation's obliquities as none of its business. It is not rash to say that in this attitude the President is backed up by the great majority of Americans. Whatever the opinion before our entrance into the war (and I believe it even then to have been highly sensible of our duty in the face of a great wrong), few Americans have had the experience of these past years without being confirmed in the belief that the future peace of the world is in a sense everybody's business.

Why, then, all this opposition to the League of Nations? Democrats still insist that objection to the League is actuated by party politics, Senator John Sharp Williams going so far as to call Republicans "this infernal gang." The question is bound in some measure to be colored by partisanship. Take the position of the Democrats themselves. Not to stand behind their leader in the matter which he has most at heart would be to repudiate him; it is quite conceivable that not a few in their ranks are striving to silence their doubts as to the practicability of certain features of the Covenant because of their fear that any lack of expressed conviction on their part might be used to overthrow the whole instrument. It is confidence or the absence of confidence in President Wilson which weighs most to-day.

How at present can it be otherwise? To judge the case as yet on its merits is manifestly impossible—Senators appear to be almost as much at sea as the layman. Said Senator McCumber of North Dakota: "Suppose we now refuse to join with the rest of the world in some scheme to prevent war, what will happen? As surely as the sun shall rise, every great nation will proceed to devise means for wholesale destruction of nations. So desperate will be the next war that all the hate and venom created by this struggle will be infinitesimal." I am surprised that some Democrat has not charged this Republican Senator with playing party politics by endeavoring to injure the League through an overstatement of its merits. Senator McCumber would doubtless have warned the survivors of the Flood that if they did not immediately surround themselves with a wall a mile high they would soon be overwhelmed by another flood reaching to the moon. For consider the implications of his statement. He infers, for one thing, that civilization has gone to the dogs and can only save itself by mechanical means. Now, plenty of men in the street know better, being convinced that civilization in this struggle has come off well, and think it cause for rejoicing that nation after nation which expected no immediate catastrophe from a German victory fell into line with civilization's magnificent host in order that the principles of justice and decency might be vindicated. They know, too, that the tremendous chastening administered by the war will in itself deter for many years to come any great nation from trying to impose its selfish ambitions upon the rest of the world.

Suppose the layman—or the average Senator for that matter—looking for guidance, attempts to follow the argument on details of the Covenant. So acute a mind as Mr. George Wharton Pepper's is not sure if in certain circumstances problems of immigration may not be regarded by the Council of the League as a matter for international settlement. Other shrewd men hold quite the opposite opinion. There is no agreement that the League's main weapon, the economic blockade, would be effective. Take the Balkans—the argument is the familiar one. Is it conceivable that a neighbor of Rumania (assuming the latter to be the offender) would cease importing her much-needed oil that the virtue of the League might not be impaired? Senator Knox, catching up the President's words to the effect that the Irish question might properly be the subject of consideration by the League, asks if we are willing that the negro problem shall be taken out of our hands. Adherents of the League insist that it will lessen hostility. Well, here is a passage from the London Saturday Review, apropos of the Senate's resolution of sympathy for Ireland. "Our politicians and our press prate loudly about the everlasting irrefragable friendship between the United States and Britain. Yet how easily might a serious quarrel arise over the subject of Ireland!"

The usual explanation of the friction arising these days is that all peoples, and especially the Conferees at Paris, are confronted, while the machinery is not yet in running order, with problems more perplexing than those which will arise in the future. And the reply to this latter is that the present should be the easiest time in which to reach agreements, since so many nations are still under the sway of the exalted spirit which prompted them to fight humanity's battles. Is it not to be imagined that, when the League gets to be a routine matter, selfish finesse will enter in, and may the League not then become a convenient medium for the expression of national grudges which would not otherwise have been aired?

The difficulties of the average man, or average Senator, trying to reach a decision may well be stressed. At first impressed by the fact that the American Federation of Labor, a body of plain people, has voted, 29,750 to 420, for the League, he remembers how the President has obligated himself to labor and wonders if labor is by this act heaping up the President's obligations still further. A troubled correspondent in the New York Times, who regarded Mr. Root's analysis of the first draft of the Covenant as a masterly bit of constructive criticism, asks "What does Mr. Root say? . . . Let him speak before it is too late." Well, Mr. Root has spoken, and in a way which will probably bring sorrow to this lady. Another correspondent in this same paper asserts that Article X does not commit us to maintain the present territorial status of the world. Senator Knox evidently thinks it does. Which one is right?

It is not the disagreements of authorities which trouble the man in the street. The American way, in national crises, is to feel contempt for authorities, since usually one can just as well become an authority oneself. Many will recall what an entire nation of "experts" on monetary standards we were in 1896. What troubles the average man is that he has not been put in possession of the facts which must serve as the basis for his decision. That in this instance he must turn himself into a political philosopher gives him no pause. He would like nothing better than to have the opportunity. He is merely provoked that all phases of the problem seem to be up in the air.

Thus the man in the street is left with the problem still on his hands. Even so, he can be counted upon to feel that there must be new ways to pay old debts—that, if possible, wars must be prevented. As the arguments of most Senators have consisted largely of assertions and have failed to present issues that are really joined, his only hope now is to listen to the words of the home-coming President. Here is Mr. Wilson's great opportunity. If he will abandon the language of nebulous idealism and of mere exhortation—his devices in all his speeches on the League hitherto—and will give of the abundant knowledge which he must now have concerning the practical advantages and drawbacks of the proposed organization, he will best serve his countrymen. After all, there is such a thing as being too idealistic to argue, and it is good solid argument which we all need. One argument which sounded cogent, and only one, the President has thus far vouchsafed us. In Boston he said: "If America were at this juncture to fail the world, what would come of it? I do not mean any disrespect to any other great people when I say that America is the hope of the world; and if she does not justify that hope, the results are unthinkable." Here, possibly (even allowing for the overstatement), is a powerful reason for our joining the League, a reason which has been somewhat strengthened by such a description of conditions in Europe as that furnished by Mr. Vanderlip. If the President, in his swing around the country, will play the part, not of the facile moralist, but of the convinced interpreter of Europe's dependence upon us, he may, perhaps, obtain for the League something more than a lukewarm popular backing. Having just recently shackled our convivial appetites through a good-natured indifference, it would be a thousand pities if we were to don this vastly more complicated harness owing to a similar habit of inertia.

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

The Example of British Labor

SOME impatient souls, who wish the action of the world to respond immediately to their preconceptions of economic righteousness, are inclined to think that the progress of events in the field of labor is going too slowly with us and that a lesson of greater speed ought to be derived from British experience. That their masters are going at high speed in a certain direction there can be little doubt; that the direction is what we should approve of is quite another matter. Moreover, at this time of political excitement, it is well to be watchful as to the accuracy of many statements made regarding British conditions. There may be some ground for thinking that they are being used as propaganda to support a widespread campaign for one special group.

There is good reason to believe that the attitude of British employers to the proposal that every laborer should come into the unions has not been rightly stated. That this is the purpose of governmental agencies there can be no question. In the critical strikes of last spring the Government was asked why it did not step in and "do something." In satisfaction of this demand it has urged not only Whitley councils but joint industrial conferences between workmen and employers. Hence it wishes to see all laborers organized so that "responsible bodies" may exist with which negotiations may be undertaken. For political reasons such a policy may be advisable. But the manufacturers of Great Britain are far from being at one with this proposal, not only because it is not a remedy for discontent (being only machinery for joint discussion), but also because it introduces an outside interference—often of a political character—into the making of adjustments which can only be arrived at satisfactorily by the employees and employers directly concerned. From all this political pressure the British employer is fervently asking to be relieved. It is true that many are now awakening to the truth that they have been negligent in the past as to labor conditions, and are now ready, especially since the scare of last spring, to enter on the work of amelioration. But the wisest and the most intelligent of them have come to believe that the only way to reduce friction between workers and employers is to establish a direct individual relation between the employer and his own men; to show a spirit of helpfulness in all matters of common concern. This is believed to be pivotal. Only in that way can suspicion, distrust, and misunderstanding on both sides be removed. To introduce by pressure a council containing members unrelated to local conditions works badly. But no employer can establish these satisfactory relations with his workmen who is not a good sportsman, sympathetic with his kind and willing to be open and frank in all his dealings. Hence to this end many employers need not a little education. As to the outcome, however, of all their experiences—for some of it has been very bitter—it has become clear that nothing in the way of a better adjustment is possible unless both sides show a proper and reasonable spirit.

Unfortunately, the attitude of organized labor has become uncompromising and militant. Nor is the reason far to seek. The workers have had at once a taste of high war wages with a new range of expenditure and been deluged with the most extreme doctrines of direct action. They believe they have only to ask and they shall receive. Convinced that old conditions of work are things of the past and that a "new social order" is spreading over the industrial world, their demands are limited only by the imagination and audacity of leaders whose tenure is dependent on their exciting new hopes. Such a state of mind, looking directly to a control of industry and nationalization—as practised by Sidney Webb—makes the efforts of even those employers who are trying to aid in getting a higher level of living for their workers almost hopeless. This situation might as well be frankly faced. It is not helpful to sentimentalize over the grievances of labor when ears are deaf to reason. It was Marie Antoinette who, when she heard of the bread-riots, expressed the feelings of a warm heart by asking why, if bread was scarce, the rioters were not given cake. It looks as if the British workers were caring more for cake than bread.

It is the general recognition by British employers of this state of mind in organized labor which has led them to fear any movement looking to a more complete unionization of labor, such as is urged upon them by the Government for political reasons. If the unions are not to be trusted to keep agreements already made, a stronger union is only a greater menace to industry. That radical leaders are able to induce unions to throw over their contracts, whenever an emergency provides an opportunity for gaining an advantage over employers, is so well understood as to form an accepted part in union ethics. Therefore, the political propaganda urging unionization as a means of getting organizations with which employers can deal is viewed in many quarters with dread. And, as in the case of the decisions of our own War Labor Board, British governmental influence has been generally characterized by a policy of weakly yielding to labor demands whenever they have been urged with a threatening and uncompromising attitude. In the governmental game for solving labor difficulties the dice seem to be loaded. Hence the serious questioning by English and especially by Scotch employers. They urgently advise American industrialists to avoid the impasse in which they now find themselves.

The crux of the whole matter appears in the grim determination of organized labor to gain their ends by a policy of force. Their ends are not merely an advance in wages. That should be generally understood. They are working to the definite end of the control of industry. In this aim they will be joined by socialists—moderate and extreme—who wish to obtain a governmental direction of the production. But even socialists are frightened when out of the welter of disaffection are heard loud demands for the abolition of government and the existing order. The process of revolution is obvious. Once start the ball rolling down and it gains momentum; after that it is hard to stop it unless some violent cataclysm occurs which recalls the unthinking zealots to their senses. Here is the warning contained in the example of British labor. The departure from a reasonable spirit of adjustment to a demand for a "new social order" is portentous, because the differences between the various points of view down to actual revolution and anarchy are only differences of degree—once the given direction is assumed.

One may to-day stand at the point of normality, looking off over the field of conflict, and see awful possibilities, if we are to suppose that the British are no better than Russians. Mr. Vanderlip has said that the British are on the verge of revolution. There are various things, however, which may lead us away from this conclusion. The British, high and low, are a hard-headed, practical lot. They are convinced by facts. They can see the logic of facts. First and foremost, they are face to face with the worst conditions of industry that have prevailed in a century. They know that cheap labor and cheap coal, with machinery, formed the basis of their commercial supremacy. They are everywhere, as a result of war burdens, expecting to be surpassed by American competitors. Confronted with that spectre, they are now realizing with dismay that they may have forever lost cheap coal. Certain it is that our steam coal can be laid down at our coast ports at $5.50 a ton with a good profit to the mines, while it costs about 24 shillings in England at the mouth of the pit; and about 44 to 48 shillings in London. A few days ago Sir Auckland Geddes told the House of Commons that in the coming twelve months they must look forward to a reduction in the output of coal from the old figure (before the war) of about 270 million tons to about 215 million tons, and to a higher price of coal. To those who know what sufferings the British people underwent even in this last winter from lack of fuel to heat their houses; it is evident that this statement will have the force of a tremendous warning.

But this is not all of the matter. The scarcity of shipping at present makes the transportation of coal very high. Only nearness preserves to Great Britain the markets of France from the competition of American miners. But already, even at the high rates of freight, we are shipping coal to Italy and South America. To Buenos Ayres American exporters are now paying $19.50 a ton on coal. What will be the situation when ships become more numerous and freights tend to fall to a normal level? Is it not evident that a decline of ocean freights will reveal to the British in all its nakedness their weakened power of competition in foreign markets? Also, high-priced coal at home inevitably means a higher cost of production for steel and textiles. Great Britain, unhappily, can not resort to hydro-electric power, as can Northern Italy, and escape the consequences of expensive coal. At the present moment, American steel can be laid down in England at a price one-third below the English cost of production. With these facts piling up on every hand, is it reasonable to suppose that British industry will remain blind to the results of exaggerated demands of organized labor? The policy of labor, to which much has been granted, has not in any way brought an improvement in industrial conditions. Quite the reverse; it has been found that the more concessions are made by employers the more are new demands made in the future. Peace does not come by concessions, because the objective of industrial control, no matter how far ahead, is always kept in mind by labor leaders.

Unless a new and better understanding appears as to the ways and means by which industry can be so conducted that high wages may be paid and yet a prosperous industry be retained, there is trouble ahead, not only for Great Britain, but for every other producing country. Somehow a source of wages and interest must be maintained; but it can be maintained only through a sufficient production of goods so efficiently turned out that the public may have its needs supplied, but at a low cost. There is no other way out of a dangerous situation. Just at present, under the goading of their officials, the general purpose of labor is to ask for an advance without giving any quid pro quo in rising efficiency of production. Everywhere, in all ranks of labor, there is a spirit of unwillingness to work, to make fantastic conditions which involve less productive effort, and to regard any share in production, not as a part of coöperation with other factors, but as a favor granted by a superior power. Since the example of Great Britain is writ large for all to read, there will be no excuse if we follow it blindly.

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN

The Republican Party's Opportunity

THE history of the Republican party may be written with the conciseness of a telegram. It preserved the Union, it freed the slave, it resisted the green-back craze and restored specie payments, it stamped out the 16 to 1 heresy and established gold as the standard of value, it maintained a protective tariff under which industry was enabled to take root and grow and made possible the American standard of living. It set its face firmly against the popular fallacy involving the idea of the recall of judicial decisions and removed that menace to constitutional government. It encouraged the construction of transcontinental railways, thus binding the Pacific coast to the nation and making possible the settlement of the region between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains; it drove Spain from the West Indies, acquired Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines; its foreign policies made the United States a world Power and guaranteed protection for American citizens and American capital wherever situated. In a word, it developed pervasive, wise, and dignified Americanism.

But, as in Egypt, there came a Pharaoh who knew not Joseph, so now in America the people seem interested not to find in the past the sources of their present security and comfort and the sure guide to their continuation, but rather to search the future to find in it by untried and too often by unconsidered experiments the fruition of Elysian dreams, or to pursue the phantoms of false prophets.

The blind led by the blind fall into the ditch. The safety of this people rests now as truly in the hands of the Republican party as in fact it did at the birth of that party. To fulfil its mission of leadership and service, to dispose of the many problems with which we are faced, the Republican party must now promptly, resolutely, and courageously put its forces in array, subject them to discipline and drill. And of these the first to receive attention should be the Sixty-sixth Congress, which it controls.

1. The first duty of the present Congress is to restore its own powers and prerogatives. It should immediately recover to itself such of its powers as have from time to time been delegated by it to the President, to the departments, to commissions, and to boards.

It should definitely eliminate executive control, either direct or indirect.

2. The attention of the Congress should be restricted to the consideration of a reasonable number of bills. Probably not more than 1,000 can receive consideration by committees. In the Sixty-fifth Congress 22,594 bills and joint resolutions were introduced, of which only 453 were enacted into law. The great number of bills clutter up the calendars, waste the time of committees, impose needless study on those charged with following legislation, and entail large expense for printing. Bills which committees propose to report should be by them referred to a legislative draftsman with a view to practicability of enforcement, effect, clarity of language, and limitations of the Constitution.

3. All hearings before committees should be public, and the abuses, now flagrant, of pillorying witnesses and of employing outside counsel, too often made use of for self-exploitation, should be prohibited. Congress should provide a legislative bar, closely supervised and restricted.

4. The practice of commissions, boards, etc., created by Congress, of exploiting themselves, or seeking to perpetuate their existence by carrying on a propaganda for that purpose at the public's expense to influence Congress in their interest, should be prohibited.

5. Congress should enforce its rule against all lobbies, especially those now brazenly and impudently dictating to Congress and the Executive.

6. The fiscal problems of the next ten years will be most serious. With the utmost economy the expenses of the Federal Government, plus charges on account of the hugely augmented national debt and its accompanying sinking fund, will require the exaction of taxes which, even if most wisely based, must press heavily upon all the people and all industry. The difficulties will be great at the best; unless a budget system can be established, the situation is hopeless. Without one, it is impossible for the Government to have a financial policy. It has been truly said of our present system: "Compared with the minute and exact system of English budget our methods seem like the ignorant and disordered practices of barbarians."

As a basis of a budget system, there should be in the Treasury Department a permanent board the function of which should be to make a continuous and comprehensive study of the sources of revenue, and of the revenue laws and their application; their industrial, financial, and social results; the distribution of taxation, including its shifting and final incidence, and evasions of taxation, whether in violation of law or otherwise.

A budget system contemplates four distinct operations:

(a) The preparation of the budget.

This is the work of estimating expenditures, determining sources of revenue and rates of taxation, and estimating the results. The finances of the nation are considered and treated as a unit and a comprehensive plan is made showing in summary and in detail both prospective expenditures and prospective revenues. This would take the place of the present lack of system, under which fourteen separate committees of the House of Representatives and fifteen of the Senate, working independently of one another and of the executive branch of the Government, divide these functions. This situation has largely developed during the last twenty years, although the Committee on Appropriations was deprived of full control over appropriations in 1885. Prior to 1865, the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction over the whole subject of expenditures as well as revenues, the first step in the wrong direction being the creation of a Committee on Appropriations which in that year took over the power to originate appropriation bills. The Ways and Means Committee should recover the powers of which it was divested, should sit during recess and should present its budget during the first month of each annual session of Congress.

(b) The ratification of the budget.

Debate in Congress upon the budget should be thorough and the heads of the executive departments affected should be permitted to attend and to participate without voting. The principle should be recognized that "the constitutional duty is not to augment but to decrease expenditure." More than two centuries ago, the House of Commons adopted a rule to the effect that it would consider no motion for a charge upon the public revenue unless recommended by the executive (in our case, the Ways and Means Committee). This rule has remained continuously in force until the present time. No amendments are made in the Commons increasing any of the items of the estimates. Congress should have a similar rule.

(c) The execution of the budget.

Moneys collected by the Treasury should be placed to its credit in the several Federal Reserve Banks and not, as now, in any one of the nine sub-treasuries. Moneys made available by appropriation are disbursed through the Treasury of the United States upon requisitions from the departments. The accounts and balances arising are certified to the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants of the Treasury Department or to the Postmaster General. The decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury as to whether any expenditure has been authorized are of a quasi-judicial nature and are final, and binding upon all branches of the executive department.

(d) Audit.

The most important phase of legislative control occurs after the money has been spent under its authority. This phase is substantially neglected by the American Congress, and such auditing as takes place is executive; that is, it is in charge of those who have made the expenditures. Congressional control over the budget should be supported by the creation of an auditing committee, the chairman of which ought not to be a member of the party in power. This committee should meet frequently, should be free in its criticisms, and should have a permanent staff under an auditor-general. It should scrutinize expenditures, not only in order to ascertain whether there has been conformity to the ratified budget, but should look into efficiency and economy in letting contracts for purchase of supplies, the construction of public works, and other matters of administration involving expenditures. In the case of unexplained irregularities, the committee should be empowered to refuse to sanction payments of money. The auditor-general should be absolutely independent of the Treasury Department and of all executive control. He should have substantially life tenure of office and his duties should be clearly defined by statute. It is not proper that the executive branch, which spends the money, should also audit the accounts.

The whole business of Congress would be simplified by the adoption of the budget system. No legislative budget will be effective, however, which is not prepared by a single committee having jurisdiction over both revenues and expenditures and is not assisted by a permanent non-partisan board dealing with revenues and taxation. Congress can not deal properly with the budget without the first-hand information to be gained by the presence and participation in the debates on the budget of the heads of the executive departments affected. There can be no sufficient guarantee of the enforcement of the budget system without a legislative audit.

In all foreign governments the legislature controls the ratification and the audit, while the executive controls the preparation and the execution, but in the most successful of these governments the executive is actually a committee of the legislature subject to instant dismissal whenever it forfeits legislative confidence or fails to carry out the legislative will. Under our system of government the authority of the executive should be limited to the execution of the budget. The legislature should control its preparation and its ratification and the audit.

L. F. LOUGHEE

Correspondence

A French View of Prohibition

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The prohibition of the exportation from France into the United States of our best wines and pure cognac is based simply on a misunderstanding. Of course there are good and serious objections to the abusive and deleterious use of alcohol, but none to the moderate drinking of bardeaux, bourgogne, champagne when you are sure of its origin, and the old brandies of Cognac and Armagnac. This was, furthermore, the opinion of one of your best chemists, Dr. Harvey Wiley, the author of your Pure Food Law, and of one of your most distinguished Catholic prelates. During one of my crossings of the Atlantic in the latter's company, I offered him morning and night a little glass of old fine champagne, as we sat round the captain's table, which he drank with a relish that showed him to be a good judge of wines. As we entered New York harbor and he stepped the last glass in the presence of Bartholdi's statue, the witty ecclesiastic remarked with a twinkle in the eye: "To think that to-morrow I shall have to admit in the presence of my poor Irish hard-drinkers that all this is poison!"

I feel sure that this detraction of our rare old French vintages will cease in America the day when the distinction is made, which is both logical and scientific, between alcohol and natural brandies, between pure wines and artificial ones.

ARTHUR CALVERT,

Formerly Senator for Charente
Cognac, June 10

The Senate's Irish Resolution

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The action of the United States Senate in passing the resolution asking for a hearing for the Sinn Féin organization by the Peace Conference and expressing sympathy with the purpose to establish an Irish Republic seems to call for comment. Suppose the State of South Carolina, which from the first strenuously insisted on its right to independence whenever it chose to exercise it, should rise up in the present world crisis and say that it had been put down by brute force and now reasserts its privilege of self-determination and calls on Great Britain, from whence had come emissaries to stir up the people and encourage them to throw off the hated bond, to present their case to the Peace Conference; and that thereupon the House of Lords by a vote of 60 to 1 should pass resolutions urging its representatives at Paris to comply with the request, and expressing sympathy with the aspirations of South Carolina. What would we say?

We were angry, through and through, during the Civil War when Mr. Gladstone went so far as to say unofficially, that Jefferson Davis had created a nation, and bitterly resented expressions of sympathy by the ruling class in England for the South, though it was provocation of far greater moment which prompted the American Minister to say, "It is needless to point out to your lordship that this means war."

This vote of sympathy comes from our highest legislative body and is aimed at a country with which we have been fighting side by side and which is our friend, at a time when that country is carrying a fearful burden of debt and anxiety, and is almost overwhelmed with labor troubles. Whatever its purpose, it is calculated to precipitate open revolt and bloodshed in Ireland. The hot heads there are on the verge of it now, and the support of this country indicated by the resolution is enough to bring on a crisis. The character and bearing of this action on our part may perhaps be made a little clearer by a further illustration. Suppose Cuba had belonged to us for hundreds of years, that a large portion of the inhabitants had become disaffected and had during the late war, not only refused to take any part with us, but had done all they could to help Germany, and were demanding independence, while a large number comprising the most intelligent and prosperous of the inhabitants remained loyal and insisted on continuing their allegiance and connection with us; and suppose emissaries had come from England and encouraged the disaffected and that their Parliament had passed such a resolution as our Senate did. We should have told them just what Great Britain ought to tell us, that we regarded it as a gross affront and a most unfriendly act; that we were meddling in what did not concern us and that we had better mind our own business.

The Sinn Féin people have not the slightest claim on our sympathy or help. They insulted our flag and our soldiers on their own soil, and while France, always the friend of Ireland, was bleeding to death, they refused to raise a hand to save her. Never was such cold-blooded selfishness. They would have seen the United States, which has always befriended and succored them, go to destruction sooner than have helped its cause. Now they have the unparalleled assurance to ask us, disregarding and wronging our loyal friends in Ireland, to help them out loose from Great Britain, and our Senate, 60 to 1—thank God for that one—voted to aid them. Realizing that some excuse was needed, the Senate made a flimsy attempt to camouflage and palliate what was done by saying that Great Britain was questioning the Monroe Doctrine, which was not true. Never in history was there a more flagrant and unjustifiable affront given by one nation to another to whom it professed friendship, and never was there a more discreditable exhibition of reckless party politics—and the two parties are equally guilty.

The Republicans got their work in that by in effect concluding that, whereas there is a Presidential election approaching and whereas the Irish control a large number of votes, resolved that we are for the Irish. Whereupon the Democrats, exclaiming "so that is your little game, is it," resolve that we, too, are for the Irish. They both well know that it is preposterous to imagine that Great Britain will ever consent to the creation of a hostile independent Power just off her coast which could be made a naval and military base for Germany, and it is doubtful if there are half a dozen members of the Senate who would have voted for the resolution as an independent proposition with no politics in it; as it is, it will not fool even the Irish. It is such performances that make one pronounce the word "politician" with an undertone of contempt. Now, if the President is a statesman, he will ignore the resolution, and possibly Great Britain can not better show her opinion of it than by treating it in the same way. Twenty years ago it would have been impossible for the United States Senate, with statesmen of the stature it then contained, to pass such a resolution.

VETERAN

Washington, D. C., June 18

Book Reviews

Man's Immortal Fortitude

THE UNDYING FIRE. By H. G. Wells. New York: The Macmillan Company.

THINGS have taken place in the last four years which, if brooded upon, tend to chasten somewhat one's pride in belonging to the human race. The species can hardly be said to have put its best foot forward. Viewed as a whole from the point of view of the recording angel or even from the point of view of an expert public accountant, the human race, it must be conceded, has made rather a mess of its business. In the present exceedingly snarled state of its affairs the outlook would be distinctly depressing but for one fact which comforted Homer in the reconstruction period following the Trojan war, and which has been faithfully reestablished at each dark and cataclysmic moment of history, namely, that the destinies have granted to the children of men an astonishingly enduring heart. They can stand anything—absolutely anything which does not require a sustained effort of intelligence. So far as their fortitude is concerned and their faith in their fortitude, the devil himself on the infernal lake excogitating his reconstructive plans with "courage never to submit or yield"—the devil himself can't surpass them. Their intelligence is a smoky taper; their sense of right and wrong is a feeble and uncertain glimmer; but their endurance is an undying fire.

If you feel that you have endured to the limit and must run up the white flag, reconsider Prometheus boarding the vultures on his liver or Job praising God among his boils or, if you like your tonic in brand new bottles, try Mr. Wells's latest prescription, consider the case of Job Huss, headmaster of the great modern public school at Woldingstanton. In mid-career misfortunes fall upon Mr. Huss. Two boys of his school die through the negligence of a trusted nurse; an assistant is killed by an explosion in the laboratory; on the last night of the term two younger boys are burnt to death in the school house fire; Mr. Huss is threatened with cancer; his only son, according to report, is killed in the war; his wife becomes irrational and unsympathetic; a sub-master seeks to supplant him; and while he swelters and groans in a wretched lodging-house and waits for the London surgeon to come down and operate on him, the trustees of his school, Sir Eliphaz Burrows and Mr. William Dad call upon him with Mr. Joseph Farr, his supplanter, to demand his resignation. To this visitation committee is added later Dr. Barrack, the local physician. All the details of this painful situation, as the "prologue in heaven" informs us, are the consequence of a little wager between the Prince of Darkness and the President of the Immortals.

"Give me but the power," says Satan, "and you shall see his courage snap like a rotten string."

"Try man to the uttermost," is the reply. "See if he is indeed no more than a little stir amidst the slime, a fume in the mud that signifies nothing."

As firmly as his Hebraic forerunner, Mr. Huss, it is superfluous to relate, sustains the grand human tradition of fortitude. Beneath the bludgeonings of chance and the more intolerable bludgeonings of the tongues of his victors, he justifies himself and his school, and declares his faith in the divinity of the fire within. In the end he is swiftly restored to health and prosperity. In the Book of Job the restoration was doubtless intended as a significant part of the argument. In "The Undying Fire" the final restoration has no significance except as it illustrates Mr. Wells's fidelity in imitating his model, a fidelity which gives to the conversational drama a somewhat unusual compactness and symmetry.

Mr. Huss in his miseries grips the imagination like a strenuous, suffering neighbor. He incarnates and represents with a good deal of power the baffled, defeated, unconquered idealism of numberless fairly ordinary men in these times. His interlocutors, though animated by a vivid realistic stroke or so, impress one, as of course many of one's living contemporaries do, as but puppets stationed in emotional and intellectual immobility at certain points of view. Sir Eliphaz stands for a literal child-like religious orthodoxy. Mr. Dad worships mere mechanical organization and efficiency. Mr. Farr conceives of chemistry and physics as helps to trading and is keen for giving education a resolutely commercial bent. Dr. Barrack is a fatalistic naturalistic "agnostic" committed to the necessity of competition and struggle for survival. Huss opposes to all these adversaries his own passion for "the unity and release and triumph of mankind" through an education that shall seize upon and bring out the generous social instincts and intelligence of men.

To those who have attempted to follow Mr. Wells's religious evolution the most significant thing in the book will be the increasing emphasis upon a special and rather mystical human insight, accompanied by a vigorous rejection of natural law as the model for human institutions. "Let us look squarely at this world about us," says Mr. Huss. "What is the true lot of life? Is there the slightest justification for assuming that our conceptions of right and happiness are re-lected anywhere in the outward universe?" In his eloquent ninth chapter he exhibits the red teeth and claws of Nature much after the fashion of Tennyson's "In Memoriam." In a later impressive chapter on submarine warfare, he rejects one-half of man's natural impulses and tendencies as sternly as he rejects the law of the "outward universe." Thus Mr. Wells seems to cut loose from the facile captivating moralists of the day who preach the possibility of happiness through the wholesale legalization of natural instincts. He recognizes, like a despised Victorian or a Christian or an intelligent heathen, the necessity of an eternal war in the members. He dedicates this book to school teachers, and, if he continues in this vein, he may safely address the next one to clergymen. But then let him beware of the wrath of Mr. Francis Hackett.

Geography and The War

DEMOCRATIC IDEALS AND REALITIES. By H. J. MACKINDER. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

PLUTARCH says that it is a very difficult matter to trace and find out the truth of anything by history, and we wonder if this is equally the case when geography is employed as an aid. The author of the present work recapitulates the geographical features of the earth in remarkably clear and entertaining language, and from these and certain facts of history attempts to deduce both the causes and the consequence of the Great War. In a study of this character we must keep always in mind the necessity of other things being equal. Historical development geographically initiated is a fascinating but by no means easy subject of contemplation. History is an amalgam of geographical and economic considerations and in an investigation of the past the discovery of the latter is frequently both arduous and baffling. Some one has said that the object of science is to reverse the appearance of things, and nowhere is this more likely to be true than in historical research. Conjectural history, to use Sir Henry Sumner Maine's phrase, must be read with caution, as things wear very different appearances to minds of equal intelligence (to say nothing of those of varying intelligence) in different generations.

If other things are equal, and we are not disposed to take issue with him, the present author may be said to have produced a work of great value and significance. The real question in his mind is as to which shall have the last word in the state—the idealists or the organizers. Democracy refuses to think strategically (the thought of the organizer is essentially strategic) unless compelled to do so for purposes of defense. The democrat thinks in principles, be they—according to his idiosyncrasy—ideals, prejudices, or economic laws. The organizer, on the other hand, plans construction, and, like an architect, must consider the ground for his foundation and the materials with which he will build. Political moralists have been very fierce of late. They have preached the narrow way of “no annexations, no indemnities.” In other words, they have refused to reckon with the realities of geography and economics. Yet practical sense, declares our author, warns us that it would be wise to seize the present opportunity, when, for once, democratic nations are efficiently armed, to make the world a safe place for democracies when going about their ordinary business. We must reckon presciently with the realities of space and time and not be content merely to lay down on paper good principles of conduct.

Average citizenship is not a likely base for daring innovations. Adventurers, sole or corporate, must therefore be left to blaze the way to progress. To save democracy in its recent jeopardy we suspended the very safeguards of democracy, and allowed our governments to organize us not merely for defense but for offense. Had the war been short, this would have been a mere parenthesis in history. But it has been long, and social structures have wasted in part, and in part have been diverted to new uses, so that habits and vested interests have dissolved, and all society is as clay in our hands, if only we have the cunning to mold it while it is still yielding. But the art of the clay-molder lies, not merely in knowing what he would make, but also in allowing for the properties of the material in which he is working; his human initiative must reckon with reality.

In the work before us the author tries to depict some of the realities, geographical and economic, in their twentieth-century perspective. His fitness for the task is attested by the fact that he was formerly director of the London School of Economics and Finance, and an authority on modern geography.

To this day, he says, our view of the geographical realities is colored for practical purposes by our preconceptions from the past. In other words, human society is still related to the facts of geography, not as they are, but in no small measure as they have been approached in the course of history. It is only with an effort that we can yet realize them in the true, the complete, and therefore detached, perspective of the twentieth century. The war has taught us rapidly, but there are still vast numbers who look out on a vivid Western foreground, but only to a very dim Eastern background. The last phrase embodies a distinction which forms the basis of this whole work.

Here is the old antithesis of sea-power and land-power. The geographical and economic circumstances by which each has been governed throughout the centuries are portrayed with a very deft hand. In a survey of sea-power our attention is first called to Egypt. Then we pass to the Aegean. Was Crete the first base of sea-power? From that home fared the seamen who, sailing northward, saw the coast of the rising sun to their right hand and of the setting sun to their left hand, and named one Asia and the other Europe. Have we in Crete the first instance of the importance of the larger base for sea-power? The man-power of the sea must be nourished by land fertility somewhere, and, other things being equal—such as security at home and energy of the people—that power will control the sea which is based on the greater resources. It was reserved for the half-Greek, half-barbaric Macedonians, established in the root of the Greek peninsula itself, to end the first cycle of sea-power by conquering to the south of them the Greek sea-base, and then marching into Asia. They made a “closed sea” of the Mediterranean by depriving both the Greeks and the Phœnicians of their bases. That done, Alexander could advance light-heartedly into Upper Asia.

Then came the Romans, who united the western and eastern basins of the Mediterranean. After the battle of Actium the entire Mediterranean was a “closed sea,” and we think of the Roman Empire as chiefly a land-power; the command was not maintained upon the sea, but upon the land by holding the coasts. By penetrating to the Bay of Biscay and Britain the Romans eliminated the risk of the rise of a sea-power off the Gallic coast, and made the Channel also a “closed sea,” controlled by land-power. When the land-power of Rome waned, the seas ceased to be closed. The peoples of Latin civilization were hardened by a winter of centuries, called the Dark Ages, during which they were besieged in their homeland by the Mohammedans, and failed to break out by their crusading sorties. Only in the fifteenth century did time ripen for the great adventure on the ocean which was to make the world European.

In describing the landsman’s point of view our author makes frequent use of the term “Heartland,” by which he denotes those vast stretches of the great island—Europe, Asia, and Africa—that have practically no outlet on the sea. We may epitomize this description by saying that Europe and the Indies are regions of the ploughmen and shipmen; whereas the Northern Heartland, Arabia, and the Southern Heartland, have for the most part been unplowed, and are inaccessible to sea-going ships, though they are naturally adapted to the mobility of horsemen and camel-men, with their herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. The connection of the Heartland is much more intimate with Europe and Arabia than it is with China and India. For purposes of strategical thinking the Heartland incudes the Baltic Sea, the navigable Middle and Lower Danube, the Black Sea, Asia Minor, Armenia, Persia, Thibet, and Mongolia. Within it, therefore, were Brandenburg, Prussia, and Austria-Hungary, as well as Russia—a vast triple base of man-power which was lacking to the horse-riders of history. The Heartland is a region to which, under modern conditions, sea-power can be refused access.

The last statement was obviously penned before November, 1918, but we may pass it without question—its importance can not be tested until the peace terms and their effectiveness are patiently studied. What our author seems most to have in mind is that during the nineteenth century Russian Czardom loomed large within the Heartland, and that towards the end of the century the Germans determined to subdue the Slavs and to exploit them for the occupation of the Heartland, through which run the land-ways into China, India, Arabia, and the African Heartland (south of the Sahara). With him the upshot of the matter is that not until about a hundred years ago was there an available base of man-power sufficient to begin to threaten the liberty of the world from within this citadel of the World Island; and that no mere scraps of paper, even though they may be the written constitution of a League of Nations, are, under the conditions of today, a sufficient guarantee that the Heartland will not again become the centre of a world war.

The recent Great War arose, we are told, from the revolt of the Slavs against the Germans. West Europe must necessarily be opposed to whatever Power attempts to organize the resources of East Europe and the Heartland. The region so designated has in the past lacked man-power to make it a productive base for the support of men. But Germany has taught the world how to overcome this shortage by means of organization.

We must have a balance as between Germans and Slavs, and true independence of each. We can not afford to leave such a condition of affairs in East Europe and the Heartland as would offer scope for ambition in the future. The German blunder having given us the victory, it is essential that we should focus our thought on the stable resettlement of the affairs of the region just mentioned. If we accept anything less than a complete solution of the Eastern question in its largest sense, we shall merely have gained a respite, and our descendants will find themselves under the necessity of marshalling their power afresh for the siege of the Heartland. The essence of the resettlement must be territorial, for in east Europe and in still greater measure in the remainder of the Heartland we have to deal with regions whose economic development has only commenced. Unless we look forward, the growth of the peoples will, by and by, unbalance our resettlement. And it is well to bear in mind that German mentality is not likely to be altered by the German defeat.

Scholarly Realism on Eastern Europe

THE NEW EASTERN EUROPE. By Ralph Butler. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

IN these days of violent partisan propaganda, when each nationalistic fragment is pressing its claims to share in the questionable benefits of the ill-defined theory of self-determination, it is gratifying to read the scholarly work of a painstaking investigator who rises above such currents. The articles on the situation of Finland, the Baltic Provinces, and Ukraina, which Mr. Butler has contributed to the English Review during the past two years, have been noteworthy, not only for their freedom from the taint of special pleading, but also because they have brought out the relation between politics and economics in this confused section of Europe. The publication, therefore, of these articles, with additional timely chapters, in a single volume, is very welcome.

It is greatly to Mr. Butler's credit that even in the heat of the conflict he was able to write in this scholarly and detached manner, when to "give the devil his due" was to incur the suspicion of pro-German tendencies. This is particularly true of his treatment of Finland and the Baltic Provinces, in the case of which countries our strong prejudices have at times prevented us from understanding the true attitude of the people themselves in their difficult local conflicts. He sets forth admirably the true nature of the struggle in Finland that has been going on since the programme of Russification was started by the Czar's Government, and makes clear that the real rivalry was between the Swedish aristocracy and the Finnish industrial class. He also reveals the desperate situation in which Finland was placed when threatened by the sweep of Russian Bolshevism, and the natural gratitude which the people felt at their rescue from this by the Germans when their aid was lacking.

In Mr. Butler's book there is set forth, possibly for the first time in English, a clear analysis of the conflicting political and economic currents in Esthonia, Latvia, and Courland. The public has been so much misled by the identification of the Baltic barons with Prussia that the careful distinction between the several elements of the population will be found somewhat difficult to follow, but none the less essential to an understanding of the problems involved in the final disposition of the Baltic lands. Here, as elsewhere, he shows the part played by the fundamental agrarian problem.

The case of Lithuania is likewise a complex matter, and it has not been simplified by the violent nationalistic propaganda of the Lithuanian intelligentsia. Mr. Butler sympathizes, to be sure, with the nationalist movement of the Lithuanians, but he recognizes fully its weakness, in that it is of such recent growth and so poor in cultural development that it may possibly not survive the conflict of the surrounding forces which threaten its future. Here again the land factor is all important, and the political aspect is but the expression of the underlying economic factors.

The most valuable part of Mr. Butler's work is his treatment of the Polish question. He devotes three chapters to this, entitled "Poland, 1917," "Poland, 1918," and "Poland, 1919." The first two are published as they were originally written, at times when the Polish situation bore very different aspects from what has now developed as the result of the Allied victory over the Central Powers, but they are all the more valuable for this fact. In dealing with the Poles, Mr. Butler has the great merit of freeing himself from the thrall of romanticism induced in most writers by the tragedy of the partitions and the successive insurrections. There is nothing new in his analysis of the causes of the downfall of Poland, or of the part played by the land-owning aristocracy in the insurrections. What is noteworthy, however, is his valuable analysis of the rise of nationalism among the peasant class, and the sources of its resistant power. Perhaps the best feature of his book is his study of the development of economic efficiency by the 2,000,000 Poles in Prussia, a development from which he expects much in the new state, because it seems to show that the Poles, in spite of their Slav temperament, have latent capacities for constructive work and community action. Our propagandists have misled us greatly as to the true attitude of the Poles towards the Polish kingdom set up by Germany and the significance of Pilsudski and his Polish Legions, and it has remained for the writer to unravel the tangled skein of Polish politics through the kaleidoscopic changes of the past three years and render more intelligible the conflicts which threaten the new-born Poland. He is not sanguine as to the outcome of the experiment, for he realizes that the internal problems, especially in Russian Poland, are more complex than those which await solution in the other states of eastern Europe. He remarks sagely that the strength of nations is a product, not of diplomatic machinery, but of biological growth; wherefore only the Poles themselves can make a strong Poland, and for the source of such strength they can only look, not to external, but to internal policy.

The chapter dealing with Ukraina is full of valuable information, but one could have wished that Mr. Butler had carried his investigations still further, especially as they touch the larger question of future Russian-Ukrainian relations and Russia's approach to the Black Sea. Very properly he calls attention to the fact that Ukrainian nationalism and separatism were confined to a small section of the intelligentsia, and that, with the inviting in of the Germans to stem the tide of Russian Bolshevism, this element fell between the upper and nether millstones, because it failed to realize that Germany's great object in the occupation was, not to satisfy Ukrainian aspirations for independence, but simply to obtain food. His analysis of the Cossack situation in Ukraina is a particularly good piece of work, and throws much light on the present agrarian troubles, which overshadow political issues.

Throughout his work the author emphasizes the importance of the economic situation, and especially the questions of land-holding and land-working; and he shows that he has made a careful examination of statistical material and recent German authorities, the only ones that have dealt with these subjects in a scientific manner. Altogether, this is a most valuable contribution in a field in which accurate information has hitherto been sadly lacking.

Two Ways of Faith

THE MIRROR AND THE LAMP. By W. B. Maxwell. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company.

THE CONVICTIONS OF CHRISTOPHER STERLING. By Harold Begbie. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.

W. B. MAXWELL is among the few contemporary English novelists who have kept clear of a brisk, chatty, more or less facetious style, on the one hand, and a fine-drawn, sophisticated style, on the other. He does not think it his main business as a novelist either to be amusing or to achieve that fashionable elegance of manner which every generation is prone to confound with "distinction." Nor does he scruple to pull a long face on occasion over the serious affair of life, as an affair of too deep irony for side-glances. It is not, to him, an issue between absolute good and absolute evil for the control of human nature, but a subtle interplay of flesh, mind, and spirit through which the destinies of men are dimly guided rather than patently determined. Any good Wellsian would be afraid of the Edward Churchill of this story, as a prig about whom too little might hardly be said. He is a youth of strongly religious nature. His romantic devotion to his mother might be seized by psychoanalysts as a clue to his freedom from the ordinary experiences and temptations of sex. He takes orders and elects to serve as curate, for his soul's good, in a slum parish. He is of great use there; rejects preferment; falls presently in love with an abused wife; carries her off openly and is unfrocked; loses all faith; and only after many years finds himself restored, as if by chance, to the bosom of the church and to real happiness. For it is only as a priest that he is able to recover the tranquillity of his early years. All the arguments of his days of negation remain unanswered. Faith has retaken her own, and that is all. Are we to smile or to look grave at the means of her restoration—the kindly Bishop who comes along and, as a matter of personal judgment and special convenience, awards to Edward Churchill the right to wear ceremonial surplice and diurnal "dog-collar" once more? To his brilliant daughter, the daughter of his "sin," this is matter for triumph—"rehabilitation, acknowledgment of her father's true worth at last, the lifting of that cloud upon his name." The last in particular. . . . Somehow we are made to see what it all means to the man himself; being what he is, Faith does not exist for him save as the Church consecrates it. Cast out of the Church, he has sworn never to wear surplice or collar, "ugly yoke of superstition," again. Being permitted to return, he gladly dons the churchly uniform: "That was not really himself. That was another man. In his rage and revolt he had called his priestly garb the devil's livery. Now he may wear it again." So we leave him happy with his restored dream of faith in "the soul as a lamp which burns bright and clear, illuminating the mirror which is the mind"—so long as lamp and mirror remain within the shelter of the sanctuary. What Mr. Maxwell "thinks of" him remains uncertain, by no means to the disadvantage of the portrait. For to interpret a human character is neither to lecture upon it nor to judge it, as all great portraiture, literary and other, has abundantly shown.

"The Convictions of Christopher Sterling" is a story of not dissimilar temper. The motto is from Spinoza: "It should be the aim of a wise man neither to mock, nor to bewail, nor to denounce men's actions but to understand them."

This is frankly a novel with a purpose; and when we have said that the central figure is a pacifist and conscientious objector who dies under the rigors of an English prison sentence at hard labor, we have prepared the reader for the worst rather than the best. But Mr. Begbie's purpose has been less to condemn the military treatment of conscientious objectors during the late war than to make intelligible the attitude of these men, the best of them,—and the attitude of their world towards them. He wishes to look at the ideals and practices of war and peace from as many different angles as possible. But he is not content, with Messrs. Wells, George and the rest, to run them through the kaleidoscope of a single mind, a Britling or an Oakley. He chooses rather (like Miss Sinclair in "The Tree of Heaven") to embody them in clear-cut form, in the members of a single family.

Anthony Sterling is a pillar of finance who takes his burden seriously; he is not, however, the heavy Victorian father, but a man of sensitive feeling and warm devotion to his family. His wife is a woman of brilliant mind and unconsciously selfish interests—a skeptic of all religions but that of convenience in the best sense of the term. There are four sons, Christopher, Langton, Arthur and James. Langton is a sportsman and a soldier and a Churchman. He sees war as a purifier of society, is keen about his soldierly profession, and when the hour strikes welcomes the test with enthusiasm, though not lightly: a militarist of the highest type. Arthur, the third son, is a selfish man about town who contrives to play the slacker without incurring ignominy. Marriage and "war-work" are his sacrifices to the sacred cause of his personal exemption. James, the youngest, is a lad of fine intelligence and promise. He has an exquisite feeling for beauty: he will write, he may write greatly. He lays his loathing of violence and his life itself willingly at the feet of England, which he worships—an ideal patriot. Our chief person, though, is the oldest son Christopher. A most brilliant scholar, he leaves Oxford a man marked for high performance. But he is odd: his supernatural logic forbids his accepting the half-truths and half-policies on which civilization rests. He abandons his "prospects" and his family and his class, and goes down to life among the poor in London, not as a "slum worker" but as one of them. He believes that the only hope of the world lies in the literal practice of Christianity as its founder preached and lived it. He joins the Society of Friends, marries a fellow-member, his womanly counterpart, and gives over his rights as eldest son to a rich man. The war comes; he preaches peace, is labeled pro-German and traitor, is refused exemption, though a Quaker; and is virtually murdered by the military authorities. And his soldier-brother Langton, with his military honors and his strong personal sense of duty done can only say of him, "Christopher died for England, and for something even greater than that." On the whole, the storyteller has succeeded in his purpose to keep the balance of sympathy between all these conflicting points of view, and to be preserved from dogmatism by "the honesty of his own agnosticism." It is in the name of freedom for all points of view that he makes his special protest, develops his special purpose to show that the ill-treatment of an English Quaker in an English prison is as abominable as the ill-treatment of an English prisoner-soldier in a German prison. We have said that these two books have something in common. They are both grave studies of the religious nature, but in strongly contrasting manifestations: the Churchman whose faith and practice as a Christian rest on an unbroken structure of dogma; and the lonely soul who finds his living Christianity only in that literal and personal obedience of the precepts of Jesus which has always remained somewhat beyond the powers of organized religion.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

NICHOLAS L. BROWN, under the title of "Last and First," has brought together two essays by John Addington Symonds which have never before been reprinted. The former of these is an elaborate study of the Renaissance, "an analysis," as the author calls it, "of the emancipation of the intellect in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries." It was published in the Fortnightly only a month before his death. The second essay is a criticism of the art and spirit of Clough, and appeared also in the Fortnightly, but in 1868, four years before Symonds's first book. The curious thing is that this early piece of writing is not only perfectly mature in style but really displays more thought and penetration into the heart of life than the latest product of the essayist's pen, written as the consummation of his long years of devotion to the history of the Renaissance. A comparison of the two essays confirms the opinion that somehow Symonds never fulfilled the extraordinarily brilliant promise of his youth. Something went wrong in the man. His study of Clough we can recommend to those who have forgotten how important a figure that poet was in the thought and literature of the mid-nineteenth century. The book is edited by Albert Mordell.

Those who, as good homœopaths, like to cure the soul of its hurts from science by dosing themselves with a little more science, may be directed to Dr. Robert W. Mackenna's "Adventure of Life." Here in a succession of well-written, well-informed chapters they will find all the old beliefs in free will, immortality, God, and eventual peace removed from the clutches of naturalism, and even confirmed by a deeper understanding of material things. The book is not profound, but it will be comfortable to a certain class of readers. (Published by the Macmillan Company.)

"A Peace Congress of Intrigue" is a compilation made by Frederick Freksa (and published by the Century Company) of some of the more important and piquant contemporary accounts of the famous Congress which could dance but not march. The lighter side of the Congress which followed Napoleon's abdication—the balls, dinners, masquerades, commemorative funerals, sleighing parties, living pictures, and wit—is effectively told in the selections from the well-known reminiscences of Countess Bernstorff, Countess Thürheim, Baron Nostitz, and Count de la Garde. In the serious negotiations of the Congress of Vienna the victorious allies were split apart through their jealousies and selfishness into hostile Anglo-Austrian and Russo-Prussian groups, which gave to Talleyrand, the ambassador of the vanquished, the ultimate balance of power and controlling influence at the Congress. (May Germany to-day be unable, through the attitude of Italy and Japan, to imitate Talleyrand's example in turning the tables upon the victors!) This more serious side of the Congress of Vienna is related in long extracts from the letters and diaries of Humboldt, Stein, Archduke John of Austria, and Talleyrand himself. Inasmuch as the Congress of a century ago presented all the undesirable features—levity, intrigue, hidden negotiations, dynastic selfishness, and disregard of peoples—which it was hoped would be absent from the Paris Peace Conference of to-day, there is much of interest in these extracts. A much more valuable work, however, could have been written if they had been studied critically and combined with the other material as well as with the remarkable secret reports of Metternich's Vienna police, to which Fournier has called attention. Such a volume would have been no less interesting in connection with the Peace Conference and yet would have had a permanent historical value.

President P. R. Kolbe's "The Colleges in War Time and After" (Appleton) is a sketch of the many and diverse places which the colleges filled in the war.

Under such heads as "The Student Army Training Corps," "War Service of Technical Sciences," "Colleges for Women and the War," "College Finances during the War," and similar titles, is given a succinct interpretation of the educational conditions, forces, and mixed results. The book is rather material for history of the American colleges in this great struggle than a history itself. In fact one-third of the volume consists of appendices. What one misses in this interpretation is the element of that imagination which filled the mind and the heart of the student and graduate as he reflected upon his duty and as he went forth ready to die for his ideals.

A volume of memoirs of a score of young men who gave their lives in British uniform has been made up by E. B. Osborn under the title "The New Elizabethans" (Lane). It is a record of lives brief but complete, yet there is left a deep sense of the pity of it, which one would gladly seek to evade for the moment by picking a good-natured little quarrel with the editor over his choice of title. True, they lived hard and died young, these men, and they were all excellent in their several qualities, both by promise and performance; athletes, writers, others with their feet happily placed well along the road of the public service, all alert to the world in which they lived, they are excellently representative of that world. But why drag in the Elizabethans? If there is one thing common to the young men who went to the wars in our day, most strikingly so of the group drawn together in the present volume, it is that with perfectly clear perceptions they dropped what they were doing to help in the finishing, as soon as might be, of a peculiarly dirty but necessary job. No doubt the love of adventure played a part, and with the less thoughtful a great one. With your true Elizabethan it would have been the whole thing, that and a rather calculating consideration of how this particular adventure might be made to serve as a step in a personal career of fame and fortune, precisely the things that were furthest from the thoughts of the elect spirits in Mr. Osborn's chronicle. They, too, have their grandeur, but it is not a grandeur of manner, it is not Elizabethan; it is—well, Time will find a name if one is needed.

The Oxford University Press, American Branch, has very recently published "The Oxford History of India, from the earliest times to the end of 1911," by Vincent A. Smith; "The Reconstruction of Russia: essays edited by Sir Paul Vinogradoff"; and "A History of Kanarese Literature," by Edward P. Rice, all works of importance in their fields.

Mr. Yeats and Others

I FIND myself always re-trying the case of Mr. Yeats. Not that I rescind my verdict or that the poet offers new evidence. He is Mr. Yeats—the same imaginative, poetic, individual, and remarkable Mr. Yeats—with a finality that should impart finality to criticism. But while I repose on my verdict, I am restless in my plea. I have to re-convince myself that poems to which nature has been so generous should be so illiberal to readers, that a man whom the immortals so unmistakably wanted should have missed—or dismissed—immortality. I am not closing the door of the future on Mr. Yeats; I am not the keeper of that door: but I think, if he enters, he will enter, not as pure poet, but as playwright or herald to the march of tendency. In perusal his poems melt into the mind and melt out of it; his reputation may yield in like fashion to the solvent of time.

Why do the poems in the "Wild Swans at Coole" seem to be rather breathed than sung or spoken? Are they vague? A criticism that began with that assertion would be false. When Mr. Yeats writes of "the freckled man who goes to a grey place on the hill in grey Connemara clothes at dawn to cast his flies," he is as definite as Walter Scott. But Scott's grey man would last, would stay; even if goblin, he would be stable. But Yeats's grey man would vanish, if you turned your back; even if man, if angler, he would vanish. He is an image. All figures in good verse are images. But in normal poetry, for the moment at least, the image claims to be a fact. In Mr. Yeats that claim is wanting. His images may be sharp, may even be real; the disappointments and disillusionments on which these lyrics dwell with tempered bitterness are doubtless extracts from the acerbities of real experience. But the images are scarcely definable as true or false, because they aver nothing; they are, almost in the literal sense, phenomena. Mr. Yeats, in his preface, applies the word "phantasmagoria" to his own work. In a preface, this admission does not count; it is as harmless as the manager's confession in the foyer that the play is an illusion. But the same confession from an actor in his part would be a very different matter, and it is the misfortune or indiscretion of Mr.

THE WILD SWANS AT COOLE. By W. B. Yeats. New York: The Macmillan Company.
THE SONG OF THREE FRIENDS. By John G. Neihardt. New York: The Macmillan Company.
IN FLANDERS FIELDS. By John McCrae. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.
THE NEW DAY. By Scudder Middleton. New York: The Macmillan Company.
THE TREE OF LIFE. By John Gould Fletcher. New York: The Macmillan Company.
SONGS AND POEMS. By John Jay Chapman. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
SERVICE AND SACRIFICE. By Corinne Roosevelt Robinson. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
ESCAPE AND FANTASY. By George Rostrevor. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Yeats's poems that they openly agree with Mr. Yeats.

The mixture of nature and study in this poet is another curious and tormenting problem. In "Major Robert Gregory," on the whole the best poem in the volume, since a major can not be vaporized so readily as certain other things, he says: "What made us dream that he could comb grey hair?" The preciousity is undeniable, but it is a preciousity, which, if bred in the womb of artifice, has slept on the bosom of nature. Is it the product of the lamp? Yes; the lamplight falls upon the crossed and blotted page, but behind the lamplight the dawn is peeping through the shutter. Mr. Yeats has a courtliness that has turned rustic, has fed on berries and couched among bracken, and surprises you now and then in the wildness of the heath by some gesture evocative of the salon. There is a finely-touched pastoral called the "Sad Shepherd," in which the goatherd's diction is sometimes simple enough to have angered Pope, sometimes artful enough to have delighted Virgil.

The most stirring book on my table for the month, a book under whose impact that table almost reels, to the trepidation of its lighter contents, is Mr. John G. Neihardt's "Song of Three Friends." The "Song" confirms and enlarges the impression created a few years back by the "Song of Hugh Glass" and weakened or overlaid by the publication, in the interval, of work that rather dazzled than convinced the public. As novel in verse, its success is only partial; it moves slowly, its proportions are weak, and its events are undersized in relation to the setting and our anticipations. The characters as organisms are superb, and are drawn finely, but the passage from body to mind is like the transition from high-bred horse to horse-jockey. The epoch and the continent—the eighteenth-twenties and the Trans-Missouri—are the true protagonists in Mr. Neihardt's robust drama, and Fink, Carpenter, and Talbeau are merged in its vastness, like trappers turning into fly-specks on the slopes of Tacoma or Pike's Peak. The men are half aware of their littleness. Their life is a fury tempered with awe, and in Mr. Neihardt's own original and forcible conception there is something cosmic, or at least terrene, serving as counterpoise to the seismic or spasmic forms which energy is prone to take in his pages. His exertions are a little too manifest. The heat comes readily enough, and I should enjoy its geniality all the more if I were less vividly conscious of Mr. Neihardt in the basement shoveling coal into the furnace with feverish assiduity.

Mr. Neihardt writes an unconfined and fearless diction, and subjects the old courtly and posturing heroic couplet of Dryden and Pope to the sort of discipline which the tenderfoot is supposed to undergo at the hands of the unfeeling cowboy. He is intent on force rather than beauty, but the particles of beauty which fall in his way have the impressiveness of prayers on the lips of a highwayman. The passage I shall quote is among the quieter ones, but the strength is seen through the beauty like the rock beneath the mosses.

All day long the riders faced
A rolling, treeless, melancholy waste
Of yellow grass; for 'twas a rainless time,
Nor had the baby green begun to climb
The steep-kneed hills, but kept the nursing draws.
And knee to knee they rode with scarce a pause,
Save when the ponies drank; and scarce a word,
As though the haunting silence of a third,
Who rode between them, shackled either tongue.
And when along the sloughs the twilight flung
Blue haze, and made the hills seem doubly bleak,
They camped beside a songless little creek
That crawled among the clumps of stunted plum
Just coming into bud. And both sat dumb
Beside a mewling fire, until the west
Was darkened and the shadows leaped and pressed
About their little ring of feeble light.

Let me assure the people who find this passage tame that the book abounds in what they call vitality; Mr. Neihardt's fear of the commonplace amounts to panic. Greatness he has not reached in the "Song of Three Friends," but he has done an original and forcible thing.

In John McCrae's volume, the poem "In Flanders Fields" is supplemented by twenty-eight other poems, all short and lyrical. They are fit to be its retinue; not one of them perhaps could have headed a procession. They establish John McCrae's right to the authorship of "In Flanders Fields"; they prove that that poem was no accident, no gratuity of the indulgent fates. The poem itself sustains the test of re-perusal. It is not indeed the work of a man of exceptional poetic power. It is the work of a man of moderate poetic power in an exceptional moment. The rarities of minor poets are sometimes as precious as the normalities of major ones. The serene warning, the gentle authority, the melancholy challenge, of "In Flanders Fields" is a case in point.

The "Essay in Character," by Sir Andrew Macphail, has much the same function as the poetry—the function of attestation. Lieutenant-Colonel John McCrae, who died in France with the Canadian forces, was authorized by character and service to say for us what he has said in the "Flanders Fields" poem. The simple records do not lift John McCrae out of the class of normal men; they do what is far better—they lift the norm.

Mr. Scudder Middleton is a poet who interests me. He is metrist, artist, classicist, stylist; he has all the defenses and palings: but there is a door in the wall of his park that leads into the forest. He writes richly, but what might be called garish in another writer is temperate in Mr. Middleton, as the same coloring which is florid in tapestry is chaste in marble. Sometimes the emotional and intellectual content seems a little slender; sometimes the thoughts seem a little too obviously shrined and casketed. I feel in his verse, as in the prose tales of Mérimée, a proud repose which affects to disown the feeling that it unquestionably shelters. But the disclaimer is unavailing. Mr. Middleton has heard "the clear, new bugles blow Over the English lanes and Russian snow"; he has tenderness for those to whom "war gave The bullet and the sword for bread"; and he can breathe a warning, "The low satanic voice is in your ears," to the peoples for whom recreancy lies in wait on the very crown and summit of their magnanimities. In candor I should add that this volume may prove a slight disappointment to those readers for whom the "Clerk in Heaven" is the kernel of Mr. Middleton's poetical achievement.

I would not say that in the "Tree of Life" Mr. John Gould Fletcher had arrived. He has, however, set out. Even that step has the excitement of progression for a man who has wasted so much time in merely pacing up and down the station platform. The "Tree of Life" depicts the relations of two lovers in a dim, rhapsodic fashion, the vague plainness of which is shadowed forth in such titles as the "Aster Flower," "Fruit of Flame," "From Empty Days," "Dreams in the Night," and "Toward the Darkness." So near is 1919 to 1819, after all, that the dim yearnings in these poems might have served as accompaniment or undersong to the laments of Byron for Thyrza or the apostrophes of Shelley to Jane. One can not forget that the noun, "revolution," is related to the verb, "revolve." The feeling in Mr. Fletcher's latest poems is neither vital nor robust, but it is feeling, and it imparts a meaning to his verse which hitherto his verse has lacked and craved. His poems in the past have been stocked with sensuous pictures, but the imagery has been exhibited like merchandise on shelves, or, at best, like bric-à-brac on a mantelpiece, in meaningless and disconnected prominence. A change has taken place. What were flourishes have become characters. They are employed; they are ministrant; they serve an emotion.

Much of the writing in the "Tree of Life" is in the old unprofitable vein. We all know the affinity of thunder and cloud, and Mr. Fletcher, where he is not vague, is often violent. But moments arrive when he is neither violent nor vague. He can rise to a stroke of this quality: "Were the last kiss not bitter, the first would have been less sweet." In speaking of a weary soul's encounter with the beloved object in a spiritual world, he can say this: "Perhaps for a little while I might desire to seek you, but after I shall turn and hide my face," in which the justified reliance on the suggestiveness of a gesture is Dantesque. Were there not so many false dawns in literature, so many greys that are not the morning's eye, I should be tempted to say that in lines like the above the day broke for Mr. Fletcher.

If Mr. John Jay Chapman handles Victorian metres like a pupil rather than a master, he is the sort of pupil in whom masters delight. If the tradition is audible in his sentiments, it is chiefly that part of the tradition which has been vital enough to withstand the inroads of modernity—the patriotic part. Patriotism seems the enduring part of our moral vesture. Coat and trousers may show themselves out at elbows or out at knees, while the waistcoat which formed part of the original purchase is intact. A nation that acquired its outfit of patriotism, religion, and literature a half century or more ago finds its patriotism still usable while its religion and literature have fallen into disrepair. The flag is the one piece of cloth that is improved by becoming threadbare, and Mr. Chapman's high-hearted motto, "Love, Death, Our Country—Honor, Discipline" fits 1919 none the less for its consonance with 1861. Mr. Chapman is not a great poet, but he utters with dignity and taste, with measured and mellowed gravity, sentiments in which his countrymen avow their sonship to heroic ancestors.

Cleverness, like dulness, has its beaten paths. Much of Mrs. Robinson's work does not get beyond the beaten paths of cleverness, but she is capable of self-transcendence in rare moments of passionate analysis, moments that give an effect of high arrest or solemn pause before an emotion whose very intensity is tranquillizing. In this volume they are found in "If I Could Hold My Grief" and the two succeeding sonnets. Half the poems are amusing; the dedication and the prelude are funereal. The serious and the humorous are companionable enough, but the neighborhood of the facetious and the elegiac seems like mirth in funeral and dirge in marriage.

Mr. George Rostrevor, whose titles, "Escape and Fantasy" and "Stars and Fishes" are aromatic of his temper, has a good ear and a mellow, if light, voice. He has just seriousness enough to add the seasoning of variety to the blithe experiment of youth, and his poems are silvery in the half-light of a chastened mysticism.

O. W. FIRKINS

The British Press

THERE never was a time when the British public more needed the guidance of a thoughtful and responsible press, yet it is a feature of the age—an age of extraordinarily critical days, when the audience is sensitive and excitable—that the mainsprings of the London daily press are personal feelings and prejudice. The Morning Post and the Daily News, widely as they differ in every respect, are soaked with prejudice; honest it may be, but still one which prevents the consideration of any question of foreign or domestic policy on its merits. The Times, with its squire the Daily Mail, is neither more nor less than the reflection of the personal views of one man who has none of the temperament of the statesman and whose very success as a vendor of popular journalism is a sign that he is wholly unfitted to be a far-sighted national adviser. One can not say that in the case of the Times and the Daily Mail prejudice is at the bottom of the views, attacks, and defenses which are to be read in their columns. They are the expressions of a quick, changeable, energetic, and ambitious personality. The Daily Chronicle, which up to some months ago was unquestionably the honest exponent of the Liberalism of the centre, now apes an independence which is negated in every article that appears in its pages. It has become a new advocate of the Prime Minister. We are left with two morning papers only to complete this classification—the Daily Telegraph and the Express. The former, again, is personal, but it is unquestionably animated by public spirit, though, when a paper is the echo of personal views, the personality which inspires it must hold very definite opinions and be determined to press them on the public if it is to be an influential factor. The Daily Telegraph is like an honest man who has no very clear views and whose opinions are necessarily guarded and often doubtful. The Express, on the whole, is now the most independent of London morning papers, but as yet it does not appear to have the influence which its present individuality deserves. Of the evening papers the Westminster Gazette is the only sheet which even pretends to adequate discussion of foreign or domestic politics, and, able though it be, a certain mannerism, a tone of superior argumentativeness, detracts from the weight of its words. It is written, as the late Frederick Greenwood said of the first Pall Mall Gazette, by gentlemen for gentlemen. The stalwarts of the Liberal party prefer the gibes of Mr. Gardiner to the aphorisms of Mr. Spender.

Yet, while the daily press of London forms the daily reading of London and of the country and towns to the south of the metropolis, those who are at a distance from England should never forget that some organs of the provincial press are the guides of opinion to thousands of readers in the North and West. The Manchester Guardian, prejudiced also as it too often is, the Liverpool, Leeds, and Scotch papers, and some sheets in the West and in Wales are written, not only with great ability, but with a desire to express seasoned opinions. The English provincial press, in fact, for the purpose of discussion, whether of political or social questions, is more authoritative than the London press, which run on what may be called Northcliffe lines, has lost in power what it has gained in popularity. The circulation of weekly papers is so small compared to that of the daily papers that their influence is also less, though this influence should not be too strictly estimated by the number of copies which are sold. For they form the food of political and social apostles. Views which appear in the weekly papers are subsequently uttered in but slightly disguised form by persons who are listened to respectfully and who pride themselves on their thoughtfulness and originality. But in the main, the two same factors may be noted at the bottom of the opinions of the London weeklies. The Nation is even more prejudiced than the Daily News and is more the expression of one personality than the Times. The same may be said of the Saturday Review, which a superficial smartness makes pleasant light reading. The Spectator still lives on the traditions of Hutton and Townsend, but the acuteness, insight, and critical power which at the time made it so influential and interesting have disappeared. It is a common-sense organ for common-sense readers on Sunday morning. Perhaps, when one touches on Sunday, the Observer should have a word given to it. Here again we are in contact with one man, with an able, excitable personality. What one reads in the Observer is the views of Mr. Garvin. Of the New Statesman it is not unfair to say that its mild socialism is well blended with some measure of statesmanship.

A summary such as the foregoing may be regarded as superficial. Every summary, however, is necessarily superficial. But, if the statement that the British press is more largely the reflection of prejudices and personal feelings be correct, it is obvious that the public to which it is supplied has no safe guide in very difficult times. But, after all, the public has always had to take care of itself, and when Swift, writing of the negotiations which culminated in the Peace of Utrecht, said the country must have peace be it a bad or a good one, he was just as unsafe a guide to the readers of Queen Anne's times as are the journalists whose views eventually become the opinions of large numbers of British electors. The storekeeper and the newspaper proprietor, now alike, supply the wares which are acceptable to the majority of their customers.

E. S. ROSCOE

London, June 7

Anne Thackeray Ritchie

WITH the passing of Lady Ritchie the last link connecting us intimately with Thackeray's life has snapped, and all possibility of that inimitable biography which might have been is at an end. Lives of Thackeray have been written and more undoubtedly will be written, but his daughter alone could have given us his real portrait. That she did not undertake it was of course because it would have been against his expressed wish. A weighty enough reason, except that where such intimate glimpses of his life and character have already been revealed as in her own memoirs and in his published letters to Mrs. Brookfield, the consecutive story of his life from Lady Ritchie's pen would have been rather the amplification of material already familiar than a revelation of new facts. Had Thackeray realized how inevitable biographers of his life were to be, he might well have chosen her to chronicle it rather than others, since, not only was he the kind of man to have preferred a true account, but he also esteemed her literary powers highly.

In 1848, when she was only ten years old, he wrote to Mrs. Brookfield, "I have got a letter from Annie, so clever, humorous and wise, that it is fit to be printed in a book." And when her first paper, "Little Scholars," was ready for the Cornhill, he is reported to have said: "When I read it, I blubbered like a child; it was so good, so simple, so honest; and my little girl wrote it, every word of it." At that time, too, according to Melville, he tried to convince Dean Hole "that Annie can write ten times more cleverly than I."

Anne Thackeray, early in life, was evidently ambitious to write well and suffered the customary discouragement of budding authors, for in her recollections of Browning she gives a veiled account of herself as a failure and tells how much he once encouraged her by reminding her of the epitaph of the Roman lady who sat at home and spun wool. "All in good time," he said. "You must spin your wool some day, every woman has wool to spin of some sort or another." And she goes on to say, "I went home feeling quite impressed with the little speech, it had been so gravely and kindly made. My blurred pages looked altogether different somehow. It was spinning wool—it was not wasting one's time, one's temper—it was something more than spoiling paper and pens." Farther on she adds, "Never has anything given more trouble or seemed more utterly hopeless than those early incoherent pages, so full of meaning to one's self, so absolutely idiotic in expression. In later life the words come easily, only too readily; but then it is the meaning which lags behind."

Between the years 1863 and 1885 she published twelve volumes, all fiction, with the exception of a life of Madame de Sévigné. Of these perhaps the best known are "Old Kensington" and "Miss Angel," which latter is the story of Angelica Kaufmann. But her most successful work was to be more subjective. In 1893 she wrote her "Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, Browning," and in 1894 she published the slight volume of reminiscences known as "Chapters from Some Memoirs," which of all her books is perhaps the one most sure to live. In it she gives a series of vignettes of herself and her sister in the early days at Kensington with their father, with their grandparents in Paris, or on some trip abroad. These little sketches are done with a light touch, are full of fancy and quaint humor, and have a charm that is always fresh, for in each she has etched in some well-remembered character or caught some distinctive atmosphere, so that they remain in the memory almost as if the things they tell of had been personally experienced. Fourteen years later, she published "The Blackstick Papers," a collection of varied essays, mainly literary, each admirable in its way and all permeated with the unconscious distinction of her own individuality, although less personal in substance than the contents of the earlier volume.

In many ways she had exceptional opportunities for gathering material for work of this kind, for during her father's lifetime people of note were constantly at their house and Thackeray also took her and her sister about with him a great deal. We meet most of the famous Victorians in her pages: the Carlyles, the Brownings, the Kembles, and the Dickens; Leach, Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Gaskell. What is more, their portraits are never pompously drawn for us as notables, but are touched with little intimate accounts of characteristic incidents and peculiarities.

It will always be a matter of regret to those who appreciate the quality of Lady Ritchie's later books that she did not write more of the same kind. The reason is most probably to be found in the fact that the realities of life consumed so much of her time and energy as to leave her little margin for her own pursuits, since much of her life seems to have been given to the service of others. Leslie Stephen, at whose home she went on living after her sister's death until her own marriage in 1877, wrote of her: "My sister-in-law, Miss Thackeray, continued to live with me, and she is one of the most lovable of women. I never knew any one who was like her—I may almost say in kind, not to speak of degree. She has, that is, a genius for sympathy, and has a greater capacity for loving many people, and yet loving sincerely and warmly, than I have ever known."

We get an amusing glimpse of Lady Ritchie's kindly disposition in Mr. Edmund Gosse's description of how he and R. L. Stevenson, when they were very young, once went to dine with Leslie Stephen and were the only guests. After describing the rather melancholy appearance of their host, he says: "The dinner was extremely quiet. Scarcely a word fell from either of the Stephens, and we two guests, although chatterboxes engrained, were subdued to silence by shyness. Only Miss Thackeray, in her hospitable goodness, did her best to talk for us all, and in the twilight—for the room and table were meagrely illuminated by two or three candles—her voice was heard, holding a sort of dialogue with itself."

In "The Blackstick Papers" Lady Ritchie wrote: "It seems a pity when books pass away, as they undoubtedly do, delightful books worthy to be remembered. One day everybody is reading them and living in their pages, then their voice is silent suddenly and heard no more among us; they are mysteriously shelved—forgotten—consigned to oblivion." Her own best work may escape such a fate, since to be able to make the immediate yesterday of social history—which is wont to seem a little stale and out of date to the generation following immediately on its heels—vivid and fresh is a service which is recognized and usually rewarded.

B. U. BURKE

Books Received

FICTION

Ibañez, V. B. La Bodega. Dutton. $1.90 net.

ART

Studies in East Christian and Roman Art. Part II. A Gold Treasure of the Late Roman Period. University of Michigan Studies. Macmillan.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Crowe, J. R. Pat Crowe, Aviator, New York. Nicholas L. Brown. $1.50 net.

Thomson, E. H. The Life and Letters of William Thomson, Archbishop of York. Lane.

Hazen, C. D. Fifty Years of Europe. Holt.

French, Viscount. 1914. Houghton Mifflin. $6 net.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion.

Vol. 1, No. 8

New York, Saturday, July 5, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	155
Editorial Articles:
The President Returns	157
Thoughts for Independence Day	158
Revolution, New Style	159
The Wickedness of Invested Wealth	160
The Passing of the Bartender	161
The Rifle in the Army	161
The Fall of Princes. By A. J. Barnouw	162
Is There a Huge "Social Surplus"? By A. O. Lovejoy	163
Has Civilization Failed? By H. de W. F.	165
Correspondence	165
Book Reviews:
Brand Whitlock's Picture of Invaded Belgium	167
Scientific City Government	168
Hit the Superman	168
"Straight Goods"	169
A Partly Reformed Rebel	170
The Run of the Shelves	171
Poetry:
The Fête of the Snore. By Clement Wood	172
The Canadian Situation. By J. K. F.	172
A Voice from France. By T. M. Parrott	173
Books and Debarkation. By William Adams Bladé	174

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

THE President's cabled address on the peace treaty gave an impetus to the process of bringing to a focus the various currents of opinion concerning the League Covenant. A development of quite special importance is the expression by Senator McCumber of his belief that it will be necessary for the Senate to adopt "explanatory reservations" respecting some features of the Covenant in its ratification of the treaty. Mr. McCumber was the one Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee who stood out against the Knox resolution. His position was so emphatic as to show beyond question that he would adhere to it. His present statement is in no way in conflict with that position. It indicates clearly his readiness to support that one of Mr. Root's reservations which takes out of the League's control the Monroe Doctrine and any question that the United States may regard as purely domestic. It is not so clear where he would stand on the reservation which makes absolute the right to leave the League on two years' notice, nor on the first of Mr. Root's reservations, which eliminates Article X of the Covenant. What Mr. McCumber desires—and the same desire, we believe, will in the end determine the stand of a decisive number of Republican Senators—is to meet any serious objection to the Covenant that can be met without breaking up the settlement, but to go no farther than this. If leading Democrats and leading Republicans were to meet halfway in a genuine effort honestly to determine how this can be done, they would remove a stumbling block which threatens great mischief. To all who may meet the issue in this patriotic spirit the whole country, without distinction of party, will do honor.

NORTH DAKOTA, as a result of the popular vote on the programme offered by the Non-Partisan League, has undertaken our first experiment in some sort of State socialism. Of the seven measures voted upon, the operation of those creating a State bank, establishing an official newspaper in each county, and providing for State elevators will be watched with the most interest. Are they designed mainly to increase the power of the League? The political methods of A. C. Townley are so well known that one is right to be suspicious of proposals from him which centralize authority. That a majority of 7,000 or more was obtained for the League's programme while its leader was on trial for sedition does not conclusively prove that the measures have been considered entirely on their merits. To offset his irregular methods, Townley has long used the arts of the spell-binder, and he has succeeded in capturing the imagination of the State. Like many of our Eastern radicals he has kept out of pigeonholes. He is not a socialist, oh no, because socialism includes government ownership of land, and the threat of such an arrangement would estrange his best supporters, the farmers. But he stands for the taking over of other sorts of property, and if the North Dakota farmer is like other rural Americans, he will soon begin to ask just how far this here system intends to go. Once let it point towards State management of the farm, and it is likely to come tumbling down upon the head of its author.

THE Nation repeats: "The world is henceforth divided into two camps, radicals and reactionaries; the real, true revolution which is to free humanity has but begun. It ought to come without violence and force, but come it will." That is, if you don't believe in a real, true, imminent proletarian millennium, you must necessarily believe in slavery, the Inquisition, "l'etat c'est moi," and all that kind of thing. There is no possible middle ground. And furthermore, if you don't help us in whooping up this real, true revolution, there'll be no meal ticket for you when it comes.

CONSUL EMBRY'S account of Bolshevik atrocities in Siberia will be read with feelings akin to those which were aroused by the Bryce report on the German terror in Belgium. As in the case of Belgium, so in that of Russia, the flood of tales of horror coming from miscellaneous sources did not in itself suffice to remove doubt; not until the evidence came in the authoritative form which the Bryce Commission gave to it did those finally become convinced who were desperately anxious not to be convinced. Mr. Embry's statement is only that of one man; but he is United States Consul at Omsk and has just returned from a service of eight months in that city, during nearly all of which time he was in charge of American affairs there. What he tells us is the result of his own observation and investigation. That it is substantially correct few will doubt; certainly it will be so accepted by all fair-minded men unless there be adduced some positive reason to question it. Mere general assertions that "we get nothing but lies from Russia," that "we don't hear the other side," etc., will not go down in the face of such evidence as this.

IT is impossible to do justice to Consul Embry's account of the Siberian atrocities by any brief summary. It is the appalling volume of horrors, as well as their barbarous character, that makes the story so frightful. One item may, however, serve to give an idea of the extent of the murderous slaughter:

Kurgan is a city of perhaps 35,000 people. It, too, was one of the cities liberated by the Kolchak advance. I officially know it to be a fact that while in control of that city the Bolsheviks murdered at one time—that is, at a single wholesale execution—more than 1,500 citizens of that place.

Other passages are more horrifying because they enter into the details of the barbarism—a barbarism that recognized no claim of age, or sex, or personal worth, or religious sanctity. And yet we shall doubtless continue to be told by the heralds of the new day that everything we read about Bolshevik atrocity is the product of a lying capitalist press.

UNDER the Prohibition Enforcement bill the possession, as well as the manufacture, sale, transportation, etc., of liquor, is forbidden from the time the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution goes into effect. But on wading through its ten thousand words, more or less, one discovers that "to possess liquors in one's private dwelling" is not forbidden. However, let no one rejoice prematurely. For, firstly, "the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor to prove that the liquor was lawfully acquired and possessed"; secondly, "every person legally permitted under this title to have liquor shall report to the Commissioner, within ten days after the passage of this title, the kind and amount of intoxicating liquor in his possession"; and thirdly, the Commissioner is required to file all this information "in a permanent record alphabetically arranged, and to permit any and all persons desiring to do so to inspect the said statements at any time during office hours." We have no quarrel with the stringency of these provisions; if the country really means business this, no doubt, is the sort of thing that must be done. But it isn't pretty; and it is not long since every red-blooded American would have pronounced it outrageous and intolerable. However, we have made our bed, and it is not surprising if we have to lie in it. But what does interest us is this question: If this bill had been drawn by the Anti-Saloon League before instead of after the amendment had been passed, could the amendment have been passed?

THE New York World has been almost alone among the influential newspapers of the country in its stout fight against national prohibition. Its opposition was based upon great principles—the principle of personal liberty, the principle of local self-government, and the principle that the Constitution of the United States should not be degraded, but remain the fundamental charter that it has been during all our history. Now that the fight has been lost, it does not pretend to be pleased with the result or abate a jot of its scorn for the way in which that result was brought about. All the more weight, therefore, attaches to its urging all men to accept the fact and refrain from any attempt to defy the law. "The despicable cowardice of legislatures, national and state," as well as "the secret methods, the bullying lobbies, and the flagrant contempt of popular rights, of the Anti-Saloon League" and "the almost inconceivable blunders of the entire liquor interest," come in for the World's retrospective denunciation, but it winds up with this warning as to the present:

Only one thing is needed to round out this sorry record in complete shame, and that is wide-spread defiance of law. Strong drink is doomed after next January, anyway. If those who profit by it wish to insure the same fate for light wine and beer they will work logically and unfailingly to that end by becoming lawbreakers.

This is advice which all sensible persons will approve, and which it is to be hoped few will be so foolish as not to follow.

ONE of the horrors of war—and by no means the least of them—is the spectacle of the discharged soldier begging his bread. The sort of thing that plagued Europe at the close of the Napoleonic Wars we were spared after our own Civil War by reason of the enormous undeveloped resources of the country, whose bounties were for all who would lay hold of them with energetic hand. Just at the moment we can not afford too confidently to abandon the returned soldier to his economic fate. Now that the war assumes something of the aspect of history, the man who left desk, counter or bench to help to make it, stands a bit hesitatingly, his new-bought trousers flapping dismally about unaccustomed shins, as he gazes at the eddying life in which he must again find his place. It is a moment at which he may too readily come to taste the bitterness of wondering whether it was all worth while; it is a moment at which he can be mightily comforted by finding that his old place is waiting him if he wants it. His employer was proud to display a flag starry with the hope that went forth to do battle for us; he should be even more proud to give a welcome to the man who was most worthily his personal representative in the high places of the field. A little thoughtfulness now will tide us over a situation and prevent it from becoming acute. Presently, it may be confidently hoped, business expansion will reach a point at which special considerateness of the soldier will no longer be necessary. At the moment he not only deserves but needs it. All employers who have not already done so are asked to communicate their willingness to help to Arthur Woods, Assistant to the Secretary of War, and receive in return the right to display on the service flag of the firm the shield of the United States.

NEITHER the protagonists nor their cosmic audience were in any mood for heroics when it came to the final signing and sealing of the treaty. It was a grim and necessary business to be got through with as rapidly as possible.

The mirrors reflected no such resplendent uniforms nor rattled in their gilt at the resounding "Hochs" as on a former occasion. The Germans departed protesting through the back door and Clémenceau, Lloyd George and Wilson lost themselves in the crowd. Of all the actors in the quiet drama one would have been most willing to have a place among the doughboys and Tommies who lined the hall. For them truly the end crowned the work. And for most of the world it is, with all its faults, about the kind of peace that was expected, and is correspondingly welcomed. Those who have already preceded the German envoys through the back door of an inevitable disillusion have now the privilege of railing at the iniquities of the peace while they enjoy its benefits.

MR. HENRY HOLT'S Unpopular Review changes its name with the July number to The Unpartizan Review. We know how to appreciate the difficulties of finding a name that will please everybody. And in this case we boggled a moment over the phonetic z. But we know what Mr. Holt means by his new title; on the etymological principle of lucus a non lucendo he will continue to wield pike and partizan sturdily in support of good sense and the relish of whatever else is good in life.

GENERAL SIBERT, Director of Chemical Warfare, left a big and painful question-mark in the minds of not a few Americans when he recently said before the Senate Military Committee that while gas was responsible for 30 per cent. of the American casualties in France only 4 per cent. of those affected died, that the gas left no bad effect upon those who recovered, and that he looked upon it as the most humane element in modern war. Many American families have brothers, fathers or sons who are fighting a slow and dangerous battle with the terrible after-effects of gas on the lung tissues which many physicians have said will show themselves under certain conditions for years afterward. A world that is experiencing these things now and that has joined in universal condemnation of the cruelty of Germany is first

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by
THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

using this terrible weapon of modern war will not find it easy to accept General Sibert's statement, and in any case will want further light on a question which had seemed entirely settled.

THE representatives of the magnesite industry, the dye industry and the chemical glass industry, the tungsten producers, and the manufacturers of medical and surgical instruments have all recently been filing their pleas with the Government for tariff protection in face of the expected resumption of German competition. These industries and many others of vital relation to the needs of American life, and to our independence in time of war need as well, have achieved a start during the abnormal conditions of the war period and are on a fair way to success. On general grounds it is clear that the restoration of competitive conditions which obtained before the war may in some or all cases mean the wiping out of these important beginnings. But it is important to remember also that in no industry and in no nation is the status quo ante going to be completely restored. Every industry will face the necessity of adjusting itself to conditions which in almost every phase are new. It is clearly impossible to approach the questions of tariff policy involved in these cases with any political principles or prejudice derived from pre-war conditions. Each case will have to be met and dealt with on its own merits in the light of the new situation, in the spirit of scientific, point for point, adjustment.

TWO hundred years ago John Gay wrote a poem which, as the school-boy of every age but our own knows, was called "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London." Being abroad in the streets was a dangerous business even then, but danger threatened chiefly one's carefully curled wig, one's silken hose, one's peach-bloom waistcoat. There was the gushing spout, the swollen kennel, unpleasant contact with a greasy proletariat, or too slow a retreat to the protection of the wall when the upper windows discharged libation to the goddess Cloacina. But as against traveller by coach, or chair, or boat, Gay counted the pedestrian happy:

O ye associate walkers, O my friends,
Upon your state your happiness attends.

Why? Chiefly, apparently, because the pedestrian ran less risk of catching cold! The poet would nowadays doubtless be anxious to revise his estimate of the pedestrian's beatitude. With more wayfarers killed last year in the streets of New York than lost their lives on the Lusitania, brayed at by the passing horn in every form of noise that the ingenuity of man can devise, threatened at every crossing by the headlong vans of a paternalistic Post Office Department, the lot of the surviving associate walkers is not happy. But neither is that of the millionaire who undertakes to navigate his flivver through the reefs and eddies of an uncharted humanity.

Something must be done to systematize the rules of the game on both sides. Meliorative proposals are in the air. Let them receive most thoughtful consideration. The suggestion that it be made an offense for pedestrians to cross the street at other than specified points might, if reasonably enforced, accomplish something. And let no pedestrian hold himself chicken-hearted in thus submitting to an invasion of his personal rights; this is his chance to show his intellectual superiority to other bipeds. The suggestion, too, that motorists form themselves into a sort of League of Caution promises well for the gradual weeding out of the driver who mistakes the wheel of his motor for that of destiny itself, his trump for Gabriel's. Better still, perhaps, would be an arrangement by which every citizen should, at least once a year, at the public expense if necessary, propel a motor through the street and learn what fools pedestrians can be, and every motorist at least once a week be made to pick his way through the accumulated fenders and exhausts of traffic, learning to hate his fellow who drives without consideration. In any case, the streets may quickly enough be made safe for democracy with the exercise of a little consideration on both sides. Tradition is of rapid growth.

HARVARD and Dartmouth have the right idea—compulsory athletics. Getting the cheering section out into the field to exercise something besides their lungs is only part of it, though a good part. The rest of it is more subtle, very subtle indeed. In the old days the undergraduate was drilled in Latin, Greek, and mathematics until a romp through the whole course of English literature proffered all the invitation of stimulatingly forbidden fruit. Since literature was put on the list of prescribed studies it has become a task even less palatable, if only because less exacting, than the trivium of our fathers or our elder selves. And there was nothing left by way of relaxation save athletics. Now the situation is to be reversed. The student wearied by the exactions of a not too considerate nor literate athletic coach, will he not repair with delight to the mellow professor and his healing discourse on Plato, will he not cut his compulsory athletics to steal a delicious golden hour by himself in an alcove of the library? The secret is, more prescribed athletics and still more, and no prescribed literature. Truly, said the wise man, the ways of skinning the millennial cat are many and delightful.

The President Returns

WITH the peace treaty signed, President Wilson returns to his country after seven months of strenuous labor and extraordinary vicissitudes. What he expected to accomplish when he set out upon his great undertaking we can judge only from his public utterances of that time; what he actually accomplished we are still less in a position to judge with confidence. The verdict of history is not in all cases sure to be more accurate than that of contemporary men, but in the matter of the negotiations and conferences at Versailles much will unquestionably be known, even in the near future, that is now at most matter of probable conjecture. Nevertheless, it is clear that between the Wilson who landed in France last December and the Wilson who left her shores the other day a great gulf is fixed.

The President himself bears remarkable testimony to this change in the following message sent by him to the London Daily Mail on the eve of sailing:

Many things crowd into the mind to be said about the peace treaty, but the thought that stands out in front of all others is that by the terms of the treaty the greatest possible measure of compensation has been provided for people whose homes and lives were wrecked by the storm of war, and security has been given them that the storm shall not arise again.

In so far as we came together to insure these things, the work of the conference is finished, but in a larger sense its work begins to-day. In answer to an unmistakable appeal, the league of nations has been constituted and a covenant has been drawn which shows the way to international understanding and peace.

We stand at the crossroads, however, and the way is only pointed out. Those who saw through the travail of war the vision of a world made secure for mankind must now consecrate their lives to its realization.

This is the language of a man who clings to his vision, but from whom its glamour has departed. It is not of a completed work that he speaks, but of a work which "in a larger sense begins to-day"; a work the achievement of which will require that men "consecrate their lives to its realization." And even this is less significant of the sobered state of Mr. Wilson's mind than is his confession that "the thought that stands out in front of all others" is not the thought of the magnificent structure of the League, but the thought of the reparation and guarantees "for people whose homes and lives were wrecked by the storm of war"—which, from the very beginning, had been declared by the Allies to be the indispensable condition of peace.

That Mr. Wilson has adjusted himself to what he found to be the unescapable facts of the situation is ground for praise, not blame. Nor have those who realized from the start that his expectation of an ideal peace were impossible any ground for exultation in the demonstration that they were right in their judgment. Such a peace as Mr. Wilson desired would be infinitely better than the peace we have got. That peace, he declared in his speech of September 27, 1918, must embody "not only impartial justice but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with"; and he was right enough in saying that only in the case of such a peace can it "be made certain that the agreements of the peace will be honored and fulfilled." Unfortunately for the world, however, the demands of "impartial justice" were found to be incompatible with "the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with"; and it is this incompatibility, and not any want either of skill or of sincerity on President Wilson's part, that accounts for the tremendous gap between his expectations and the accomplished fact.

Still another circumstance of the closing days of Mr. Wilson's stay in France deserves note in this connection. It is authoritatively stated that the President has entered into an agreement—subject of course to ratification by the Senate—under which the United States and Great Britain are pledged to come promptly to the aid of France in case of unprovoked attack by Germany. We are most heartily in favor of such an agreement. It is a natural outcome of the great war, and of our part in it. It does not show that the League of Nations is impotent, but only that it is not omnipotent, and that in any case its future is as yet uncertain. But if we turn to that same speech of September 27, 1918, we find that this agreement is in flat violation of the programme which the President formulated under five numbered heads. The third of these is: "There can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the League of Nations." Of course Mr. Wilson was then thinking of a League which—as he still put it in his Manchester speech on December 30, 1918—was "a combination of all of us." But the special agreement with France is necessary not because Germany is not as yet a member of the League, but because, member or no member, she feels not "satisfied," but infinitely aggrieved, and would have been so even if the terms of peace had been vastly less severe than they are. Here again Mr. Wilson is to be praised, not blamed, for accepting the compulsion of unescapable facts.

It is not merely for the purpose of retrospect that we take this backward glance. The President has before him a task in which there enters something of the same distinction between abstract ideas and concrete facts, between world-embracing visions and national demands.

We would not prejudge the case that he may make out in favor of accepting the League Covenant without a jot or tittle of reservation. But it will be most unfortunate if he should undertake to press for this either upon the basis merely of general assertions or upon the strength of his own personal prestige. That partisanship, that even personal enmity or dislike, has played its part in the demand for reservations, is true enough; but to charge that this demand, or even hostility to the League idea, is animated wholly by such feelings, is a gross libel upon thousands of Americans of sterling patriotism, unimpeachable sincerity, and unquestionable intelligence. With outright opposition to the League, such as Senator Borah's or Senator Johnson's, Mr. Wilson can, of course, do little or nothing. It is impossible to prove that the League will prevent war and promote justice; the man who, after all these months of discussion, feels certain that on the contrary it will stir up war and perpetuate injustice can not be converted by mere logic. But with those who wish to give the League every chance for success, and yet who see in it possibilities of evil that might by careful procedure be eliminated, the case is very different.

Indeed, there is no little resemblance between the position of those Americans who insist upon special reservations for America and those Frenchmen who insisted upon a special supplementary treaty for France. To absolute believers in the League Covenant, the fears of the French were imaginary; but it was felt, nevertheless, that nothing could allay these fears except a specific guarantee of protection. It would be absurd to say that the state of mind of Americans in regard to the Monroe Doctrine, or immigration, or the possibility of being called on to fight in the Balkans, is like the state of mind of the French in relation to the German terror. But to dismiss the apprehensions professed by Americans on those subjects either as false pretense or as mere folly is to fly in the face of facts. The American people, we feel sure, are, by a decisive majority, in favor of the nation shouldering the responsibilities that it must assume if it is to play a worthy part in preserving the peace of the world; but while they recognize that the time for national isolation is over, they do not forget that our freedom from European imbrolios has been invaluable in the past, not only for ourselves but for all the world. And they are not prepared to throw away the benefits of that freedom for the future, except to such extent as is demonstrably necessary for the securing of supremely important ends.

It is this demonstration that it is now incumbent upon Mr. Wilson to furnish. Let him not plant himself upon the ground of an assumed infallibility, but show himself ready to enter into the feelings of those who question his position. If he can not yield anything to their objections, let him show that his refusal is due not to a preconceived determination, but to the demonstrated necessities of the situation; and if he can yield, let him do so with good grace and in a spirit of coöperation. All this may be too much to hope; but it is along this line that, in our judgment, a speedy and satisfactory ending of the controversy is to be sought. Mr. Wilson may seek it in another way. He may, as he has done in the past, meet opposition with sheer defiance; and he may win. But it is also possible that he may lose, and in that case it will be little comfort to him, or to the country, to put the blame on the "wilfulness" of his opponents. How great a stake all the world has in the speedy ratification of the peace treaty, only the most thoughtless can fail to realize. To do all that can rightfully be done to bring about this great end is a duty that rests not only upon Republicans, but also upon Democrats—not only upon the Senate, but also upon the President.

Thoughts For Independence Day

FOR the first time in one hundred and forty-three years the anniversary of our independence finds the principles of our Republic on the defensive. Still believed in by the silent majority that actually rules the nation, a vociferous minority is seeking to discredit the principles of individualism and representation foreshadowed in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Constitution, as well as the motives and ability of the Americans who conceived these charters of our liberties. To hundreds of thousands of new citizens and aliens, to thousands of agitators of old American stock, our political tradition is valueless. For inspiration they look to European sages of yesterday, for example they look to Soviet Russia of to-day. What our fathers thought and their sons have wrought for four generations is condemned as so much blunder or hypocrisy. We should do ill to celebrate the day when we declared ourselves a free nation without taking into account the multitudes who believe we are not free; without considering gravely what grounds there are for alarm and for hope.

Our chief ground for resolute hopefulness is confidence in the intelligence and morality of the bulk of our workingmen. We believe that they see that to amend particular grievances by upsetting civilization really pays no one in the long run. We feel that they regard our system of representative government as just in principle and flexible in application, that they are willing to assume the responsibilities of citizenship and to assent to the restraints of law. We are satisfied that they see the remedies for their ills rather in the ballot and legislation than in riot and confiscation; rather in the lawful activities of their own unions than in terrorism.

We are certain also that the mass of American workmen do not subscribe to the falsehood that labor is the sole producing class. The sons of ingenious American sires know well that invention, management, and capital have a large share in production and must, like labor, be paid for under whatever political or industrial system. We are sure that representative American labor will continue to assert its claims as against the inventor, manager, and capitalist along lines of honorable negotiation under the sanction of law, expecting not a Utopian finality, but a reasonable going balance between conflicting yet adjustable interests. We know that American labor has witnessed a great advance towards the limitation of undue profits, towards its own personal protection, and the legal maintenance of its rights and dignity. American labor, in our opinion, will not lightly forsake the course of law and negotiation which promises so hopefully and has already achieved so much.

Such is our confidence, and without it we should indeed despair. If the majority of American workmen are not of this mind, the case for civilization and for democracy is already lost. It would be idle to argue, or organize, or threaten, or do anything but await with resignation the impending ruin. For American labor is going to settle this question for itself. It is being arbitrated not by journalists and agitators, but by the moral standards and common sense of individuals. We do not believe that American labor will arrogate to itself in the specious name of comradeship all the good will and justice in the nation. It knows that trickery and rectitude, cruelty and kindness, insight and stupidity are pretty evenly distributed throughout mankind from poorest to richest. For this reason American labor is not likely to push a perfectly legitimate class consciousness to any fanatical extreme. It is just and hardheaded enough to cope with a world of diverse opportunities, talents, and rewards. Moreover, skilled labor in America has possessions and vested interests for which it has toiled and which it accordingly values. The heart of such labor may be proletarian, the head is bourgeois.

If this is the mood of American labor, it is the duty of invention, management, capital, to meet it half-way. Here we mean not coddling and doles for labor, but a more frank and considerate discussion of common interests. A fuller publicity will do much to allay discontent. In its own interest, capital and management must be prepared to demonstrate the rightfulness of any apparently inordinate profits, while labor should be prepared to accept such wages as a business will bear. Labor, whether organized or individual, should have all reasonable opportunity for conference with its employers. Where a practical system can be worked out, profit-sharing should be introduced, and many American employers are seeking such a community of interest with their employees. On all sides we must learn to temper competition and class conflict with fairness; we must welcome any method that experience shows to be workable for bringing about a fuller understanding, by employers and employed alike, of matters of mutual interest. The experiment of systematic conference for this purpose with duly chosen representatives of the employees has already been tried with success by a number of American manufacturers; and while it must be recognized that for such success tact and patience are necessary on both sides, these will be forthcoming if both sides approach the problem in a spirit of sincere good will. And it is upon the strengthening of this spirit that we must rest our hope of the nation's future.

Revolution, New Style

THE preaching of revolution is becoming a favorite indoor sport. Commissioner of Immigration Howe presides at a pro-Soviet mass meeting, and is not even reprimanded. A Federal official need no longer be old-fashioned enough to decline to consider the overturn of the Constitution under which he serves. The Bolshevik "Ambassador," Herr Martens—since he was recently enrolled as a German citizen in England—is an honored guest at a meeting in Madison Square Garden, where protest is made against the raiding of his "embassy suite" by the New York police. Comrade Dennis E. Batt urged a jail delivery for "Debs and the other comrades who languish in prison." Mrs. Rose Pastor Stokes, lately condemned for disloyal activities, hoped the Social Revolution would come with "as little violence as possible," but insisted that "the opposition must yield or else it must be crushed." Comrade C. E. Rothenberg showed how "we can sweep this government out of existence." Mr. Max Eastman, prudently keeping within the law, rebuked the President for waging a "private war" in Siberia.

It has been the custom of England and America to ignore these performers in wild and whirling words. The good sense of the people can be trusted to take such talk for what it is worth. This amiable attitude of laissez-faire had its justification so long as Americans were concerned all round. As to the meeting we have described, the police report that out of 6,000 present nine-tenths hardly understood the speeches in English. It is the presence of masses of aliens ignorant of our ideals or hostile to them, that makes the indoor sport of fomenting revolution far from tolerable. Former audiences at revolutionary meetings went to be amused and excited; to-day they mean business. This fact must change the attitude of the state and of law-respecting individuals. Both would do well to reconsider the whole morale of revolutionary agitation.

Since Grecian times revolution has been defended as a sacred right of oppressed peoples, but always on the supposition of an oppressor. Armed revolt and civil war were justified only on the theory that there was no peaceful redress for wrongs. Under all forms of absolutism that is true. Under free government every opinion which can obtain a majority may write itself into law and policy. In short, with the advent of democracy, the moral warrant dropped away from revolution. From being a high duty it became a political crime. For a citizenry which has the right of assembly and the ballot to rise in arms is merely to show that it is unwilling to play fair, is too impatient to live under its own laws while seeking to change them.

Thus heroics dropped out of revolution. It became an expression of political wrong-headedness, as in the Southern Confederacy; of lawless hatred, as in the Molly McGuire outrages; or of personal distress, as in the Italian bread riots of some fifteen years ago. Sporadic cases of armed violence there are always likely to be. Revolution in the grand style is obsolete. This has ever been the American view, that violence is intolerable in a state which lodges power in the people. The way of reform is not by clubs and stones but by gradual intelligent negotiation. Until lately nobody in America would have controverted this position; now hundreds of thousands of new Americans are in favor of direct action. England hears mutterings of revolution. Winnipeg has its political strike. France and Italy, with singularly free institutions, are constantly threatened with riotous revolt. A great deal of this is due to transient distress following the war, but the lawless tendency is sedulously fomented by wrong thinking in intellectually high places.

At the moment when, through the general liberation of Europe in 1848, political revolution reached its high tide, morally exhausting itself through its own success, a new and questionable warrant was contrived. This was the theory of class warfare. Democracy is of no use to the workingman, was the argument, because the political cards are always stacked against him by the capitalist. His only permanent relief is the social revolution. Meanwhile the radical and socialist parties engaged in politics, and in all the free nations gradually beat out desirable reforms. Socialists actually dominated the law-making of France and Italy. They showed that the cards were not stacked. But the game itself was slow and intricate. A certain number of hasty reformers have ever been unable to make political men of themselves. It is they who have tried to keep alive, against the logic of democratic facts, the old moral warrants of revolution. To what was a heroic doctrine, that tyranny justifies extremest measures, they gave a twist semi-comic—but serious enough in its effects—that any kind of delay in achieving a needed social reform warrants an appeal to force. Revolution thus becomes a speeding-up measure. It is always in order when things don't go fast enough to please the most advanced thinker.

Such theorists as Mr. Bertrand Russell and such papers as the Nation are constantly intimating that political revolution is on the whole a normal and reasonable way of doing business. Of course they don't come out into the open with such a sentiment, but they express it through a kindly attitude toward particular revolutionary acts. Their emphasis is set not on training men to patience, but on encouraging the vital élan that expresses itself in club-law.

Such a notion is simply an irrational survival, a bad moral habit. By the same token the Naples Camorra and the Sicilian Mafia continue a rule of terror, simply because terror was once the only effective weapon of the humble against the tyrannies that used to be. A republic is no place for a revolutionist. For years the United States has tolerated sporadic preaching of revolution only because it was negligible. To-day that is not the case. While the propagandists of Bolshevism are working actively with our foreign-born population, the ladylike radical press warns us that nobody is convinced by bayonets and machine guns. Plainly a machine gun is not in order every time a fanatic mounts a soap box or circulates a treasonable pamphlet. As plainly no government can afford to tolerate widespread sedition. There is no right or privilege to preach law-breaking.

Those who are too impatient to wait on the orderly processes of political agitation and law-making have no place among us. For the merely ignorant, all patience is needed and trust in the gradual processes of education. With traitors and avowed foes the case is different. Return them to the countries whence they came, countries which are at present enjoying any advantage that inheres in revolutionary violence.

The Wickedness of Invested Wealth

"ETHEL'S latest is that we must both earn our living by work, for we have no right to the income from our investments," writes an English widow, the mother of a high-minded daughter. This state of mind is not uncommon nowadays. Rarely, to be sure, does it result in actual abandonment of the unholy privileges of wealth; but the conviction itself is undoubtedly sincere. If every profession of principle were judged by its accordance with the conduct of the professor, reformers would by no means be the only persons that would have to bear the brand of insincerity.

It is not in moral but in mental soundness that these conscientious protestations are wanting. They are the result of emotion unguided by knowledge and unchastened by thought. In saying this, we do not mean to characterize the attitude of serious and competent advocates of socialism. These persons, as a rule, both know more, and have thought more seriously, about the subject than all but an extremely small minority among their conservative opponents. The thoroughgoing socialist, if he be intelligent, has deliberately come to a conclusion which, right or wrong, has respectable ground to stand on. He proposes to abolish existing institutions not simply because they are "wrong," but because he has a substitute to offer which he is convinced is better. And if he is sufficiently intelligent, and sufficiently fair-minded, he will admit that an institution, or a practice, which may be wrong in the sense that the world would be the better if a new order were established in which that institution would have no place, may be not only right but highly beneficent in the present state of the world.

The tender minds that are troubled over the wickedness of dividends are usually too delicate to subject themselves to the strain of this kind of thought. They do not ask whether the investment of private capital does or does not render to the world a service for which the interest or profit that it brings is the natural compensation; they do not ask what injury might be done to the productive capacity of the world if such compensation were forbidden, or even if its acceptance were merely discountenanced as immoral. Probably in nine cases out of ten the idea of there being any connection at all between dividends and productivity does not cross their minds. They look upon their coupons and their dividend checks as fruit which drops into their mouths from the trees of some land of Cockayne, and they feel that they have no right to live in Cockayne when their fellow-humans have to dwell in this work-a-day world. Very pretty and amiable, no doubt; but very childish and ignorant.

So long as the productive activity of the world is carried on upon the basis of the institution of private property, returns on investments have precisely the same justification as wages, or salaries, or fees for professional service. The vast system of production and exchange by which we all live, and which provides us with the myriad benefits of modern civilization, is kept going—and on the whole kept going with wonderful smoothness and efficiency—through the holding out of such rewards to effort, to thrift, and to enterprise, as the play of demand and supply determines. It is open to anybody to believe that a better way is possible; but it is absurd to ignore the fact that if this way is given up some other way will have to be devised and adopted. So long as the present way endures, the justification of any part of it that is essential to the successful working of the whole is on precisely the same ethical plane as that of any other part. To carry on industry under a régime of private property, some people must set aside some of their property for use in the work of production—for the building of factories, the construction of machinery, the accumulation of raw material, the payment of wages. Everybody that has anything has a chance to do this. But not everybody is willing, without special reward, to set aside for the future what he might consume or enjoy in the present; in order to get the capital that the world's work requires, it is necessary to offer the inducement of interest or profits.

Those who, through the exercise of thrift and judgment, supply this need do not, in their dividends or interest, get something for nothing. They are compensated for a service as essential as that of the laborer, or the artisan, or the manager, or the engineer; and the amount of their compensation is determined by precisely the same forces—the community's need of the service as shown by demand and the community's opportunities for obtaining it as shown by supply. It is not those who furnish that supply for a consideration, but rather those who do not furnish it at all, that are open to a charge of wrong conduct. Let those who are squeamish about accepting the customary return for the use of capital give it up by all means, if it eases their minds; but let it be clearly understood that to accept that return implies no more defect of conscience than does the acceptance of any wage, or salary, or fee, or profit, that the interplay of supply and demand assigns to manual or professional skill or to successful business enterprise.

The Passing of the Bartender

A NEW prognostication of evil from prohibition comes from a nerve specialist. Dr. L. Pierce Clark brought the matter up at the Atlantic City Convention of neurologists. It is the serious loss to society about to be sustained by the elimination of the conversational bartender. When you stop to think of it, what is it that makes a successful dram shop? Is it mere brass rail and mahogany, the inevitable oil painting of "Diana at the Bath," or even the free lunch? It certainly is not the intoxicants alone. They may be had at the grocer's. It is the combination of all these paraphernalia and that subtle something by which a good bartender is able to create a social atmosphere of hospitality and cheer for those who do not know they come for it and who are indeed scarcely conscious that they have had it, but who will miss it after July first.

When the bartender is gone, perhaps we shall appreciate him more. Perhaps we shall realize that on that fatal day passes an institution. Then will be destroyed the calling of men who have in humble place unconsciously and unostentatiously preserved the elsewhere lost art of conversation; that art of creating among adventitious paying guests a social atmosphere,—sometimes, alas! too exhilarating, but, on the whole, soothing and satisfying. When some college professor in later years writes, as he will write, a book on The Influence of The Bartender upon American Political Ideals, let us hope that it will contain some chapter on the influence of the bartender on American social life.

Dr. Clark is right. The loss of the bartender will have very far-reaching consequences unless, as is not likely, his talents can be snatched and translated, before it is too late, to other spheres of influence. If the Four Hundred were only wise enough to see an opportunity, if the hostesses, whose dull receptions pall upon sated guests, could only acquire from the serried ranks of the bartenders, soon, alas! to be broken, social secretaries or social managers, leisure would not be so appallingly unendurable to the rich.

But there are other and more menacing aspects of the matter. The loss of the bartender will fall, in the main, most heavily upon the lower bourgeoisie and the toiler. We shall have, after July first, no doubt, epidemics of wife-beating. This is not a pleasant thought, but we approach it firmly and from a sense of duty. Let us frankly admit, and now, that the bartender has been one of the great bulwarks of the home. For every husband who in years past went to the dram shop and returning, over-stimulated, beat his wife, there are doubtless hundreds who would have beat their wives if they had not gone. Countless marriages would have been impossible of endurance without the bartender, who, at times and when needed, changed the tune of an everlasting matrimonial monotony. Has the bartender had any credit for this? Would any good woman ever admit that a bartender made her faithful dull aridity endurable to her husband? The answer is an insulted "No." She has unjustly hated him while he lived and ladled, but she will miss him when he is gone.

The passing of the bartender creates one of the most serious crises in American family life. Yet women, as a class, are blind to it. Women's clubs have not even discussed it. Night school courses on new ways to hold poor husbands are not even demanded by the woman suffrage party. This blindness on the part of women is easily explainable. They have been deceived into thinking in times past that the bartender was their enemy rather than their friend. Many of them have been so deluded by too easily succumbing to the baneful influence of that ancient drama, "Ten Nights in a Bar Room" and other similar plays. Under such influences they picture the innocent bartender, with his checked shirt and rhinestone jewelry, as a menace to the family and fireside. The rude shock coming will therefore be doubly severe when they learn that he was, and always had been, a supplemental agency for preserving the home.

The Rifle in the Army

WHAT won the war is likely to remain matter of debate. That good rifle shooting was a large part of our particular success is suggested by the interallied match of June 24 on the D'Avours range. In a field of 175 the first eighteen places went to representatives of the American Expeditionary Force. Out of our team of twenty-five the lowest took thirty-fourth place. It was a proud victory. Many have wondered how our half-trained army won its fight under the terrible difficulties of the Argonne. It was a success that defied all military probabilities. We think the answer may be read in the score at D'Avours. Under conditions of open warfare the rifle regained the importance it had had at Lexington and New Orleans. An army that believed in its rifle, soldiers that shot at particular marks with confidence in their ability to hit, had an enormous advantage over believers in the unaimed shower of lead. Such a feat as Sergeant York's was simply a triumph of good shooting with rifle and pistol. Daniel Boone would have understood all about it, and so would the late "Buffalo Bill." Great credit is due to those who against scorn and incredulity maintained that the rifle is a weapon of precision, and gave our recruits the requisite training in marksmanship. We have only to recall that the rifle had come to be regarded as an expensive and clumsy handle for a bayonet, to realize the sort of opposition against which our apostles of the rifle had to contend.

The Argonne and the bloodless victory at D'Avours show also that our American tradition of marksmanship is still alive. No particular training could have effected so complete a triumph. Everybody has to learn the military rifle—the technic of which is quite different from that of sporting pieces—but a natural shot will master his piece more quickly and steadily. Evidently "Old Hickory's" squirrel hunters have left worthy descendants more generally than any one supposed. Good rifle shooting has also an advantage, beyond its value in the firing line, in encouraging precision and intelligence in the enlisted men. A careful estimator of elevation and windage, and the possessor of an untroubled "trigger squeeze," is not likely to be slovenly in his other military duties. We may guess that that citizen army of sharpshooters, the Swiss, can in a war of movement handle three for one from any of its neighbors and conceivable foes. A Swiss President was once asked by the retired Kaiser at national manœuvres what he would do should Germany send 200,000 men against the entire Swiss force of 100,000. "Distribute two cartridges apiece instead of one," was the smiling answer.

Good rifle shooting is the guarantee of the technical capacity of an army, and practice on the rifle range is in itself a valuable discipline. An American West Pointer, an advocate of the shower-of-lead theory, once argued that he would rather have indifferent riflemen in his command than sharpshooters and experts, because the poorer shooting "beat up more ground." A more experienced infantry officer answered simply: "I don't want to command men who have failed to become proficient in any difficult branch of military technic." Among rational measures for preparedness none is more effective and legitimate than well-organized rifle shooting. Merely as a sport it deserves high consideration. We trust the splendid victory of our Army rifle team in France will do much to reawaken an interest which is too likely to slacken with the coming of peace.

The Fall of Princes

ON May 13, three hundred years ago, Johan van Oldenbarnevelt, the greatest statesman Holland ever produced, died on the scaffold erected in the Binnenhof at The Hague. In front of the building where his will and his wisdom had so long wielded authority over the assembled states he bowed his head under the executioner's sword. What was his guilt that only with his life he could atone for it? The dramatists Fletcher and Massinger, who within three months of the execution had their "Tragedy of Sir John van Olden Barnevelt" produced on the London stage, could not account for such a fall but by assuming that the old statesman, in his dotage, had lost the power to control his ambition and had been carried away by pride and by jealousy of Prince Maurice of Orange into betraying the most vital interests of the very country that owed to his statesmanship its freedom and greatness. History gives a different version: a traitor to his country Oldenbarnevelt never was. He loved it until his dying hour with that same ardor which had inspired him through life in all the great and often hazardous undertakings by which he had led it on to victory and an honorable truce.

But that very truce became the origin of his later troubles. As long as the war with Spain was waged and the country had need of Barnevelt's political genius, his power was supreme and his right to it unquestioned. No sooner, however, had external dangers subsided than his authority in state affairs was bitterly attacked by such as envied him his high position. Those found a vulnerable side in Barnevelt's policy with regard to the internal affairs of the Republic. True to the letter of the Union of Utrecht, the Magna Charta of the Dutch Republic, Oldenbarnevelt insisted on the absolute right of each individual province to manage its own domestic affairs independent of any control by the States-General. But the Prince of Orange, who was the stadtholder of five of the seven provinces, was by these combined functions naturally inclined to view the affairs of the state from a Federal standpoint; and it was round him as the upholder of a policy opposed to the decentralization advocated by the great Pensionary that the latter's enemies began to rally towards the close of the twelve years' truce. That Oldenbarnevelt, in defense of his doctrine of provincial sovereignty, took steps that might have led to domestic war can not be denied, although he could claim in justification, of course, many a precedent from the days when he was young. He persuaded the municipal magistrates of Holland and Utrecht to enlist private troops wherewith to withstand the forces of the Prince in case the States-General should wish to bring the rebellious towns to reason by violence. This was his heaviest, if not his only, crime, if crime it can be called, seeing that precedent had sanctioned such a measure. His opponents made the most of it. They formed for this exceptional case a special court of twenty-four judges, mostly personal enemies of the accused, and by these men he was found guilty and deserving of death. To the minister who came to visit him in his cell the night before the execution, the old statesman accounted for the severity of the sentence with these philosophical words: "I governed when I was in authority according to the maxims of that time; and now I am condemned to die according to the maxims of this."

In that fine remark is summarized the whole tragedy of historical greatness. The fall of princes, that favorite topic of mediæval lore, was not held due to the accidents of a people's ingratitude or of envy's intrigues. The same destiny that made them rise was brought to its fulfillment in their ruin, and the rebellious mob, the assassin and his abettors, the biased judges, are only the unconscious instruments in the hands of fate. They may sometimes, as in the case of Oldenbarnevelt, seem to out-Herod Fate in cruelty, but no human heart can be more inexorable than history's inevitable course. If Oldenbarnevelt had not died on the scaffold he would not have thanked his judges for his life. His time was past, and to have to live on in the next, which was no longer his, would to his proud heart have been a bitterer trial than the violent death that crowned him with the glory of martyrdom.

It is not otherwise in the case of Wilhelm von Hohenzollern. Far be it from me to imply that the judges who should find the ex-Kaiser guilty would commit a political crime similar to that which blots the memory of Barnevelt's four-and-twenty judges. The declaration of war, that magic word of the Oberste Kriegsherr which made the whole of Europe crumble into ruin, is in itself a sufficient crime to condemn him to death. But by taking the office of judging him out of Destiny's hands they could only relax the severity of her doom. If condemned by his judges, he would at least have the satisfaction of proclaiming himself a victim of illegal proceedings according to the letter of the law: "Nul ne peut être puni qu'en vertu d'une loi établie et promulguée antérieurement au délit et légalement appliquée," runs the eighth article of the Declaration des Droits de l'Homme of August 26, 1789. Scrupulous adherence to that old and universally accepted maxim would preclude all possibility of prosecuting the ex-Kaiser, for to declare war has ever been a sovereign's prerogative, and he could appeal to the letter of the law to justify his execution of that constitutional right.

In his case it would have to be discarded for a new, and perhaps higher, principle, which up to now has escaped definition. There lives, indeed, in the hearts of the peoples an undeniable but vague conviction that somehow justice must be done and that the new law under which the crime shall meet with its atonement will be the crystallization of that universal craving for a just requital. But that new law will be a product of the League of Nations, and this League, as long as Germany remains excluded from it, is the league of her former enemies, and a court of justice appointed by that league would be open to the charge of partiality. The Netherland Government will probably not reply to a request for Wilhelm von Hohenzollern's extradition with a refusal based on the holy right of asylum, whose sanctity depends on tradition rather than on established law. But it would very likely make its compliance with that request dependable on certain conditions which it might be difficult to fulfill. Among these would be the formation of a tribunal independent of and not influenced by the accusing parties, and the recognition of the accused's right to call witness for the defense, not only from among his former subjects, but from whatever nationality he chooses. The League of Nations has the power to impose its will on a recalcitrant Netherland Government, but the use of that power would impair the confidence of the smaller nations in the integrity of that international jurisdiction which is to transcend the existing national codes of law. Why, then, should the League, at the risk of its own prestige, enter upon a course which would be a needless and less perfect anticipation of the working of Destiny?

For who shall say that, unless the League should call the criminal to account, the crime would not be expiated? Think of the man who thought himself God's Deputy on earth, the Champion of Christendom, the Protector of Islam, the Ruler of a Germanized world in the near future, think of him now caged up in a small Dutch castle, its garden wall the limit of his daily walk, deprived of all influence on the trend of the world's affairs, a nervous, futile reader of newspapers, a broken man, a cipher in the sum of humanity. Could man devise any punishment more terrible than fate has dealt to Wilhelm von Hohenzollern? Why call him to account before a court of justice? That would be exaltation to him beyond his desert. When Olden-barneveldt, in the play by Massinger and Fletcher, has received sentence from his judges, he takes leave of them with these words: "I shall not play my last act worst." Indeed, that act became his apotheosis, in his case the just reward for his great and noble life. But has the ex-Kaiser deserved the distinction of such a tragic exit? The actor in him would rise to the occasion. Once again he would feel himself the centre of the world's attention, notorious where before he was famous, but to a man like him notoriety is better than oblivion. He would know how to exploit the theatrical possibilities of that last act. Rescued from the inglorious darkness into which he had fled a disgraced coward, he would grasp this opportunity of rehabilitation, and leave the scene of his ambitions with this thought to console him that the world deemed him too great, even after his fall, to leave him alone.

A. J. BARNOUW

The Hague, May 30

Is There a Huge "Social Surplus"?

IT appears to pass for an axiom with many earnest and well-meaning social reformers and not a few leaders of organized labor that, under modern methods of production, there annually accrues to society a surplus income vast almost beyond calculation, and adequate, if it were more evenly divided than at present, to assure a high standard of well-being to all. A passage from a recent book by Professor Harry F. Ward of Boston University ("The Labor Movement," 1917) is a fairly typical expression of this assumption:

We have to-day a great social surplus that has been built up by the improvement of scientific knowledge, methods of industrial organization and agricultural production. For the first time in human history, the human race is now living on a surplus instead of a deficit basis. Here are being piled up not only the necessities but also the luxuries of life. Now labor stands looking at this immense social surplus. And labor stands also looking at the place where it is going; sees it going for health in China (as labor's voice has recently said), for pensions to university professors, and for the feeding of birds; while at the same time the labor that has helped to make that surplus, in these very industries, is not able to properly nourish and adequately educate its own children.

It would seem to be because of a similar belief as to the abundance of the product, even of the present industrial system, that Mr. Bertrand Russell has recently proposed a scheme of reform which rests upon the optimistic assumption, made almost without argument, "that, with the help of science, and by the elimination of the vast amount of unproductive work involved in internal and international competition, the whole community could be kept in comfort by means of four hours' work a day"—and could be so kept even though a "vagabond's wage, sufficient for existence but not for luxury," were granted freely to all who preferred to do no work whatever.

But is it a fact that even the wealthiest of modern nations possess any considerable "social surplus"? The question is plainly one upon which the laborious inquiries of the statistician, and they alone, can throw any trustworthy light.

There have recently appeared two important studies, by statisticians of recognized competence, of the amount and distribution of the national income of Great Britain and the United States respectively. This is, it is true, a branch of statistics in which estimates only indirectly verifiable play a considerable part, especially in the case of the United States. The margin of possible error, therefore, is wide. Nevertheless there is no good reason to doubt the correctness of the broad general results of these studies. Certainly the conclusions realized by the cautious and critical methods of the statistical expert, in a matter of this kind, are of incomparably greater value than the easy assumptions, unsupported by any serious inductive inquiries, of such writers as Mr. Ward and Mr. Russell. Unfortunately, one of the studies in question appeared during the war, and the other immediately after its close; so that neither has received an amount of attention commensurate with its importance. There have been few books published during the turmoil of the past five years which bear more significantly than these two upon the problems of reconstruction which the civilized world is now facing.

The figures for Great Britain have been brought together and illuminatingly analyzed by Dr. A. L. Bowley, Professor of Statistics in the University of London, in a brochure issued a few months since ("The Division of the Product of Industry," Clarendon Press, 1919). They are based chiefly upon the income tax returns for the year 1911, and therefore represent a very much more favorable situation than the present one. Mr. Bowley finds that the total income produced in the United Kingdom in that year amounted to about one billion nine hundred million pounds sterling. Of this sum, it may be noted incidentally, 60 per cent. went to persons whose annual income was below the exemption limit for income tax—i.e., below £160. Out of the remainder (£742,000,000) came almost all of the savings necessary for capital and for the expenses of Government. When these are deducted, there remains some 1,450 million pounds as the total income produced by British industry which would be available for individual expenditure. If this sum were pooled and equally divided, the per capita share would be £32; the share of the average family of four and one-half persons would be £145, or £154 if income from foreign investments were added to the total to be divided. In other words, if all so-called "unearned income" had been abolished, and the "national dividend" of the United Kingdom had been distributed share and share alike, an average British family would, in 1911, have received an income of less than $750; and it could have received so much as this only upon the assumption—which is almost certainly contrary to fact—that the productive efficacy of the nation's industry would not have been diminished by so sweeping a change in distribution.

For the United States, no figures approaching these in probable accuracy will be available until the new income tax returns (with the lower limit of exemption) have been analyzed. In 1915, however, Dr. W. I. King, then of the University of Wisconsin, published a careful study of the data at that time available ("The Wealth and Income of the People of the United States"). The total income for the year 1910 of the people of the Continental United States was reckoned by Mr. King at 30 billion, 530 million dollars. Necessary capital savings were estimated at two billions, leaving as the national dividend 28 billion, 530 million dollars. With a population of 92 million, this sum, if equally divided, would yield a per capita income of $310; or for the average family of four and one-half persons, $1,395; or for every actual family unit, $1,020. Reduced to its value in terms of the average prices of all goods consumed during the decade 1890-1899, the national dividend for 1910 amounted to 22 billion, 552 million dollars, i.e., to $245 per capita, or $1,102 for the average family.

Unless the results reached by the careful investigations of Professor Bowley and Dr. King are very wide of the mark, it is evident that the belief in the existence of a vast "social surplus" (if by that is meant, as should be meant, surplus income) is quite unsupported by the facts. A society which produces only enough to yield each family, upon an equal division, a (tax-free) money income of less than three pounds sterling a week, or even one which can, on a similar division, give to each family of four to five persons twenty-seven dollars a week, can hardly be said to be rolling in collective affluence. In such a society, if the transfer of income could be accomplished without loss, all could subsist with a certain measure of comfort; but it would not be possible, if the national income were equally divided, that any should enjoy even a moderately high degree of material well-being, still less such a standard of living as many hopeful but ill-informed reformers expect to obtain for all by a mere change in the distribution of the present product of industry.

It must in justice be remarked that at least one group of radical social reformers are innocent of illusions as to the magnitude of the so-called social surplus. The state Socialists, or the more instructed among them, are well aware of the inadequacy of the present social income and of the consequent primacy of the problem of production. Mr. John Spargo, for example, has recently acknowledged this truth with admirable, if somewhat indiscreet, candor:

Every serious student of the problem has realized that the first great task of any socialist society must be to increase the productivity of labor. It is all very well for a popular propaganda among the masses to promise a great reduction in the hours of labor and, at the same time, a great improvement in the standards of living. The translation of such promises into actual achievements must prove an enormous task. . . . [It] will require such an organization of industry upon a basis of efficiency as no nation has yet developed. If the working class of this or any other country should take possession of the existing organization of production, there would not be enough in the fund now going to the capitalist class to satisfy the requirements of the workers, even if not a penny of compensation were paid to the expropriated owners. ("Bolshevism," 1919, p. 287.)

It is easy, no doubt, to draw false inferences from the facts concerning the amount of the present national income which have been here recapitulated. There is some danger that these facts may serve as an excuse for selfish indifference on the part of the well-to-do. The self-indulgent man of wealth, seeing that the sums which he spends upon luxuries would, if equally divided among the less prosperous, add very little (at least by the rich man's standards) to the income of any one, may lose even such compunctions as now, perhaps, occasionally visit him. He may argue that, since his superfluity could not do much good to everybody, there is no reason why he should be concerned to have it do good to anybody—except himself. So far as the individual's obligations to society are concerned, such an inference would be as bad logic as it is bad ethics—would, indeed, be bad ethics because it is bad logic. In a society which, as a whole, has little surplus beyond what is necessary to provide a merely decent existence for all, he who wastes any part of the social income in extravagance is far more unpardonable than he would be in a society collectively so rich that a certain amount of waste was negligible. Nor, of course, can the statesman or the social philosopher rightly infer from the limitations of the present national dividend that no reforms in the distribution of it are needful or practicable. No man of good sense can doubt that some re-apportionments of income are socially desirable; that at present there are those who receive a greater share of the wealth annually produced by the collective effort of the community than can be justified by any consideration of social expediency or of equity, and that there are others who receive less than every consideration of equity and of social expediency would require. Even without increased production, changes in distribution are possible which would make a happier and a more genuinely human existence possible for considerable numbers of persons; and the fact that the benefits attainable by all such purely distributive reforms are narrowly circumscribed is no reason for regarding them as negligible or unimportant.

Nevertheless, the results of the statistical studies which have been cited are of primary and decisive significance for any rational programme of social betterment; for they show us what is first in importance and potential fruitfulness in such a programme, and what is secondary. In our own day more than ever before, multitudes of men have been beguiled by the hope that the condition of the masses of mankind may be vastly altered for the better by simply altering the ratios in which the present social income is divided. Our statisticians now remind us, on the basis of careful quantitative inquiries, that this hope is illusory; they offer definite evidence of the truth of a too much neglected maxim—a simple and commonplace but pregnant maxim which should hang in illuminated lettering over the desks of all reformers, social workers, "socially-minded" clergymen and journalists, and labor leaders: "the social problem is not primarily a problem of distribution but of production." When all who honestly seek the permanent and substantial increase of human welfare bear this simple and elementary truth steadily in mind, we may expect that fewer of them will subordinate the first commandment of the law of social progress (on its economic side) to the second; we shall less frequently see the pathetic spectacle of earnest reformers and passionate agitators who remain subject to the most naive illusions as to the comparative significance and the possible scope and beneficence of the exclusively distributive changes in which they are interested—who base most ambitious hopes for mankind upon projects which, even if successfully carried out, could not possibly effect any large or general improvement in the average conditions of human life.

Never, certainly, more than in these days of reconstruction did this plain and sobering gospel of the primacy of the problem of production need to be preached. For nearly five years a great part of the civilized world has been busily engaged in destroying vast quantities of the wealth which had come down to it from the past and in diminishing to an incalculable degree its own productive capacity for the future. And now, amid this scene of ruin, men have fallen to quarreling so bitterly over the division, between classes or between racial groups, of what remains, that yet greater ruin threatens to follow. In more than one European country large bodies of men are so obsessed with the pursuit of what they conceive to be a juster distribution that they seem likely to carry out with a tragic literalness the programme, fiat justitia, ruat calum. Now "social justice" in distribution is, it is very true, a consummation towards which man can never cease to strive. Yet it is hardly unimportant, either, that there should be something to distribute; and it will appear to sensible men very far from clear that the hasty realization of some nicely reasoned, but much debated, philosophic scheme of distributive justice is worth having at the cost of the general impoverishment of the community, and the wholesale sacrifice of other values, both moral and material, which belong to the life of civilized man. Yet it is at this cost, apparently, that some great nations are destined to learn the elementary wisdom of judging all projects of distributive reform in the light of their probable effects upon production—though not, indeed, in that light only.

If increase of production is the first article in the economic programme of the rational social reformer, there can be no question as to what practical endeavors he will rank first in urgency and importance. For the means upon which we must chiefly rely for any increase of production worth having is plain. It is only through progress in scientific knowledge and in the application of such knowledge to the satisfaction of men's needs and desires that the lot of the average man can be greatly bettered. To pile up material goods at the cost of greatly increased or intensified labor would, for the mass of mankind, mean no real gain. A good deal may no doubt be done by better organization of industry, by the avoidance of wasteful methods, and by the better education and increased efficiency of labor. But just as it is the work done during the past four hundred years by men in laboratories, in quiet studies, or in inventors' workshops, which is the primary source of most of the wealth by which modern Western society surpasses antiquity, the Middle Ages, or the Orient, so from those sources alone may we hope in the future to gain any substantial and cumulative increase in the means of well-being of society as a whole. For all those, then, who desire a genuine and widespread amelioration of the conditions of human existence, nothing, on the economic side of the problem, can seem quite so important as the more adequate endowment and the more methodical and better organized prosecution of the enterprise (in Bacon's words) "of extending to a greater distance the boundaries of man's power and dignity" through the enlargement of his understanding of nature.

ARTHUR O. LOVEJOY

Has Civilization Failed?

MANY "emancipated" clergymen and irresponsible humanitarians, both of which groups, owing to the reputation they earned for themselves during the war, may be conveniently referred to as pacifists, are still rumbling with discontent. For them, in spite of all the warnings which they have issued these past five years, civilization has miserably failed. Until shortly before the peace settlement they had high hopes of a new civilization which should wipe out the old order and instal a peaceful brotherhood. They looked for a sign here and for a sign there. At first they thought they espied it in the midst of the enemy's camp, in the soul of the German people. It was only necessary to encourage the spirit of the incipient democracy there apparent in order to disarm the guilty autocrats and thus to bring a snowy dove of peace out of the battered hat in the ring. They have not said much lately about this "might have been." Then in President Wilson they temporarily found the heaven-sent controller of the new destinies. But they renounced him when he did not live up to his promise of a peace without victory. They have not yet given up the thought that the germ of their golden dreams is to be sought in the Russian soviet.

In all such speculations there is one startling inconsistency. For why should our pacifists have inferred that peoples which—not in a moment of impulse but during five long years—had permitted the ideals of civilization to "break down" would have the wisdom or the inclination to set up a new order freed of all evil? No doubt because of the great object-lesson of the war. The war has indeed taught a lesson, but one which never would have been learned if the preaching of pacifists had been listened to. By means of the war a Power which sought to impose its selfish will upon the rest of the world has been shackled pending regeneration. It has been seen that the wicked pretensions of force are futile because force can be mastered by force. It has transpired that the pacifist was living in a fool's paradise because of his notion that there were some things to which a people, a whole people, would not stoop. Germany drove that lesson home. And a prouder lesson of the war teaches that there are some things to which the collective human nature of the world will not submit. The vast union of Germany's enemies made that perfectly clear.

Civilization has learned its lesson aright. If the issues of the war had been less distinct, there might indeed have been the danger of chaos resulting from so big a conflict. Fortunately, the spectacle of a nation stifling every instinct of sportsmanship and adept in piling up needless human anguish made it unnecessary to doubt the wickedness of Germany's case or to look for remote causes of the war. The feeling, at least for the last two or three years, has been that "guilty" will be as sternly pronounced by future historians as it is by the present generation. By virtue of this clear-cut situation the question of international dealings has been brought poignantly to the attention of the entire world. The plotters not only of such overt brutalities as Germany's but of the covert hypocrisies of former years will now understand that they have a more sensitive public conscience to reckon with. If it shall come to pass that the dealings of peoples one with another assume somewhat the semblance of the intercourse practised by honorable individuals, shall it be said that civilization has failed?

All this does not, however, quiet the pacifists' grievances. They would reply, Why could not more be learned from so tremendous a lesson? Civilization has acquired more wisdom than the pacifists will ever possess. For it knows that human nature, while capable of vast heights in a crisis, has in the run of years to keep eternal watch over itself, lest it stoop to pettiness and dishonesty. Let not pacifists imagine that the intercourse of nations, from being just now callous to the nicer points of honor, can be made superior to that of individuals. The world should be thankful these days for precisely the thing which brings the pacifist sorrow: the growing conviction that solid progress can not often be obtained by short cuts. This country, in particular, may have reason to feel proud of the practical reservations which it bids fair to make to the offer of a tempting programme. Though led by a President susceptible to the vaguer reaches of idealism and availing himself of a world-wide reputation, it is not likely to advocate a policy which transcends the teachings of common sense.

The President, having found it difficult to make up his mind as regards the part this country was to play in the European war, wishes us unreservedly to join a league by which our minds will be made up for us automatically. Is it not a hopeful sign that Article X has created so much discussion among us? In reality it is one of the best indications that civilization has not failed. A mute acquiescence in this article would have implied that we were ready, without reason being shown, to forswear that freedom of choice in our sympathies which has made us traditionally an asylum for the oppressed and a nation confident of its ability to reach right decisions on international disputes.

And yet, and yet! There are many persons not pacifists and not Presidents with reputations to live up to who are facing the future with misgiving. The war is over and after all the sacrifices they begin to catch the lineaments of the same old world which in the past was too much with them. Thus they are left disappointed over the big price paid for the small gain, if gain there was. Their feeling is, of course, part of the big crop of disillusion which it has long been evident would be reaped of too great expectations. When the prediction passed current that the world would never again be anything like what it was before the war, there were at least a few persons who emphatically dissented. For it seemed cruel that vivid hopes should be fostered only to be dashed later on. Reason is at length beginning to dispossess emotion of the deciding voice in the public mind. And if it hurts to reason after months of looking towards the future through golden lights, that, too, is reasonable. If the horrors of the war still cast their hideous shadows across our paths and will not be gone, there is the comforting thought that when the world learns lightly to throw off such tragic memories as those of the period just closed it will then be time enough to despair of civilization.

H. deW. F.

Correspondence

"Kolchak and the Peace Conference"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the editorial article on "Kolchak and the Peace Conference" in the Review of June 21, you say that Kolchak "has had the force to spread his dictatorship over three-quarters of the former empire." Permit me to point out to you that Kolchak controls Siberia by virtue of the presence of foreign troops there—American, Japanese, Czecho-Slovak, Canadian, etc., etc.—who are warding off Bolshevik attacks upon the Trans-Siberian railroad, without which Kolchak could not last forty-eight hours. He has not sufficient force to hold even the limited territory under his actual control, as his recent defeat at Ufa shows.

You also say that "the political color of the present government of Finland is as yet undeclared. It is accused, to be sure by the Bolsheviks, of being reactionary and even pro-German." You do not seem to know that Gen. Mannerheim, the head of the present Finnish Government, invited the Germans to occupy the country in the Winter of 1917-1918 and that they stayed there until the armistice, in November, 1918. As to its being reactionary, the execution, imprisonment and exile of thousands upon thousands of workmen after the revolution is sufficiently convincing proof. Is it necessary to be a Bolshevik in order to appreciate these facts?

Lastly, I would like to correct an inaccuracy in the same article. You give as a justification for Kolchak's refusal to reconvene the Constituent Assembly the circumstance that "the delegates chosen in 1917 inevitably suffer from the discredit of the Government, Kerensky's, which conducted the elections." That is contrary to fact. Kerensky's Government was overthrown on November 7, 1917, and the elections were held several weeks later, when Russia was under Bolshevik rule.

While I must concede your right to support a monarchist dictator and even call him "democratic," I believe that in fairness to your readers your editorial comment on the Russian situation ought to be based on better information.

GREGORY YARROS

New York, June 24

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I have read with especial interest the letter addressed to you by Mr. Gregory Yarros, criticizing the editorial article "Kolchak and the Peace Conference" in your issue of June 21, because it reflects a type of opinion which is prevalent in certain circles here, and which I believe to be based upon most vicious misinformation.

While I do not concur entirely with the editorial article in question, I must regard it in general as a very fair and moderate estimate of the whole situation. Most assuredly the points raised by Mr. Yarros in regard to it are not well taken.

His first criticism has to do with the nature of the control exercised by the Kolchak Government over Siberia and its basis, and in this connection he makes the statement, frequently seen in our irresponsible radical press, that Kolchak could not last forty-eight hours without the presence of foreign troops. Now there are something less than 9,000 American troops in Vladivostok and vicinity. These troops are certainly not supporting Kolchak, but rather constituting an irritant so great that the Kolchak Government has requested that none of them be sent westward. In eastern Siberia there are probably between 20,000 and 25,000 Japanese troops. They are, to be sure, hunting down scattered bands of Bolsheviks, who are nothing but brigands thriving in a wild country and existing on the plunder of peaceful villages or by railroad holdups. These Japanese troops are to-day perhaps of some service in this way to the Kolchak Government, but in the past greatly hampered it through the support accorded to such chieftains as Semenov and Kalmykov. The French and British troops referred to are only a handful, something less than 2,000 and not more than enough to guard a few miles of railway. The Czecho-Slovaks last summer performed one of the most brilliant and romantic feats of the war, when they resisted the treacherous attempt of the Soviet Government to annihilate them, and in so doing gave the people of Siberia the opportunity to free themselves from the hated Bolshevik rule. But failing the Allied support to which they were entitled, and which they had reason to expect, decimated by continual fighting and by disease, they have become homesick, discouraged, and demoralized, and to-day, so far from being a support of the Kolchak Government, constitute one of its most troublesome problems.

It is very evident that Mr. Yarros does not know Siberia or understand its conditions. If he did, he would realize that there are two entirely different Siberias. Western Siberia, a region from the Ural to Lake Baikal, is an agricultural country peopled by industrious peasants who own their farms. It is progressive and has no agrarian problems such as trouble European Russia. Altogether, it is politically the most wholesome portion of the Russian Empire and must be a source of beneficent influence in the coming regeneration. Siberia east of Lake Baikal is wild and mountainous. Agriculture is but little developed. The population is sparse and made up of native tribes, adventurers, and ex-convicts, with a comparatively small proportion of good immigrants from European Russia. It will be a long time before orderly conditions prevail there, except along the railroads and navigable rivers; the so-called Bolshevik activities in this region are nothing but banditry.

Mr. Yarros is utterly mistaken in his statement concerning the elections to the Constituent Assembly in 1917 and his conclusions in regard to them. As a matter of fact, the elections were held months before the Bolshevik Revolution of November in that year. That Admiral Kolchak should decline to call together, for the purpose of making a constitution, the surviving members of this first Constituent Assembly is both wise and just. It was elected under conditions that made neither for fair representation nor for sane judgment, and if to-day the survivors were convened, they most certainly would not represent the Russian people either territorially or politically. As many survivors as could be got together at Ufa last summer participated in the Convention there, in which the present Omsk Government had its origin. As to the desirability of calling a Constituent Assembly at all until after order is restored in Russia, and the people, by returning to their ordinary tasks and regaining a degree of economic prosperity, acquire the possibility of sane judgment as to their political future, there is grave question, and it most certainly can not be decided by outsiders.

Kolchak is not a "monarchist dictator" (sic). He is a patriotic non-partisan leader without ambitious personal designs, who is to-day supported by all the best elements of the Russian people. That some of the elements supporting him are reactionary is true, and this situation constitutes at times a serious problem for him, but thus far he has shown his ability to deal with it. At all events, the question of whether Russia is to be a republic or a constitutional monarchy is one for the Russian people to decide, and it is entirely secondary to the question of the regaining of their fatherland from the alien Bolshevik tyranny.

The reference made by Mr. Yarros to the situation of Finland shows an equal ignorance of the facts. He refers to the execution, imprisonment, and exile of thousands upon thousands of workmen after the revolution, but what he does not seem to realize is that this was the natural result that followed the horrible unprovoked Bolshevik outrages of the Reds. The Finns are neither pro-German nor pro-Ally, but pro-Finn; that they should be grateful to the Germans for assisting them in overcoming the wild orgy of the Bolsheviks, when the Allies and Scandinavia declined to help them, is but natural. General Mannerheim is first of all a Finnish patriot; he has conducted himself in such a way that his poor little country, threatened on both sides and passing through many difficult situations, has reason to be grateful to him.

JEROME LANDFIELD

New York, June 30

The German Lease from China

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the second paragraph of the Review of May 17, I notice a little slip which I take the liberty of bringing to your attention.

The German lease was extorted from China not on the pretext of the slaying of the German Ambassador by the Boxers. Kiao Chow had been in the possession of Germany several years before the killing of the Ambassador, which occurred during the Boxer War, and the alleged reason for the Kaiser's demand for Kiao Chow had been the murder of two obscure German missionaries, so-called, though I have been told they belonged to an Order which was under ban in Germany.

The slaying of the German Ambassador was atoned by a large money payment, by the sending of a special embassy of Chinese nobles to Berlin with a personal apology, and by the erecting of a pylon near the site of the Ambassador's murder. This pylon stands to-day in the thought of the Chinese people as a memorial to the men who killed the Ambassador rather than as a memorial to the Ambassador himself.

GEORGE A. BACON

Boston, June 24

The Great Powers and the Covenant

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I agree entirely with Mr. Bell that the Big Five should exercise the preponderating influence in carrying the terms of the Peace Settlement into effect. But I certainly do not agree that they should exercise any such influence in settling international difficulties generally; and I do not see how, under the terms of the Covenant, preponderance is withheld from them in the one case, if it is assured them in the other. My contention is that the Powers to which must fall the enforcement of the Peace Settlement must first of all stick together, and that this predominant concern must prejudice their disinterestedness, and therefore the disinterestedness of bodies in which, whether by votes or influence, they preponderate, for the performance of mediatorial and quasi-judicial functions. Indeed, had the primary interest of the framers of the Covenant been the setting up of suitable machinery for the peaceable adjustment of international difficulties—I refer especially to those of a non-justiciable character—they would hardly have overlooked so completely the superior adaptation to this task of ad hoc bodies in the creation of which the parties to the dispute have an equal voice. This is certainly the lesson to be drawn from the history of international arbitration, and, I believe, from that of labor conciliation as well.

Mr. Bell asks whether a nation sacrifices sovereignty "in choosing to enter into a contract from which it may, upon a proper notice given, choose to withdraw"? The question obviously ignores the fact that a member may not withdraw from the League so long as, in the judgment of a single member of the Council, it has not fulfilled its international obligations. And, by the way, would a member vested with a mandate from the League ever be in the happy situation of having "fulfilled its international obligations"?

Mr. Bell urges that the United States should not, by reservations attached to its ratification of the Covenant, "demand a privileged place in the League." In the preceding paragraph, however, he himself admits that certain states are likely to cling to their "powerful armaments" for a generation to come. Now I ask whether the states referred to will not in fact enjoy "a privileged place in the League" just as distinctly as the United States will in consequence of reservations meant to safeguard policies which have hitherto been essential to its security? But this is not to deny that it ought to be easy to construct a league which the United States would consent to enter without reservations, a league which, moreover, would be a far more promising creation from the point of view of securing international peace than the proposed ramshackle arrangement.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Princeton, N. J., June 24

Book Reviews

Brand Whitlock's Picture of Invaded Belgium

BELGIUM. By Brand Whitlock. Two Volumes. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

HOW rarely a great historic spectacle finds the eye to see it. What would we not give for the impressions of some cultured cleric of the fifth century, A. D. concerning the barbarian invasions of Italy! In the case of Belgium, the rarest good luck sent opportunely to Brussels as American Minister a sensitive man of letters. Mr. Whitlock has given the actual picture of great and dire events of which he was a large part, but has kept withal something of artistic detachment, moderation, irony, and humor. Wisely he has reshaped his day-by-day notes in the light of memory and of general proportionateness. What we have is an extraordinary unfolding, a gradual and cumulative revelation of depths of baseness and heroism. The narrative proceeds, touch by touch, with an imperceptible heightening of sentiment, patiently and almost indirectly building up the picture of a nation's martyrdom. It is an extension of the method employed so ably in fiction by William Dean Howells. The result is a singularly living bit of history.

When Von Kluck's field-gray assassins were sweeping westward towards Brussels, Minister Whitlock and his friend the Spanish Minister, the Marquis of Villalobar, decided to stay. Their place technically was at Havre where the Belgian Government had taken refuge. During the military occupation they had no kind of official capacity. The Germans simply didn't dare molest the representatives of two conceivably useful neutral Powers. The two gallant Ministers remained to be the eye of civilization on the dark deeds of the conqueror. On Von der Goltz and Von Bissing they were a constant restraint; to the Belgians a symbol of the world's sympathy and aid. We doubt if history shows another instance of an entirely anomalous position so long and ably maintained.

Mr. Whitlock's narrative must be read slowly and in its entirety. Quotation does no kind of justice to it. We propose to touch only a few main points of interpretation. It was clear to Mr. Whitlock that the Germans came in prepared to terrify all hands by Berseker rage, yet affrighted themselves by visions of atrocious partisan warfare. What disturbed them most was their failure to convert their rage into personal impressiveness. By a most curious twist in psychology, the Hun with Belgium under his heel suffered as a slighted person. He fully expected admiration from his victim. This grotesque, barbaric vanity produced the most sinister effects. Mr. Whitlock has shown that every massacre of the dozen perpetrated in Flanders followed closely upon a German reverse in the field. Louvain, Namur, Dinant, Termonde were so many ways of restoring the Hun's self-respect.

This trait of German thinking, which caused the worst woes of Belgium, actually made it easier for the fine diplomats of Spain and America to deal with the military Government. In the desire to be stern and impressive, Von Bissing and his subordinates constantly put themselves in impossible situations. They offered the Marquis of Villalobar, instead of the unlimited pass due his position, a pass "for the purpose of inspecting grain supplies." He sent it back with the reply that he was not a "flour merchant." Later they requested Mr. Whitlock to bring the Japanese secretary of legation to headquarters, and Mr. Whitlock sent a memorandum to the effect that he was not a gendarme. The German military Government was equally embarrassed by the wit of the Belgians. It was easy for Von Bissing to forbid commemoration of the violation of Belgium, but it was impossible, on the anniversary, to prevent all Brussels from wearing a symbolic scrap of paper in its button hole. Nothing simpler than to forbid the display of the national colors, but how deal with a Belgian mother who took her three daughters to church dressed in orange, black, and red? When all Brussels was ordered to deliver up its bicycle tires, instead of doing it quietly, the wheelmen made a ceremony of it, clattering to the depots on the steel rims with the detached tires uniformly worn as bandoliers.

Soon famine came near. Belgium used her extraordinary communal organization to form the Comité National, for provisioning and charity of all sorts. It was the distributing agency for the neutral Committee for Belgian Relief. Neither could have functioned had not Mr. Whitlock and the Spanish Minister been on the spot to deal with the German military Government and to guarantee the proper distribution of the food. Through the dullness and ill-will of the Germans, the work was from time to time imperilled. It was carried through chiefly by volunteer agents, under conditions of appalling difficulty. Mr. Whitlock had to explain to a well-meaning American worker that when a Belgian, writing French, "demanded" a favor or "ignored" a fact his intentions were entirely civil. Besides the gigantic labor of the Relief, Mr. Whitlock had to deal with a special crop of war cranks—among others with a society organized to disinfect battlefields promptly after the fighting.

For a while the military Government was chiefly meddlesome and offensive. Proclamations so abounded that even on hazard of death the Belgians paid little attention to them. On the sinking of the Lusitania, it was officially posted that the terrified passengers had been induced to sail by a rebate of ten dollars per ticket. On one occasion an entire girls' school was cast into jail, the offense being the refusal to continue music lessons under a German professor. Even in terror the Belgians indulged a malign curiosity as to what would be the next vagary of the mentalité allemande. On this subject the Edith Cavell case shed the fullest light. German honor was illustrated in the official lie to Minister Whitlock; German insight in the confidence that where distinguished persons were involved in an identical accusation with an obscure British nurse, to kill the nurse would make least trouble; German justice in the posting of the military order legalizing the shooting of Edith Cavell—after she had been shot.

An heroic chapter, first fully elucidated by Mr. Whitlock, is the moral resistance of the Belgian civil Government to illegal encroachment of the German military tribunals. Everybody knows about Mayor Max's assertion of those ancient rights which, under successive foreign occupations, Brussels had never failed to enjoy. Cardinal Mercier's heroic protests against the atrocities and deportations are still ringing through the world. But who knows of the adroit and resolute campaign that M. Théodore, head of the Belgian bar, waged in behalf of the rights of civil courts under military occupation? His letters to the Military Governor are so many legal classics. He failed to carry his point, but he established the law for all time.

Into the inferno of the deportations Mr. Whitlock is a lucid guide. The cold terror of those days, when men were herded more casually than cattle ever are, and sent to forced labor and death—all that lives anew in this book. We have no heart to attenuate the record through selection or condensation. These chapters are both history and great literature. Worse than the deportations was the hypocrisy with which the Germans defended them. "Laziness is the family's worst enemy," wrote Von Bissing to Cardinal Mercier, justifying the tearing of husband from wife.

Mr. Whitlock's book is rich in original documents, and is in every sense necessary to the historian. On the literary side he has achieved what would seem the impossible; he has enriched and deepened the sympathy of the world for Belgium, and for Imperial Germany he has provided not greater indignation—the utmost limit had been reached—but a more understanding and discriminating contempt.

Scientific City Government

EXPERTS IN CITY GOVERNMENT. Edited by Edward A. Fitzpatrick. (National Municipal League Series.) New York: D. Appleton and Company.

A NEW MUNICIPAL PROGRAM. Edited by Clinton Rogers Woodruff. The same.

THE first of these volumes may be described as an elaboration of its statement that "there is emerging the idea of a profession of city administration." Its object is to stress the need for that idea, to show how far it prevails in our practice, to discuss its limitations, and to consider the forces working in its favor and those against it. That the expert is gradually obtaining a firm foothold in city government in this country is happily apparent by many signs. It is less and less easy to surprise a class in Civics with the information that in Europe a city often advertises for an official, or that a man living in one place may be appointed to office in another. Some of our largest cities are doing both of these things. But the expert is no more a perfect remedy for the ills of city government than was the merit system, and this book, while it emphasizes the growing indispensability of the expert, does not fail to take into account the necessity of co-operation between him and the community that he serves, and the necessity of keeping him under control. There would be little gain in exchanging the boss for the bureaucrat.

Considerable space is given to the question of the training of the expert, and our public service is severely criticised as being unattractive to the very kind of man the community needs. This lack of attractiveness, which has always been noted by observers of our government, affects all positions, and not merely those demanding the expert; but the increasing appreciation of the value of the latter may be expected to raise the ideals of public service in general. The book is a practical handbook, being crowded with details and illustrations. Its chapters are contributed by Prof. Edward Alsworth Ross, Delos F. Wilcox, President Lowell, and other authorities of similar standing.

The "new" municipal programme of the second of these volumes is the successor of the programme adopted by the National Municipal League in 1900. It differs from the first programme in adopting the "commission manager" form of government, the first programme having been decided upon before this development in the commission form had occurred. The new model city charter which it embodies differs from the old in being a home rule charter instead of one framed by the Legislature for all the cities of a State. The programme includes the merit system, the short ballot, the initiative, referendum, and recall, consolidation of city and county, strict control of public utilities and city planning, and provides a section on preferential voting for cities that desire it. The volume is not a mere exposition of this programme, but brings together facts and arguments bearing upon its various policies and items. In both books there is a healthful divergence now and then between editor and contributor.

Exit the Superman

VOLLEYS FROM A NON-COMBATANT. By William Roscoe Thayer. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

THESE essays, written during the period of the war and reprinted from various publications, are singularly interesting as depicting a truly academic mind under the stress of emotionalism. They voice a righteous indignation in terms adequate to an extraordinary occasion. Though most of the subjects under discussion have been thrashed without ceasing since 1914, the author of these essays succeeds better than most in getting at the real pith. He says, "I lay no more claim to serenity than to neutrality," yet the fine balance of the historian is everywhere apparent.

This work might fittingly have been entitled "The Barbarians," for the war is pictured as a contest "in which Germany strove to destroy civilization and to substitute for it the barbaric German Kultur." The fine flower of Kultur is the superman and it is to him that our attention is first directed in these essays. The superman was made in Germany, though Mr. Bernard Shaw might, if he were in an assertive mood, dispute the fact. Obviously the superman could not be satisfied with the philosophy, ethics, or religion by which ordinary men lived. The giant must have the giant's robe, not the swaddling clothes of an infant. So a philosophical system was devised which embodied the ideals of supermania, and a deity was created called Gott—"a strangely composite creature, who, when analyzed, turns out to be four parts war god of the Goth-and-Vandal type and one part Frederick the Great." The Kaiser was appointed custodian of Gott. Let no one think this ribaldry, for did not Professor Ostwald, the first of the German exchange professors at Harvard, say in 1914, "In our country God the Father is reserved for the personal use of the Emperor"? He did indeed, and added, "In one instance He was mentioned in a report of the General Staff, but it is to be noted that He has not appeared there a second time."

We are continually perplexed in our study of the superman. Which, for example, were the supermen—the German centre of Prussian Guards and Saxons, who crumbled before Foch's Frenchmen, or those Frenchmen themselves? Would it be correct to define a German superman as one who can not stand up against a mere ordinary foreign man? The ninety-three professors who certified to the moral, not less than to the military, perfection of Germany would dissent from this; and yet how does it profit you to be a superman if you run before any smaller variety of men?

German supermania has been based biologically on "the survival of the fittest," but apparently without sufficient reflection on the different kinds of fitness. After nearly eighteen hundred years the thoughts of Marcus Aurelius survive, but the names of the victorious gladiators in the Flavian Amphitheatre are forgotten, as those of Hindenburg, Moltke, and Mackensen will be when other standards of fitness than those of slaughter are reestablished. In days like these it gives solace, says the author of these essays, to reflect that we can still hear Theocritus singing his idylls among moonlit groves, while all the atrocious tyrants of Syracuse are merely names or even less. And if to-day we had to choose between preserving the art, literature, and history of Athens and the Kultur of Germany under William II, can there be any doubt which we should jettison? In blotting out the Sieges Allee we should deprive posterity of many a smile, and in throwing over the records of Pan-Germanism and super-mania we should deprive it of the spectacle of an otherwise incredible racial hallucination; but after all, Treitschke, Nietzsche, and the Hohenzollern Kaiser are but for a generation, whereas Thucydides, Plato, and Pericles are for all time.

In fairness we must, of course, judge the Germans by their achievements in the activity which they pronounce supreme. That activity is war. But in war the Germans have revealed none of those transcendent qualities that should form the martial heritage of supermen. In 1914 the Kaiser commanded the most stupendous army the world had ever seen. He swept on, apparently irresistible, for thirty-six days; then a crevice was found in its armor, a sword was plunged into it, and the monster reeled backward. Four days later it was in full retreat. After a few weeks the Kaiser sent half a million of his best troops on a "promenade" to Calais, but on the way they met a hundred thousand "Contemptibles" at Ypres and got no farther in the three years that followed. This is confusing; if one Britisher can check and virtually defeat five Germans, which is the real superman?

So, too, in the matter of German eagerness to buy victories by bribery rather than by fighting. Admitting that we must go back to the Renaissance to find the equals of the Germans in mendacity, we must also remember that the most extraordinary aptitude for cunning and mendacity would not entitle its possessor to pass for a superman. No one argues that the Renaissance delinquents were supermen.

Lovers of fact can not fail to be grateful to the Germans for their complete demonstration that there are no supermen. The collapse of the superman myth will bring relief to those who saw that the superman creed, if true, meant the negation of whatever moral and spiritual ideals mankind has laid hold of in the course of its painful ascent from savagery. When Professor Haeckel and Professor Harnack and all the other ninety-three incarnations of German veracity tell us that the Germans are the Chosen People, instead of being convinced, we begin to wonder whether Haeckel, Harnack, and the rest have been cultivating their special fields of science with the same disregard of fact that they display in their finally tested theory of the superman.

The cult of the superman could flourish only in a time and among a people given over to materialism. There are two sorts of education: the one endeavors to liberate the spirit; the other to train those faculties which spring from the physical nature of man. It is the latter to which the Germans have devoted themselves. Their gross materialism, with all its implications, is the fundamental theme of all the essays composing the work before us. Whatever the specific subject, we always get back to that. Hence, throughout, the work abounds in observations that are calculated to solace and reinvigorate those who, while prizing the things of the spirit, have found it hard to escape from the depressing influences of the last five years.

"Straight Goods"

TWELVE MEN. By Theodore Dreiser. New York: Boni and Liveright.

WINESBURG, OHIO: A GROUP OF TALES OF OHIO SMALL TOWN LIFE. By Sherwood Anderson. New York: B. W. Huebsch.

HOWEVER we may assess Mr. Dreiser as a story-teller and a critic of life, for his portraiture we must value him above most of his contemporaries. There his extraordinary zest for detail is relatively under the control of an instinct for significant detail. There he is interested in the trees because they make up the wood, and in those trees alone (well, not alone, but chiefly!) which give the wood its character. We mean of course its character in his eyes, for this writer is not more able than other writers to see or to paint an object without refraction or tincture from his own temperament or "philosophy." We know that in art there is no such thing as dry fact or casual incident; that the most naturalistic fragment of still life owes its effectiveness to composition; and that, as for life in action, no story-teller takes a slice of it with his eyes shut. Mr. Dreiser has been convicted long since of an almost unparalleled slackness and diffuseness. But a portrait, like a sonnet, lies plainly within bounds, and carries, in a way, its own safeguard.

There is diffusion in this book. A few of the chapters become tedious with items. "Culhane the Solid Man," which has to do with a certain ex-wrestler and a famous training establishment in Westchester, is, with its fifty pages, little more or less than a "write-up" on a colossal scale. But most of these studies do, with their cumulative method, build up a clear and solid presentment of certain fellow-beings whom the writer has deeply known. Mr. Dreiser has been accused of animalism and even of diabolism. One fact becomes clearer than ever in the light of these pages: that at the bottom of his philosophy—the will to accept and record the thing as it is, and the tendency to see it with a cool and skeptical eye—lies a spring of that Teutonic emotionalism which it is so difficult to distinguish from sentimentality. This, let us say, is a book of admirations. And we get the effect of his being concerned not more, certainly, with the special traits of his twelve typical American personalities than with the common denominator of simple human goodness and loveliness with which he credits them.

These are men, all of them, in whom he pays tribute to some dominant or saving virtue—energy, generosity, efficiency, faith, genius, sacrifice to an ideal, youth . . . there perhaps we touch the key-note; since the object of our worship in these pages, however manifested, is the childlike heart. The virtue of the book itself is pretty well concentrated in the best though not the longest of its studies, "My Brother Paul." It is an amazingly sympathetic portrait of Paul "Dresser," as he called himself, author of "On the Banks of the Wabash" and a hundred other popular favorites—a typical hero of Broadway, and something a good deal closer to us than that. For he is so presented to us here, in his grossness, his tenderness, his vitality, his vanity, the innocent banality of his taste, which was the taste of his huge following, that we can not resist him as a fellow-creature worthy of affection and even respect. Nothing of him is willingly suppressed or glozed over. We are to know him as he is, and so to take or leave him, as we may. One passage, amusing in itself, represents a lapse into the characteristic prolixity of our chronicler—the several pages which record an evening pilgrimage of the brothers up among the bars and restaurants of Broadway, from the Gilsey House to Forty-second Street, in the interests of a vulgar story—"a new one" Brother Paul is determined to be the first to spring along this laughing thoroughfare.

The publisher's "blurb" expert does an uncommonly good piece of work in connection with the "Winesburg, Ohio" of Sherwood Anderson, but rather gives himself away in his final sentence: "Honesty of purpose and refusal to compromise elevate this book to such a plane as to renew our hope for an American fiction comparable to the Continental product which, in our barrenness, has hitherto been our sole recourse." That is (one gathers) we who have demanded a real interpretation of life have had to go to the French and Russians for it; here is an author who means business, who sets to work with a grim "refusal to compromise"—and a consequent settling down to the Continental method. This does injustice both to recent American fiction as a whole, and to Mr. Anderson's work in particular. Our earlier attempts at "realism," our experiments in the nineties, say, were quite clearly based on French and Russian models. Frank Norris was so fully saturated with foreign method that he could not keep clear of foreign idiom even in so deliberately American a study as "The Octopus." And something like this has continued to be true of the later British novelists—the "younger school" of the past decade or two. But the hopeful thing about our own novels of the past few years, a considerable group of them, is their development of an indigenous realism which, without specially pluming itself on its honesty of purpose and without any conscious refusal to compromise, has proceeded to show us as we are. It is almost as if these writers were calmly assuming that America also is a Continent, with a racial character not to be interpreted in terms of any other continent! And Sherwood Anderson is one of these. You may easily have discovered foreign influences in his first novel, "Windy McPherson's Son," and they may have been consciously yielded to there.

In the sketches or episodes of "Winesburg, Ohio" they lie well in the background. We feel the author's impulse is positive, is a will to perform and not a refusal to compromise. And yet "uncompromising" is likely to be the word in the reader's mind as he reads these chronicles. A kind of prose "Spoon River" commentary, probing beneath the surface of American small town life for its real substance . . . or rather probing beneath the small town life for the individual lives and consciousnesses of its friends and fellow-citizens. Winesburg, Ohio, is as disconcerting as Spoon River was, because we see it for the first time without its mask of official decorum. Physically, as a place, we recognize it to the least item. The map on the inside of the cover gives merely the landmarks of that topography with which we become intimate. Kate Swift's walk of a winter night becomes our walk to the last inch: "First she went to the end of her own street and then across a pair of hay scales set in the ground before a feed barn and into Trunion Pike. Along Trunion Pike she went to Ned Winter's barn and turning east followed a street of low frame houses that led over Gospel Hill and into Sucker Road that ran down a shallow valley past Ike Smead's chicken farm to Waterworks Pond . . ." and so on. It is our town; we are there with the fading school-ma'am, know what drives her towards young George Willard, and what, that same night, heals, through her passion, the Reverend Curtis Hartman of his soul's sickness. These tales, or sketches, are linked, like the Spoon River numbers, by cross-allusion and the repeated appearance, in foreground or background, of the same persons. Young Willard is, in no very brilliant way, the central figure—the lad of somewhat more than ordinary ability and imagination who is among the few destined actually to escape from Winesburg and to try conclusions with fate on more open ground. With his departure our curtain falls. We board the train with him and drift away from the town of Winesburg, perhaps forever. "His life there had become but a background on which to paint the dreams of manhood." There is much of "sex" in this book, and it would not have been judged a book for the "young person," when there was such a thing. But it is a book which that quaint creature's enlightened successor might well read as a caustic offset against the elaborate prurience of the current magazines—or even for that breath of sturdy Scottish idealism which animates it, by way of offset against the mental and moral smudginess of a Russian using a microscope, the shrugging cynicism of a Frenchman applying the scalpel, and eke the Teutonic sentimentalism of a Dreiser sawing wood. H. W. BOYNTON

A Partly Reformed Rebel

KEELING LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS.
Edited by E. T. With an Introduction
by H. G. Wells. New York: The Macmillan Company.

WHEN Mr. Wells introduces a radical agitator as "egotistical, rebellious, disorderly," describes him as "a wild, loose thing," and speaks of his "wildly speculative methods" in politics and his "manifestly disordered nerves in the matter of sex," we should not expect to find ourselves in the society of a peaceful and well-regulated citizen. It is fair to say at once that Keeling's letters, at least those that are printed, are not indecent or degenerate. He was loose in his ideas of sex, as he was generally, through his earlier years, irresponsible in matters of personal relationship. Apparently on the impulse of the moment, he married the daughter of the Mrs. Townshend to whom most of these letters are addressed and who now gives them to the public, lived with his wife for a short time, grey restive of restraint and left her, but remained on good terms as a visitor and had several children by her. Mr. Wells regards the publishing of the letters revealing this affair as an act of heroism; to us it seems merely bad taste, but Keeling's language, though frank and explosive, is not morbid in tone or repulsive in detail.

His attitude towards free love was, in fact, not so much the effect of disordered nerves as a manifestation, among many others, of an undisciplined mind. Frederic Hillersdon Keeling was born of a good family in 1886. His childhood was unhappy. Mrs. Townshend, in her prefatory Memoir, explains the situation by calling him a "frank, generous, turbulent creature, full of fierce energy," set down by a blunder of fate "in a decorous middle-class home where all the conventions of Victorian propriety were rigidly observed." We know what that means. Alas, for the Victorian proprieties, how shocking they are to the liberated souls of this heroic Georgian age!

At Cambridge the young Keeling for his studies made a specialty of modern history, and for his life threw himself heart and soul into the organizing of Fabian societies. On going down he continued his studies by devouring Blue Books and extended his socialistic activities by devoting himself to the work of various labor unions and relief associations. Where there was a strike, there was Keeling. He had great power of work, though at times he needed the complete relaxation of travel. Much that he accomplished may have been good, but his ideas of society and government in these early years were merely emotional and anarchical. Yet he was honest with himself. Mrs. Townshend speaks more than once, as indeed does he himself, of his intense desire to get at the naked fact of life; and this characterization, though it may seem to be contradicted by vehement partisanship, we are inclined to accept as true. His sincerity is proved by his power of development and by his frankness in admitting his changed point of view. He began as a mere doctrinaire; before the war called him away from political activities he had thrown over most of his academic theories, and was preparing, in good British fashion, to act with the regular Liberal party for the slow and practical reform of abuses. From the army in November, 1915, he writes these significant words: "The dividing line in politics now seems to be largely one of temperament, and for all my erratic habits I have, I believe, a good deal of rock-bottom English instincts in me. I do not like Welshmen or hustlers, or phrase-mongering do-the-trick demagogues, who damn the Cabinet, etc." It is about the same as if he had said, I do not like all that I used to stand for.

He was still young—he died when only thirty—but the question that naturally arises is why one with this rock-bottom of English character should have passed through years, few though they were, of such turbulence. Mr. Wells, attributing the trouble to Keeling's education, "is left wondering if university history is indeed any sort of mental training at all"; and we rather agree with Mr. Wells, though our remedy would probably seem to him worse than the present evil. Mr. Wells would say, we suppose, that the study of modern history as Keeling got it at Cambridge was academic and dead, and that it should have been enlivened by a more immediate concern with current affairs. What impresses us is the fact that his education in this field was not academic enough. It is only too clear that Keeling went through his university years without receiving any large views of human nature, any steadied intuition from the experience of the past, with no thorough training of the imagination, or discipline of the understanding, with no real education. We do not mean to press this view too far; there was, as he himself came to know, a vein of eccentricity and rebellious egotism in his nature. The pity of it was that his almost exclusive study of modern history and modern untried problems did nothing to chasten his mind or instil modesty; for such chastening the university turned him over to the perilous school of the world. He was, in large measure, merely one of the innumerable victims of the regnant system of education.

When the war came, it found Keeling an admirer of Prussia and a believer in the mission of pan-Germanism, but still a sound Englishman. He enlisted early, served ably in the trenches, rose from the ranks, and gave his life for the cause. Just how he reconciled his patriotism with his undiscarded Teutonism does not clearly appear; but he did not waiver in action.

The Run of the Shelves

GOOD enough to read anywhere, yet not too good to read on the train, "The Haunted Bookshop," by Christopher Morley (Doubleday, Page), offers a blend of a modern reader's guide with a regulation love story complicated by pacifism and a German bomb plot. The whole is held together by a whimsicality and humor owing something to Sterne and more to Robert Louis Stevenson. Excellent summer reading for the moderately bookish.

War gives a decided impetus to spiritualism. Itself the purveyor of death, it is thought to furnish sustenance to a cult to which death is the purveyor. Sir Oliver Lodge's "Raymond," in which communications from that author's dead son were believably reported, was published in 1916. Barrie's "Well Remembered Voice" is merely or mainly artistic in its outlook, though the artistic interest in the subject is probably closer to the scientific or pseudo-scientific interest than many artists and many scientists would be willing to concede. "Thy Son Liveth" (Little, Brown and Company) reports the messages "which an American soldier killed in France sent to his sorrowing mother." Miss Lillian Whiting in "They Who Understand" (also Little, Brown and Company) is refined and fervid in her effort to supply momentum for spiritualism from the powerhouse of war. Mr. Horatio Dresser, in his "On the Threshold of the Spiritual World" (George Sully and Company) does not go so far; for him communion rather than communication would define the intercourse between the dead and the living.

Now believer and unbeliever, differing widely as to the sanity of this movement, may agree that it is seasonable. If spiritualism is true and is to prove itself, this is its time. The conditions under which the barrier between the dead and the living is to be passed (if it be passable) are presumably one with those under which the passage of any natural barrier, a mountain-range, a river, an ocean, is effected in the material world. The means may be as wide apart as the poles, but the conditions which elicit the means are similar. People in a crude age settle on both banks of a hitherto impassable river. Individuals on both sides want to cross. A pressure on the barrier follows. Now let some special circumstance multiply by ten, by a hundred, by a thousand, the seekers for a ford, a ferry, or a bridge. The pressure will be intensified, and the probability that in some particular brain the desire will find itself in the company of the mechanical faculty of a Daedalus, a Stephenson, a Fulton, or an Orville Wright are proportionally heightened. When that occurs, the river will be crossed.

The point is that the conditions just named coincide exactly with the spiritistic conditions of the moment, if, for the sake of argument, we concede to the spiritualists that the dead exist and crave intercourse with the living. Death and bereavement, both operative on an almost unexampled scale, have accumulated on both sides of the barrier multitudes to whom, on the spiritualistic theory, the passage of the barrier is a point of vital interest. Spiritualists would of course contend that the gulf has been already traversed. But the majority even of that cult would admit that transit has never been rendered easy, general, or secure. If there have been Leif Ericsons, there has been no Columbus. This is their opportunity; it is also, in a more limited sense, their ordeal. Never before perhaps in recorded history has the pressure upon the barrier been so great. The torch never burnt so high in Sestos; now, if ever, let Leander swim the Hellespont.

In his little book of one hundred and fifty pages, "An Introduction to Early Church History" (Macmillan), Mr. R. Martin Pope undertakes to furnish a convenient introduction. His point of view seems to be determined mainly by the influence of recent studies in the history of religion and of religions. He thinks of Christianity as one in a group of competing efforts to satisfy the individual spiritual longing of peoples dissatisfied with the inherited traditions of the ethnic cults. His narrative tends steadily towards the aim of explaining why Christianity succeeded in overcoming the rest and in displacing the great dominant system of the imperial state religion. Of originality, either in thought or method, there is little trace. References to modern authors of good reputation abound, and it is clear that the author has read intelligently in the sources. On critical points there is often a refreshing decision of judgment, as, for instance, that the tradition of an unbroken apostolic succession has no foundation in Scripture and that the dictum: "Where there are no bishops there can be no church" is equally unwarranted. The origin of creeds is assumed to be late, the Apostles' Creed and the canon of the New Testament are placed in the fourth century. The conjecture that we may be on the point of dropping the Old Testament altogether from its association with the New is perhaps a little bold. The origin of the episcopate as a development out of a college of presbyters is accepted, but with full recognition of a fairly early differentiation.

The view of state persecution of Christianity is inadequate and not fair towards the government. The name of Diocletian is not "stained" by his harshness towards Christians. The worst that ought to be said of him is that he had not the insight and foresight to perceive the value of Christian support in his overarduous task of administering his unwieldy empire. It is rather a pity that the space devoted to Mr. Walter Pater could not have been given to a more careful analysis of Pliny's puzzling correspondence with Trajan. It is a little startling to be told that the early Christian basilica was modelled on the Roman private house. It is not very enlightening to hear that there is no evidence that infant baptism was not practiced in the apostolic age and that it is probable from the first. The suggestion that the "perils endured by the hero of The Cloister and the Hearth in his journey from Deventer to Rome" are the embellishments of a romancer betray a cheerful lack of acquaintance with the sources of that veracious narrative.

In a word, this book, like most of its kind, attempts too much and too little. It is neither manual nor essay. It must be taken, at best, for an introduction, as its author intended it, and to this end the lists of authorities will serve fairly well.

Francis Rolt-Wheeler, in "The Wonder of War at Sea" (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard, Boston) continues successfully the consecrated formula for a boy's book. Jed, a thrice blessed Yankee lad, is "mined" in the British Channel in the early hours of the war, and by virtue of that happy accident passes through every phase of North Sea service with the British mosquito fleet. A similar intention to bring the war home to young folks inspires "The Battle of the Nations," by Frederic Arnold Kummer (Century), a straightforward and vigorous account of the causes and course of the war.

Poetry

The Fête of the Snore

THE Rinktum-Winktum of Hindustan
Was a most polite and elegant man,
With a nose that spread like a Chinese fan.

The Burma-Wurma of Sarawak
Was a queenly dowager, dreadfully black,
Who rode to meals on a piebald yak.

Now both were invited to Singapore,
To the fête of the Chief Mohammedan Snore,
In his wonderful palace that had no floor.

They spied each other. "Oho!" said the Rink-Tum-Winktum, letting his gold teeth clink,
"Dear Madam, what will you have to drink?"

"For breakfast, they give me temperance tea;
For supper, the juice from the cocoa tree.
Nothing at all between, for me."

"Oho," said the Rinktum, "adorable Burm-A-Wurma, what if we dance a term?"
"As you are so kind, let's try one squirm."

Gravely the Rinktum said, "Begin!"
They danced to the door, they danced right in,
They danced where the palace floor—should have been!

Kerflop! And the Rinktum-Winktum's shoes
Hit on the beach at Vera Cruz.
He fell through the earth, as true as true's!

Kerflip! And the Burma-Wurma's knees
Splashed in the Caribbean Seas.
"We'll sit out the next dance, if you please."

The people of Rinktum-less Hindustan
Hunted in vain for the vanished man.
Gone was the nose like a Chinese fan!

The woeful women of Sarawak
Wept for a queen who did not come back
To ride to meals on her piebald yak.

But the crafty Chief Mohammedan Snore
Sneered six times at Singapore,
"Who'll dance in my palace that has no floor?"

CLEMENT WOOD

NOTE—Readers of this striking little allegory may welcome some elucidation. They readily see, once it is pointed out, that the Rinktum-Winktum stands for the stolid Russian peasant, the Chinese nose indicating his pacifist Tolstoian proclivities; the "dreadfully black" Burma-Wurma represents the anarchist-soviet forces; the Mohammedan Snore, a plain allusion to His Interned Majesty's Turkish connections; the "palace that had no floor" signifies Bolshevism; and the wind-up at Vera Cruz and the Caribbean indicates the abortive attempts to embroil Mexico in German plottings.

More tender-minded readers, "socially minded," as the phrase is, may prefer another avenue of escape. To such the royal Rinktum-Winktum may stand for monarchic reaction, the black Burma-Wurma signify the Kolchak forces, the floorless palace unrestrained capitalism, and the Snore the continued menace of militarism. In this case, the Caribbean seas may refer to prohibition, to the espionage law, or the Federal Post Office Department.

The possibilities, indeed, are quite infinite and irresistibly alluring.

The Canadian Situation

THE Canadian Parliament, amid many pressing matters, finds time to debate the question of protection and free trade. At least, it finds time to debate whether that question is a proper one to discuss at the moment. Two free-traders of the old Laurier Liberal party, who joined Sir Robert Borden's Unionist Ministry in support of conscription and the energetic prosecution of the war, find themselves constrained to follow quite different courses of action, now that the Finance Minister has brought down his tariff proposals. Mr. Calder, the Liberal party's organizer for the West, retains his place as Minister of Agriculture in the Unionist Cabinet, adroitly arguing that he does not consider the obligations of the War Ministry fulfilled until peace is signed, ratified, and established, and that it is no time to play with tariffs or politics in the face of the grave dangers threatened by a general election. Mr. Crerar, on the other hand, late President of the Grain Growers' Association, resigns as Minister of Immigration because he does not regard the proposed tariff reductions as sufficiently drastic.

This is but another instance of the old conflict between theory and expediency. Theoretically the Conservative or Tory party has been protectionist and the Liberal party free-trade. Yet neither party in power has during the last fifty years advanced to a rigorous application of its theoretical policy. Sir John A. Macdonald, though not a protectionist, introduced protection under the title of the "national policy." When Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896, it was on a free-trade wave. He had proclaimed himself a Liberal of the British type, a follower of Richard Cobden, yet during the eighteen years of his administration he adhered more or less closely to a protectionist programme. He came nearest to the realization of his professed ideal, when, in 1911, he attempted to bring about reciprocity with the United States. His Government went to defeat ostensibly on that issue. But it was not a repudiation of lower tariffs. Regional, linguistic, religious, and other differences were deciding elements in that struggle. And the proof that a low tariff was not held to be repudiated by the Canadian electorate may be found in the fact that from 1911 to the present day the Borden Government's annual financial statements have bit by bit included all that the projected—and supposedly rejected—reciprocity agreement contained.

Under the present proposal the customs war taxes are abolished, the duty on coffee is reduced five cents a pound, tea from the Empire, three cents, free wheat and potatoes are confirmed by statute, and agricultural implements are assessed on approximately the scale of the reciprocity agreement. A resulting reduction of revenue by $17,000,000 will be met by raising the income tax to the level of the United States rates and by setting the corporation tax at ten per cent. on profit in excess of $2,000. These changes work out strikingly to the profit of the West as against the East. But Mr. Crerar is not to be satisfied with anything short of the radical demands of the Dominion Council of Agriculture.

He would apparently risk a general election. Most sober-minded people would just at this time risk almost anything else. For at the moment there are no political parties in Canada. There is no longer a Liberal party; its illustrious leader is in the grave and party division alone survives. There is no longer a Conservative party; it has been swallowed up by the monster, Unionism. No group could hope to emerge from a general election with strength sufficient to control the situation.

In a few weeks, three at most, the present memorable session will be over. I dare to risk a prediction of what will immediately follow the prorogation without much fear of events failing to bear me out. The Government is practically certain to have a substantial majority on the Budget, which will exorcise the phantom of an election. It is quite possible there will be a majority of forty for Sir Thomas White's tariff—even granting to Mr. Crerar more followers than he seems likely to win. Then will come the organization of a permanent Union party, supplanting the old Conservative party of Macdonald and Cartier, and consisting of thoroughgoing Conservatives, and a big percentage of what we may call War Liberals. There will be a reconstruction of the Cabinet. One minister's retirement opens the way for Sir R. L. Borden to prosecute his long-conceived idea of replacing the older men of his ministry with younger, more active, and more up-to-date supporters.

The recent attempt to form a third party—a Free-Trade-Radical-Labor party—will certainly fail. The old, or Laurier's, Liberal party will be revived—with solid Quebec behind it—and, if no other complications set in, within a few years Canada will be back to the old-time party government.

Meanwhile, a serious crisis is still on. If Borden can bring this session to an early close—as is most probable—he will have a session in the autumn, during which further tariff changes will be made, a Franchise bill will be put through, and, the pathway being cleared, a general election will come early in 1920.

J. K. F.

Ottawa, Canada, June 17

A Voice from France

AT a time when the organs of radical opinion are spattering abuse on the "four old men at Versailles" and doing all in their little power to shatter the traditional friendship between France and America by bitter denunciation of supposed French imperialism, it may not be without interest and value to the sober and liberal thinker to listen for a moment to a voice from France. At a dinner given on May 28 by the Franco-American Union to the new Ambassador from the United States, M. Gabriel Hanotaux, scholar, diplomat, and statesman, delivered an address which was reprinted in Figaro on the following day. Particularly interesting at the present moment are his little portraits, in the best French manner, of "Les Quatre," the Big Four. It would be absurd, of course, to expect that in an after-dinner speech M. Hanotaux should anticipate the coldly judicial verdict of history, but his characterizations may be taken as expressing the most enlightened opinion of contemporary France. Even those of us who, having seen our President at closer range than M. Hanotaux, are less disposed than the kindly Frenchman to put implicit trust in his devotion and self-abnegation may listen not displeased to a tribute which is offered not alone to the President but to the nation which he represents. Even more valuable at the present hour is the speaker's picture of France, still bleeding from wounds that are perhaps incurable, her Northern and Eastern districts in ruins, a third of her man-power lost, and with a still powerful and unrelenting enemy at her very gates. His proud yet pathetic plea for the permanence of that mutual trust between the two republics which dates from the time of Washington and Lafayette should go straight to the heart of every right-thinking American.

In the following paragraphs the attempt has been made not so much to give a literal translation of the whole speech as to render the sense and spirit of those passages which seem to the translator to be of special interest to the American public to-day.

T. M. PARROTT

You are now taking over, Mr. Ambassador, the high diplomatic functions which the wisdom of President Wilson has confided to you at a time when the classical type of diplomacy is not in general favor. You are going to participate in the great work, the work of the Four, who are dictating the future laws of the world, and who are making valid, for long years, let us hope, our common victory. You will see at close range that Council of Four which history will look upon only at a distance.

First that patriot, keen of eye and sweeping of gesture, who unites in himself all of the qualities and perhaps some of the faults of our race, that man from the border of Brittany, that republican "Vendéen," eager, subtle, and wilful. At an age when nature ordinarily demands repose he has the most alert intelligence and the most brilliant vivacity. His arm is nerved for action, his head is clear for command. He has a powerful jaw, high cheekbones, a heavy mustache of the French fashion; he is all life, all explosive vigor; in a word his temperament is that of a man, our man, Georges Clemenceau.

Next to him as the representative of Italian eloquence and generosity is Orlando. All the splendid and fruitful traditions of ancient Rome radiate from him. Great orator, great democrat, and great statesman, wise even in his enthusiasm, grave even in his passion, he is the strong defender of a people and a dynasty, who by risking their existence in the cause of the rights of nations have rendered to Europe and the world such a service that to thank them there is no sacrifice great enough to be the measure of our gratitude.

In material power it is England who dominates the war. England has guarded the freedom of the seas which those who sank the Lusitania pretended to assure. And England, always mistress of the world in the art and science of politics, has confided her powers at Versailles to a Welsh minister, a son of the oldest European race, a son of the people, yet one whom the most brilliant natural gifts have raised to the first place among the men of his country and of all countries, Lloyd George. Lloyd George represents the new humanity grafted on the oldest and the strongest of existing stocks. Brought up, like so many Englishmen, on the Bible and Shakespeare, Lloyd George has noble thoughts and high aspirations. But his designs, which betray a high sensitiveness and an extreme tact, have at the same time a practical reality and application in which are recognizable that conqueror of the world, the English sailor. Lloyd George is the adventurer who pushes on, sounding-lead in hand. To the art of convincing he adds the art of pleasing speech. When he speaks his genial temper seems to caress his audience, but when he wishes to make friends, this incomparable orator knows how to listen. All things to all men, he bides his time, weighs and judges in his mind, and then pronounces the deciding word. Under the versatile leadership of Lloyd George England to-day has assumed the motto of ancient Rome, Tu regere populos Anglia memento. Europe has Clemenceau, Orlando and Lloyd George, but America has Wilson.

It is not my business, sir, to pronounce a judgment on him here in your presence. I do not even wish to try to draw a portrait of President Wilson. You would laugh at my rash folly. But you will not laugh at my faith in him or at my respect, and these have never changed. He is the man who for the profound reasons found on every page of his political and oratorical works determined the intervention of America in the war. He is the man who furnished the army of four million soldiers, the immense amount of material, the huge sums of money, and above all the new note of morale necessary to assure the final defeat of the enemy; the man who could give that historic "knock-out" blow, if I may use language as rough as the blow he gave our enemies; that man was unwilling to let Europe fight alone through that terrible struggle. And yet I may say in passing that it was in a spirit of perfect disinterestedness that America took part in the fray. His high position did not tie him to his own shores. He has come to us; he has left for months the government of the greatest republic in the world. He has left behind him urgent necessities, accumulated difficulties and the harsh criticism of party spirit, and he has come here to put his hand to the work of ideal justice which he himself conceived. Could anything be finer? And how can we suppose that history will not recognize and repay, with glory, her only recompense, such devotion, such self-abnegation, and such greatness?

But once peace has been signed, in the flood of joy and universal relief that will follow, our pain will only be sharper, our distress more insupportable and our losses more deeply felt. France, who has suffered so much, will still need her allies after the world has regained its calm and has everywhere begun again, even in the land whose dire ambitions have interrupted the peaceful labors of the world. France must long endure the after-effects of wounds that are perhaps incurable, for she alone of all nations has been struck at the very sources of her life. A huge part of France is torn to pieces. Our industry and our agriculture must be remade from the beginning. A third, perhaps, of our men are dead. A powerful and populous enemy is at our very gates who may once more invade our land.

It should be clearly understood that France remains weakened and exposed to attack. She is accused of imperialistic aims; history, perhaps, will rather accuse her, as it has so often done, of forgetting herself, of showing too chivalric a spirit and too imprudent a generosity. And that is the reason, since she can not become to-day greater than she was in 1870—while other lands have grown out of all proportion—that she turns to her friends and says to them, "Keep on. Do not stop what you have started. Stay to the end to help me, to guard me and yourselves." For France is at the very limit of the effort which freedom can demand of her. She can not fight a battle of the Marne every ten years.

I know, sir, that America does not need to be called. She is at hand and she will continue to be at hand whatever happens. The Franco-American Union can testify from experience, and that in the most critical moments, that your motto is Fidelity. A hundred, a thousand times we have found you ready and we shall always find you so.

Whether it is a question of intellectual and social intercourse, of monetary and financial dealings, of the furtherance of a common culture by the interchange of students, or more especially of the relief of our sufferings, public and private, the United States has not failed us, for she is more than our ally, she is our friend. Her heart is always open and benefits pour out from it like water from a spring. And it is because there are such feelings on both sides of the ocean that the friendship and trust which had their origin in the time of Washington and Lafayette have survived all trials. It is to you, sir, that the task is given of prolonging their life.

Books and Debarkation

WHAT is the present work of the Library War Service of the American Library Association? What is to continue to be its work, now that demobilization is proceeding so rapidly? And, looking still farther ahead, are the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Army and Navy to have, as a part of the new order of things, a Library Peace Service similar to the existing Library War Service? To gather the facts in answer to the first of these questions would make it necessary for the inquirer well-nigh to girdle the earth. To find the answer to the second he would have still to journey far. To the third question an immediate response can be given in terms which, if not precise, at least afford the hope that the present library service is to be made a permanent affair. A librarian on a holiday, who was personally conducted to several of the Association's points of service at the port of debarkation at Newport News, and in the territory thereabouts, here reports things that he saw and heard which suggest the fuller answers to all three of the questions that have been put.

Newport News itself is a town of throbbing hearts and marching men, of perpetual welcomes, and cheers, and music of countless bands for the incoming stream of men returning from overseas. Abroad the American Library Association is supplying reading matter to the American Expeditionary Forces, and plans to do so as long as a soldier wearing the American uniform remains in France, Germany, Russia or Siberia. Here at Newport News the American Library Association Dispatch Office is supplying its material to the men on the transports returning home, to the debarkation camps, to the troop trains on the way to demobilization camps, and to naval vessels of all descriptions; it is performing on its premises a local library service for men in uniform; and it is serving upwards of forty army and navy posts within a radius of a few miles,—as the crow flies, be it added, for the library workers conducting this service have many a mile to travel, as trolley cars or motor cars run, as ferry boats or launches go, in order to cover the entire area allotted to them. For months to come there will be work on shipboard and on shore like that now going on, which must be continued until the last man and the last of the supplies and stores have been returned from France.

Debarkation and that which follows are all very simple. One man, newly arrived at Newport News, described it with sudden and appropriate Rooseveltian emphasis in a telegram he sent to his people at home: "De-barked, de-loused, de-lighted." But the disinfecting process is not an enchanting one, and the waiting around in a debarkation camp with nothing to do is wearisome enough. Books and magazines are now a blessing which civilians can hardly imagine unless they have seen the demand for them in one of these camps, or on a troop or a hospital train.

In the hospitals themselves one can more easily realize what the demand for reading matter must be, though the variety of subjects covered by the requests coming to the hospital librarians constantly show something going on far different from the light reading that is

The Individual Motor Drive

"In 1886 the executives of the present Crocker-Wheeler Company together with Charles Curtis adopted the Individual Motor Drive.

"Since that time, the individual motor drive, originally advocated by Crocker-Wheeler, has grown to immense proportions not only in large machine drives for manufacturing plants, but in the remarkable development in the motor driven sewing machine, vacuum cleaner, washing machine, etc."

W. B. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & Co.

NOTED FOR QUALITY

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

usually supposed to engage the convalescent. Technical, educational, and vocational books are among those most wanted, as well as good stories of the "rattling" kind. An unexpected testimony of appreciation of the American Library Association's work in hospitals was offered by a patient who did not want to leave the hospital at the time of his discharge because he had never before seen such a library as he had been using there. Men at one hospital were heard by the visitor now reporting, clamoring for newspapers from their home towns. One of the men came from Atlanta, one from Chicago, one from St. Louis, one from Denver, and all were supplied with their home newspapers. The visitor got a new idea from the scene of the human impulse behind this whole library service.

The men come in such numbers to the library at the naval operating base, on the site of the Jamestown Exposition, opposite Newport News, that on Saturdays and Sundays, when their free time is greatest, the chairs are all filled, and the overflow sit around on the floor. Much reading is done by the men collateral to the courses of instruction that are given in the Naval Training School located here. A few of the subjects on which the librarian had been issuing books included electricity, machine-shop practice, navigation, algebra, arithmetic, dentistry, bee-keeping, embalming, and poetry, including the poems of Lowell, Longfellow, Tennyson, Browning and Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." The authorities have set aside a piece of land at this naval base as a site for a library building; so here a library is to be a part of the permanent establishment.

The trained librarians who are carrying on all this work have, of course, their full representation in the American Library Association Dispatch Office at Newport News. Here a large part of the activity of the staff is given over to sorting and distributing books for transports, troop trains, naval vessels, hospitals and camps, and for the use also of the various welfare organizations operating in Newport News. Sorting naturally means leaving out a book like "Dying Testimonies," a copy of which, on the morning in question, had just come to hand, and leaving in the books that can be used, so bringing together the best that are available for purposes of distribution. That best, assuredly, is of a very high order. On this particular morning of sorting and distributing, an officer from overseas, who had been landed from a transport only a few hours before, made a bee-line for the library

The Addressing Problems of Industry

The addressing problems of industry are solved by the Belknap Addressing Machine.

Typewritten Addresses for All Your Lists

That is the modern way—the way of sure, prompt, 100 per cent. mail deliveries. In every office where a typewriter is used the Belknap Addressing Machine can be made to increase sales, double the day's work and save money.

If you value economy, accuracy and speed you will not hesitate to secure a Belknap Addressing Machine. It gives your literature that personal appeal which a typewritten address possesses. You wouldn't write your business correspondence in long hand—why write addresses that way? Banish the wasteful method.

Treat It As You Do Your Figures

Place this important work upon a basis of minimum expense—elevate it to its logical importance.

Systematize it with an error-proof machine that will save you the cost of twenty helpers, do neater work, assure prompter deliveries and obtain a more favorable audience.

No. 4 Rotary, on special stand. Speed increased to 1800 to 2000 per hour.

When you install a Belknap Addressing Machine, you get a service that means efficiency in every detail.

First, we study your requirements. Then we adapt the Belknap to fit those needs. We plan the handling and operating. We stay with you until the Belknap is actually saving you money by doing this mechanical work better and quicker than it can be done in any other way.

Your Typewriter is Your Stencil Catter

The Belknap Fibrotype Stencil is the only one your stenographer can slip into her regular typewriter and cut without expensive equipment.

Our Reputation is Your Assurance of Satisfaction

For 35 years the Belknap Addressing mechanism has borne a large and responsible part of the commercial world's burden. It has in that time so capably conducted itself that—with all its numerous improvements—it stands today pre-eminently the most popular and widely used of all addressing machines.

Offices and Agencies in all Principal Cities

Rapid Addressing Machine Company "The Belknap System"

32-46 West Twenty-Third Street

: : : : : : : : : : New York

housed in the dispatch office, and while at first crestfallen because two books he wanted, Quiller-Couch's "Studies in Literature," and McFee's "Aliens" were both in circulation, later uttered an expression of pleasure to get a book, "The Education of Henry Adams," which, he said, headed a list of books he had made up in France. Various other readers later came in, and, among them several Anzacs, representing a contingent in port, who presented a request, readily granted, for books to be lent to them for the remainder of their voyage to New Zealand. On board their ship, they said, there were over a thousand men, about 130 married couples, and perhaps 50 babies. There were, too, some older children on board, and the commanding officer wanted books for them as well as for the men and women passengers.

Whether library service such as is now being conducted at the army and navy posts in the vicinity of Newport News, typical indeed of the service rendered elsewhere at numerous places throughout the country, will go on permanently is, as has already been said, a matter of hope. To be sure, some posts already have established libraries, maintained sometimes under conditions which limit their wider influence. At Fort Monroe, for example, there is the large and important collection of books possessed by the Coast Artillery School. But the collection, excellent as it is, includes technical books almost wholly, and in practice its use hitherto has been largely restricted to officers. A liberal number of recreational and vocational books were added by the American Library Association, and interesting results followed immediately, soldiers who had never before used the main library now coming in and securing for it a greater degree of usefulness than it had previously known. The American Library Association, as manifested in repeated expressions of interest and desire, is eager and willing to cooperate with the army and navy to make the present service permanent in the interests of America at peace, no less than in the interests of America at war.

WILLIAM ADAMS SLADE

Books Received

FICTION

- Harry, Myriam. The Little Daughter of Jerusalem. Dutton. $1.90 net.
 Hay, Ian. The Last Million. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50 net.
 Hodges, Arthur. The Bounder. Houghton Mifflin. $1.60 net.
 Madam Constantia. Edited by J. Carter. Longmans, Green. $1.50 net.
 Morley, Christopher. The Haunted Bookshop. Doubleday, Page. $1.50 net.
 Wood, Michael. The White Island. Dutton. $1.90 net.

ART

- Hoppin, J. C. A Handbook of Attic Red-Figured Vases. Oxford University Press.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

- Foulke, W. D. Fighting the Spoilsmen. Putnam. $2 net.
 Thayer, W. R. Democracy: Discipline: Peace. Houghton Mifflin. $1 net.
 Walker, G. L. Capitalism vs. Bolshevism. Boston: Dukelow & Walker Co. $1.

POETRY AND DRAMA

- Noyes, Alfred. The New Morning. Stokes. $1.35 net.
 Tolstoi, L. N. The Living Corpse. New York: Nicholas L. Brown. $1 net.
 Wilbur, R. J. Theodore Roosevelt. Houghton Mifflin. $1.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Ackerman, C. W. Trailing the Bolsheviki. Scribner. $2.00 net.
 Biddle, C. J. The Way of the Eagle. Scribner. $2.50 net.
 Blankenhorn, Heber. Adventures in Propaganda. Houghton Mifflin. $1.60 net.
 Boak, A. E. R. The Master of the Offices in the Later Roman and Byzantine Empires. University of Michigan Studies. Macmillan.
 Bond, A. R. Inventions of the Great War. Century. $1.75.
 Cattell, J. McK. Carnegie Pensions. New York: Science Press.
 Farré, Henry. Sky Fighters of France. Houghton Mifflin. $7.50 net.
 Nordhoff, C. B. The Fledgling. Houghton Mifflin. $1.25 net.
 Yard, R. S. The Book of the National Parks. Scribner. $3.00.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 9

New York, Saturday, July 12, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	177
Editorial Articles:
The Pact with France	179
The North Dakota Coalition	180
Religion Pure and Undefined	181
Admiral Scheer Speaks Out	182
Germany Not Russianized	183
Motor Boating After the War	183
The Attempt to Discredit Kolchak. By Jerome Landfield	184
Hungary's Communist Experiment. By Examiner	185
Belgium's Annexationist Claims. By A. J. Barnouw	187
Correspondence	188
Poetry:
Palimpsest. By Edmund Kemper Broadus	189
Book Reviews:
China, Japan, and the Western Powers	189
First Fruits of Henry James	191
Labor's Attitude to the War	192
The Villain Pursues	193
The Run of the Shelves	193
Familiar Misquotations. By Harry Ayres	194
Some One-Act Plays	196

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

IF President Wilson has been unfortunate in his methods of dealing with Congress, he is exceedingly fortunate in the methods which his Republican opponents in that body are adopting in dealing with him. The latest instance is furnished by the sensational statement that Representative Graham, Chairman of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, rushed into print on the eve of Mr. Wilson's return from Europe. There may be ground for some of the accusations contained in that statement, but this makes the statement itself no better, but on the contrary worse. Its tone and whole character are those of a campaign screed, not of what it purports to be, the result of an official inquiry. Instead of putting the country into the attitude of gravely inquiring into serious allegations of wrong, it is calculated to excite only partisan rejoicing over the prospect of scandal on the one hand, and condemnation of its slapdash method on the other.

EVEN as a campaign broadside, Mr. Graham's screed is anything but a model, unless of the boomerang variety. What could be more inept than to insist, again and again, upon the atrocity of the Council of National Defense and its Advisory Commission having prepared an elaborate series of war measures before we went into the war? Are the American people going to demand the impeachment of President Wilson because he got ready for the possibility, or probability, instead of wasting precious time after war had been declared? "Weeks, and even months, before the Congress of the United States declared war against Germany," says Mr. Graham, "a committee of seven men chosen by the President . . . designed practically every war measure which the Congress afterwards enacted." Would it have been better to spend that same number of "weeks and even months" in developing the plans after war had been declared? Congress did its part splendidly at that time; it adopted with patriotic promptness and unanimity the selective draft and the other measures which Chairman Graham now finds to have been criminally hatched by Mr. Wilson's secret advisers. Why, with such a record of superiority to partisanship behind them, should Republicans now seek to place upon themselves the brand not only of partisanship but of silly and stupid partisanship?

ABOUT the worst thing the Republican managers in Congress could do, at this formative time in the shaping of party issues, would be to undertake an "omnibus" tariff bill of the old-fashioned kind. The Payne-Aldrich performance seems a matter of a hundred years ago, instead of ten; but it would take no time at all to make the country feel as if it had been only yesterday that the Republican party suffered the humiliation which that ill-omened measure brought upon it. There are plenty of perfectly just reasons for objecting to that kind of tariff revision, but there is something far more powerful than logic that would make any attempt in that direction disastrous to the party. A general revision of the tariff in the interest of protection is indissolubly associated in the public mind with two things—raising of prices and exploitation of special advantages. If there ever was a time when both these things stood at a lower depth of popular disfavor than they do at this moment, it would be interesting to know when it was. Before Chairman Fordney goes any further with his alleged programme, he would do well to think this over most prayerfully.

THE special defensive treaty with France deserves all consideration on its substance. The United States could not permit a sudden and unprovoked attack on France. The Covenant of Nations is not conceived to meet urgent military cases. A new Von Kluck could reach the suburbs of Paris while the League was deliberating. In view of what actually happened in the first weeks of the world war, it is natural that the French should wish especial military guarantees from Great Britain and the United States. For these nations no new obligation is really involved. The special treaties merely sanction an aid which would in any case be called for both by the interests of the parties concerned and by the wider interests of the world. While the contingency contemplated in the treaty, an unprovoked aggression on France by Germany, is a very unlikely one, there is enough rancor in Germany to justify the precaution. It should be understood that the neutral zone of 50 kilometers along the right bank of the Rhine can not be maintained indefinitely. Sooner or later Germany must be permitted to resume full sovereignty. While the substance of the special treaties is admirable, their form is infelicitous. At all points the special treaties imply the existence and authority of the League of Nations. If this is a manœuvre to commend the Covenant, it is a maladroit one. The two agreements have no necessary connection. If the Senate should reject the Covenant, the special treaty with France would still be desirable and workable.

ONE or two Senators are quoted as saying that they are unwilling to ratify the special treaty with France unless Congress shall have entire freedom to determine whether or not the contingency has arisen which calls for our going to the aid of France. But there is no doubt whatever upon this point. Although a number of references are made in the document to the League of Nations, nothing of the kind occurs in this connection. The United States simply promises to come to the assistance of France in the event that, in spite of the provisions of the general treaty, Germany should make an unprovoked attack upon her. Our country can not go to war except through the action of Congress. The proposed treaty, like any other treaty of the kind, imposes a moral obligation upon Congress to declare war in the event of a certain thing happening, but that moral obligation imposes no requirement upon the country, or upon Congress acting for the country, unless that contingency has actually arisen. Whether it has arisen or not will be at any given time a question of fact, and it will be for the President and Congress, and not for any outside Power or organization, to determine that question of fact.

GENERAL SMUTS'S statement of his views on the peace treaty is impressive in its sagacity as well as in the humane and lofty spirit which animates it. The most salient passages in it were given in the daily press, but it is to the journalistic enterprise of the Nation that we owe the cabling of the full text to this country. Of course the Nation is not to be understood as subscribing to General Smuts's estimate of the merits or demerits of the treaty. It may be assumed, however, that a special motive for its transmission was furnished by the strong expressions which the South African leader used in regard to the severity of the terms imposed upon Germany. But between those expressions and the habitual talk of the Nation there is precisely the difference that separates the sober talk of a statesman from the hysterical outcries of a fanatic.

General Smuts asks himself not what could be done if all men were virtuous, if all passions had died out, and if all evils were capable of being exorcised by incantation, but what can actually be done in the world as it is, and what may be hoped for in the world as we may succeed in shaping it in the future. Accordingly, he looks forward to the growth of considerateness and forgiveness for a gradual bettering of the settlement as time goes on. In the meanwhile he accepts the treaty as "simply a liquidation of the war situation in the world." In order to make the settlement an enduring one and a blessing to the world, two things are requisite: The Germans must make "a real honest effort to fulfill their obligations under the treaty to the extent of their ability," and "our Allied peoples must remember that God gave them overwhelming victory, victory far beyond their greatest dreams, not for small, selfish ends, not for financial or economic advantages, but for the attainment of the great human ideals for which our heroes gave their lives, and which are the real victors in this war of ideals." In other words, while General Smuts could have wished something better, he does not rage at the treaty as a covenant with death and an agreement with hell. To persons habituated to the piercing cries of the Nation, General Smuts's grave and sober words must give a feeling akin to that which one experiences when "silence like a poultice comes to heal the wounds of sound."

IT is immensely comforting to read Secretary Baker's reply to the soft-hearted lady who on behalf of the Chicago Amnesty Committee, whatever that may be, appeals for the release of the "group of young men who have held aloft the torch of idealism through all the prejudice and hatred of the war period; who took the first effective step toward the abolishment of future wars." "You must realize," she says, "that these men will be the heroes of future generations." The Secretary meets the conscientious objector on his own ground and, as everybody but the objector and his misguided abettors will agree, drives him ignominiously to some undefined position in the rear. He says:

Meantime, the group of young men to whom you refer ought not to forget that the torch of idealism which they sought to hold aloft was threatened with extinction by the most menacing materialistic force the world has ever seen. The abolishment of future wars, for which I share your fervent hope, was immeasurably more advanced by the conscience which led young men to give up their lives for it than by the conscience which in the presence of vast and crushing destructive force found itself limited to protest.

A practical application of such views appears in the transfer from Fort Leavenworth, where they are causing trouble among lesser offenders, of some seventy conscientious objectors to prison barracks elsewhere. Such segregation might have been resorted to earlier with distinct benefit on all sides.

WE return the snappy salute of The American Legion Weekly. As the official bulletin of an organization of unguessed power, it can not for a single moment be left out of the reckoning. Thinking Americans everywhere welcome it and wish it success in its large undertaking. All the more will they watch it closely to see how it discharges its mission. This is no less than to provide a forum for clarifying the thought of some four million men, conscious of a solidarity born of participation in a tremendous enterprise and acutely conscious of having as a group and as individuals a stake in the game. The aims which the Legion professes are in themselves most laudable:

To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a one hundred per cent. Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our association in the Great War; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, state and nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and masses; to make Right the Master of Might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by our devotion to mutual helpfulness.

It is heartening to contemplate a great body of men, full of life and refined by a peculiarly concentrated experience of it, who, in reaching out for the good that may be brought into the world, do not lose sight of the priceless things which the world has already obtained for itself. We wish to be counted among those who hope for fine things, and even great things, from the American Legion and its weekly.

EDITOR WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE returns from Europe with the conviction—at any rate, the prediction—that England will soon resort to a soviet government. He found a copy of the London Daily Herald in the library at Buckingham Palace, and that apparently settles it. But why he expects the position of the King to remain unaffected by this upheaval is not clear, except on the theory that the British always compromise. It is possible they may hit on some sort of compromise which will render a soviet superfluous. But in any case Mr. White will be interested to find a soviet already established in the United States. Here we call it the Anti-Saloon League. By a soviet we understand a small group determined to give the people what they want, whether they want it or not.

A WRITER in the Atlantic Monthly explains the colossal jest of Bolshevism. The revolution, it appears, is over, and in Russia there is to-day a republic, a democracy owing more to Jefferson than to Marx, presided over by a "middle-class Triumvirate of rulers: Lenin, the intellectual; Trotsky, the journalist, and Tchicherin, the son of a noble." "True, there was a class war, but it was a war not against the bourgeoisie as bourgeoisie, but against the bourgeoisie as slackers." The intellectuals sit high in the councils of the Soviet. That is, Lenin has fooled Russia and the world with a phrase. He persuaded the Russians to establish his political democracy in the fond belief that they were bringing about a proletarian communism. And everywhere else he has fired genuine believers in proletarian domination, as well as the soft-headed intellectuals who think that something of that sort would be interesting, with a belief that the time is at hand to destroy existing democracies and substitute for them—the kind of government Russia is not getting. Thus, in the end, Russia, with a strong democratic government at home and countless armies of phrase-mad proletarians pouring out from her borders, will be able politically to dominate a world distraught by frantic pursuit of the mirage of Lenin's inventing, which in the seclusion of his palace he admits to be a mirage. It could not be more nearly perfect, this view of the matter, if it had all been excogitated in the German Foreign Office. But unfortunately, as things work out, there may prove to be a bitter residuum of truth in it.

THE Literary Digest does a good service in bringing before its great circle of readers an instructive collection of facts and opinions concerning high prices. It quotes, to be sure, nonsense as well as sense, but not in such a way as to confuse any reader of even moderate intelligence. The conspicuous example of nonsense is the statement of Mr. Brisbane's Wisconsin-News that the whole difficulty "is that there are a lot of persons who do not care what trouble comes to the country as long as they keep up their profits." The best example of simple and effective statement is an extract from an editorial in the Boston Shoe and Leather Reporter, part of which is as follows:

The inevitable consequence of this greatest of all wars was to destroy billions of dollars' worth of merchandise and property, and at the same time to induce the creation of $36,000,000,000 of new paper money. Thus commodities have become scarcer and dearer, while money has become more plentiful and cheaper. . . . In considering the price question we must begin to think in terms of depreciated currency rather than in terms of higher commodity-prices.

The last remark has reference merely to a question of language, but psychologically the difference is important. And still more important is the difference between habitually speaking of the cost of living and speaking of high prices. Unfortunately, for a great many of us the two things are identical; but they are not identical inherently. If the present level of prices is going to be permanent, everything will sooner or later adjust itself to that level; and though in the interval much hardship will have been suffered, the real cost of living when the adjustment has been completed will be no higher than it was on the old level. This is one of those things that "every schoolboy knows"; but hardly anybody acts as though he knew it.

THE world clash of arms which has saved some of the racial minorities of Europe from extinction by the oppression of megalomaniac imperialism has put out of view the silent but dramatic struggle here at home to preserve from extinction by the even more ruthless powers of disease our own most appealing racial remnant, the American Indian. The few thousands of glorious tradition that remained on the various Government reservations have for years, despite the best efforts of Government experts, been dying at a far greater rate than they increased, although as a whole they have been economically prosperous and well cared for. They seemed clearly a dying race, pining away amid new conditions, without hope or future in a land that knew them not. But after a sustained and intense battle of years, whose dramatic strategy lies buried forever in Government reports, the latent vitalities of the ragged band were somehow roused to new life, and diseases difficult to cope with overcome. In 1916 Cato Sells, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, was able to announce that, for the first time since they came to know their white brothers, the birth-rate of the Indians in the United States exceeded the death rate. And as further voucher that the American Indian has taken a new lease of life Mr. Sells recently said that of the 10,000 Indians in the war, 75 per cent. had volunteered, and that the Indians in the country had bought over $25,000,000 in Liberty Bonds, more than $70 per capita.

ONE of the new and extremely difficult problems which the vast expansion of international trade and the newer development of international advertising have brought with them is the protection of the trade-marks of articles or firms with international reputations in foreign countries. The full importance of this problem has not been revealed and will not be until the foreign trade competition following the war comes into full play. But already the piratical use of trade-marks in foreign countries as a weapon in trade competition has gone very far, especially in the Latin-American countries. The official "Lista General de las Marcas" and the "Boletin Oficial" of the Argentine Republic show that many well-known American brands have already been registered by natives, or registration applied for: "Hupmobile," "Stutz," "Cadillac," "Vitagraph," "Bon Ami," "Boston Garters," "Welch's Grape Juice," "Old Dutch Cleanser," were among the miscellaneous American articles registered. Some American products have been registered by German concerns. Attempts at the international protection of trade-marks have so far met with small success, despite the efforts of such agencies as the international registration bureau at Berne and the Pan-American Union Trademarks Office. Here is a matter of serious bearing on the peace and amicable intercourse of nations in which it would seem the League of Nations, through a permanent commission, could render a real service and prove its practical effectiveness.

The Pact with France

THE special agreement by which the United States, in concert with Great Britain, promises France that it will "come immediately to her aid in case of any unprovoked act of aggression directed against her by Germany" should command the approval alike of those who do and those who do not place confidence in the League of Nations. There is, indeed, one element of American opinion to which any such agreement is obnoxious; the element, of which Senator Borah is the leading spokesman, that is in favor of a complete return to the traditional policy of American isolation. Between those who honestly take this position and those who believe that national duty and national interest alike demand the adoption of a new attitude towards the world's problems, there is no common ground for argument. Conversion, to be sure, even upon fundamentals, is conceivable; but here is a question that must be decided in the course of the next few weeks, and unless we are to look for miracles it will be idle for any one to attempt such conversion. In saying that the pact should command the approval alike of those who do and those who do not place confidence in the League, we are leaving out of account the irreconcilables who stand squarely for American isolation.

When the Peace Conference was about to assemble, and throughout its early stages, representative American opinion was in the main divided along a fairly definite line. Comparatively little interest was taken in the specific terms of peace—the determination of boundaries, the fixing of indemnities, the claims of races, were felt to be questions so complex in themselves, so fraught with rivalries and jealousies, and so entangled with previous promises and understandings, that Americans generally were content to let them be settled by the pulling and hauling at Versailles. But in the transcendent question we all took a profound interest—the question of the stability of the settlement, whatever it might be. And here came in that line of division to which we have referred. On the one hand were those who placed

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York
FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILGER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors
FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

their trust in the League of Nations; on the other hand were those who looked elsewhere for that assurance which all were agreed must be found somewhere. And the place where they looked for it—the only place where they could look for it—was in the continuance of a cordial understanding of the strongest possible kind between the great nations that had won the war. To the cry for a new-made League of Nations, a League to be created by pen and parchment, the answer was that the only safety lay in the maintenance of the league that already existed—the league that had been born of the world's mortal need and which had been vitalized by united effort and common sacrifice upon a scale unparalleled in history. And one of the chief objections urged against the scheme of making the formation of the League of Nations part of the work of the Peace Conference was that it diverted attention from the supreme need of the time, the preservation of the working union which the war had brought about among the Powers that had won the great victory.

In the eight months that have gone by since the armistice was entered upon, the aspect of things, from either of these standpoints, has undergone an undeniable change. The League of Nations, whatever its future may be, presents to no one's mind that character of firm and unmistakable achievement which its sanguine advocates had hoped it would assume. Nobody looks upon war as henceforth a moral impossibility; everybody feels that the future will have to be watched with solicitude. Many doubtless think that France entertains exaggerated fears of Germany, but nobody maintains that the mere existence of the League makes those fears absurd. There was a time when the proposal of such a guarantee as the special treaty is to give to France might have been objected to by champions of the League Covenant as casting doubt upon its efficacy; to-day that proposal involves no admission that is not freely made without it by all candid friends of the Covenant. Its adoption will not lower the standing of the League; on the contrary, it will raise that standing. The Covenant does not profess to be capable of bringing force swiftly to bear against a determined violator of the world's peace; it reckons not upon instant and irresistible repression, but upon the deterrent effect of the fear of ultimate consequences. If there is danger of a resurgence of the old spirit of defiant German aggression, the League's arrangements need the aid of such an agreement as that proposed between France, Britain, and the United States to meet that danger effectively; if the danger does not exist, the agreement will never be brought into action. The agreement adds strength to the League in the event of its being subjected to a certain extreme strain; apart from that eventuality the League is entirely unaffected. And it is hardly necessary to add that the mere existence of the agreement is the best possible insurance against the occurrence of the event; if the danger be exceedingly small that Germany will think of again plunging the world into war by attacking France, the agreement will reduce the danger to zero.

From the standpoint of spontaneous alliance the change in the aspect of things has been hardly less marked than from that of the League of Nations connection. Every man whose whole soul was in the cause must cherish as deeply as ever the union of hearts between the nations that stood shoulder to shoulder in the great struggle. But the world has gone through many months of wrestling with the problems of the treaty—months of difficulty at home in each country, as well as of divergences on the issues of the settlement. On the surface at least, if not in the depths, there has come more or less of a chill over the feelings with which, in the first flush of the joint triumph, all hearts were filled. Things which last December were looked upon by everybody as certainties are now viewed by many with the eye of cold skepticism. Where silence might then have been regarded as sufficient assent, overt assurance is now felt to be decidedly preferable. Of course, it may be said, we shall go to the aid of France if she is attacked; of course we shall stand by the side of England. And yet there has already been a good deal of snarling about England, and even about France we have sometimes talked as though there were other things in our minds besides her terrible sufferings and her glorious fight for her freedom and the world's. She asks us to make this simple pledge—that we will stand by her if she is wantonly attacked. We can not refuse unless we have already forgotten the lesson of the war; we can not refuse if we mean to be true to her boys and ours who died in Flanders' fields.

The North Dakota Coalition

IT is a far cry from North Dakota to New Zealand, but there is a striking similarity between the Non-Partisan League and the late Lib-Lab Party in that country. In New Zealand, after the failure of the maritime strike of 1890, the small farmers, in league with organized labor, secured the election of John Ballance, and soon thereafter a double-barreled programme of legislation was put through which, to some minds, foreshadowed the coming of the industrial millennium.

The small farmers had special grievances against the big landowners, so Parliament passed a series of acts to force the subdivision of the great estates and to supply the farmers with capital at low rates of interest. Progressive land taxes were established with special taxes for absentee landlords; large estates were purchased and subdivided by the Government; and favorable terms were offered to farmers wishing to settle upon Government land. The railroads, of course, had been in the hands of the Government for a long time.

For the benefit of the laborers acts were passed providing for employers' liability, prohibition of payment by truck, proper conditions in factories, compulsory arbitration of industrial disputes, old-age pensions, workers' dwellings, loans to workers, and many others. Both laborers and farmers were well satisfied for a time, and New Zealand was as much talked about as North Dakota is to-day.

The alliance, however, did not endure. As the farmers prospered they gradually lost their affection for their landless brethren of the towns, and although they had coquetted with the single tax, when it was freely offered they would none of it. As to the laborers, while the Arbitration Court was raising wages they were pleased, but when the limit was reached and prices began to go up they suspected a conspiracy against them in which their old allies were involved. So the farmers, having something to lose, grew more conservative, and the laborers, accumulating nothing, grew more radical, until the "Lib-Lab Party" of Ballance, Seddon and Ward disintegrated and lost the election of 1912, after which the so-called "Reform Party" under Massey came into power.

In the very next year the left wing of organized labor—the "Red Fed"—attempted a revolutionary strike, involving wharf laborers, seamen and miners, and for a time the shipping business was paralyzed. Then the farmers, threatened with serious loss, took the matter into their own hands, supported by the Government and by all the opponents of direct action. Coming down to the chief seaports they formed themselves into two sections—the one a body of special police, empowered to keep the peace—the other a band of volunteer wharf laborers, who loaded and unloaded the ships. The strike was broken, but the farmers and their former allies have not since been fully reconciled, even by the war. Will such be the fate of the Non-Partisan League? It is unsafe to prophesy and futile to moralize, yet it may be worth while to consider the experience of the past.

The Non-Partisan League is primarily a farmers' organization, but from the first it has held out a friendly hand to labor, and its advances have been heartily reciprocated—as might be expected in an agricultural state like North Dakota. Quite early in the game the North Dakota Federation of Labor endorsed the League. The city labor organizations did the same; and after the election of 1916 Samuel Gompers telegraphed his congratulations. The march of events is rapid nowadays, and quite recently an important step was taken towards the creation of a labor party for the purpose of advancing the cause of labor in coöperation with the Non-Partisan League. This action was taken at a convention of the Federation at Minot in the first days of June, and the plan is to be consummated at a convention at Fargo on August 31st and September 1st—Labor Day. The meeting at Minot was a veritable love feast. Resolutions of thanks were offered to the farmers for all that they had done for labor, and it was stated that their several interests were in the fullest harmony. Every law asked by union labor had been passed by the Legislature, including workmen's compensation, insurance, inspection and safeguarding of coal mines, limitation of the use of injunction, protection of railway workers, provision for full crews on trains and for putting the union label on all state printing.

Governor Lynn J. Frazier made an interesting statement on behalf of the League and the State:

I am glad that the organized workingmen and women of the State are going to link hands with the organized farmers in the advancement of their common cause. The interests of the farmers and laborers are the same. Both laborers and farmers are going to benefit by the state-owned industries we are to establish. The farmer will get more for his products and the cost of living will be cut for the consumers when the industries begin to operate.

Of course, the Legislature did not neglect the farmer—the acts passed for their benefit provided for the Industrial Commission, the Bank of North Dakota, the North Dakota Mill and Elevator Association, and the Home Building Association. Besides these experiments in state socialism—or “state capitalism,” as Mr. Walling calls it—the Legislature of 1919 revised railway rates in the farmers' interest, made amendments in grain grading and inspection laws, exempted farm improvements from taxation and provided for a graduated income tax.

The political revolution in North Dakota is the result of an alliance between the farmers and the laborers, supported by many small capitalists and others who have felt oppressed by the railways, the milling interests, the banks, and other large associations of capital. It is a sort of class struggle, though not of the regular Marxian type. The Non-partisan Leader puts it thus:

The country is not divided into wage workers and capitalists, but into special-privilege capitalists and the common people. The man with a little working capital, such as the farmer may have, is just as much exploited by the special interests as the man of no capital. The men of little capital, such as retailers and manufacturers in lines that have not been monopolized, have for years been fighting a losing game against the plutocrats. Every year sees more of them dropping into the maw of the trusts, just as every year shows more and more of the farmers replaced by tenants or by the corporation farming which is under way.

This conception of the class struggle has, like North Dakota itself, a very slight proletarian element in it. It is the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. And yet the situation corresponds almost exactly to that in New Zealand in the early nineties, when organized labor was the tail-end of the Lib-Lab Party. The alliance between the two elements was unstable from the beginning. They tried many experiments in state socialism—all more or less disappointing—but they parted company when it was found that mere wages did not satisfy the laborers, and that the farmers balked when politely asked to give up their land. The farmers of North Dakota have their grievances, of course, both real and imaginary, but if they can have a few more years of “profiteering,” their animus against the plutocrats may sensibly diminish, especially when they invest their savings in banks, packing houses, mills, etc.—outside the State. By that time organized labor may have to paddle its own canoe.

Religion Pure and Undefined

“THE Community Church shifts the basis of religion from God to man.” At first blush this pronouncement of the Pastor of the Church of the Messiah is startling. It is, after all, about what Confucius did in China centuries ago, and Auguste Comte in France when he reduced religion to a cult of humanity. Dr. John Haynes Holmes, however, accepts no religion which looks either backward, as Confucianism and Comtism do, or upward, as the theological religions do. In a recent sermon he insists that it is necessary that religions should meet “not on the plane of the past, nor even of the present, but on the plane of the future.”

This means, of course, that the religious person is wholly practical, ever planning the good works of the morrow. Religion itself is in its individual aspect comradeship, in its institutional aspect social service. The members of the Community Church are free to hold any belief or none in God and immortality. “Neither the acceptance nor the denial of a creed is recognized as having any significance or interest.” Accordingly all beliefs are welcome. Whoever is a member of the community is a member of the Community Church. Old-time Christianity encouraged progress in the spiritual life and recognized degrees. Not so the Community Church. Even the distinction between communicants and outsiders democratically vanishes. “We abandon the idea of an inner group of members, who have reached some spiritual eminence not attained by others. Of course, in our body the sanctification aspect of church membership has disappeared from our apprehension. . . . What is essential is organization and fellowship on the basis of simple brotherhood.”

The programme—we are forbidden to say the creed—of the Community Church is interesting as a resolute and consistent attempt to reduce religion to its lowest terms. Unlike the Modernists of France and Italy, who regard the religious sense of the individual as fundamental, and creeds, ceremonies, priest-hoods and churches as shifting adornments of the religious sense, Dr. Holmes wishes religion without any theology or illusion. The Modernist is willing to get any legitimate glamour for his religious sense out of any historic church, accepting its teachings as so much poetry or symbol; the Community Church wants essential religion free from glamour and austere stripped for action.

No reader of the late William James's “Varieties of Religious Experience,” and for that matter no observer of life broadly, will declare offhand that the basis of the Community Church is unreligious. At least one may say that it is uncentral. To substitute social compassion and service for worship of some kind of god is to deprive religion of its chief component, awe. We conceive no religion, from Plato's to an Alaskan Shaman's, which does not venerate something vastly higher than man. Or if with Confucius and Comte religion attempts to substitute for the idea of God, man's highest nature, it too is conceived in terms of awe. It is a deity existing in the abysses of the individual soul. Awe, the sense of moral immensities dimly perceived, but revered, this is the basis of even the moralistic religions. They never sink to an unqualified humanitarianism. Such a conception as the community constituting and ruling the church is new in the world. So is the equalitarian notion that all have equally attained spirituality. Almost without exception religion emphasizes the idea of salvation. Sinful man is extricated from error and set in the path of truth and righteousness. All human churches have represented this progress as various, loving to stress the hazard of the arduous ascent. The whole conception implies inner and outer circles, more or less successful followers of the pathway of faith. For faith in God, or in the highest aspect of man, the Community Church apparently substitutes faith in a good high average of socially-minded men.

Such a conception naturally leaves theology out. Theology becomes merely an oratorical adventure of the preacher towards the outstanding mysteries. It is, to borrow the pragmatic parlance, only good for so much. Dr. Holmes assures us: "The sermon, if well done, will be as fascinating as a novel. For nobody will know, as they know now, what conclusion will be reached. The minister may work out a belief in God, or he may not." From this point of view, theology is indeed a gay science. But theology in its last analysis means simply that the believer takes his religion seriously. He cares enough about it to want to think straight while living religiously. Without the assent of his reason, the divine part of him, his religion is defective. To substitute for this loyal exercise of the intellect perception of the high average temperature of mass morality, is to reduce religion to impulse.

On the side of mere morals the theory of building religion on comradeship ignores some of its important and permanent features. The business of religion is not merely to excite, it is largely to calm. The picture of a piety solely engaged in politics, charity and social betterment would equally repel a Buddha, a Mohammed, or a Christ. All religion implies seeking a harmony in the solitude of the soul. How the pastor who is organizing post-impressionistic picture shows and Freudian conferences in his vestry house, while generally keeping in the latest movements, is to have leisure to invite his own soul, or anybody else's, does not appear. Precisely the difference between religion and practical life has been that religion did not much look to the future in this life. It looked rather to the past, to the great examples of endurance and virtue; and to the present as requiring insight and vigilance. Taking small thought for the morrow is not merely a Christian maxim, it is broadly religious.

What the new social religions completely lack is otherworldliness and all sense of supernatural standards. We can not believe that any church can last which does not see a mystery in life and does not seek the solution on any other than human plane. Such organizations may represent a great reforming activity and, at their best, an enlightened common sense. If they are churches and religions, then the Boy Scouts and the Campfire Girls are the great churches of the day, while our Free Masons and Odd Fellows derive from Peter and Paul in purest apostolic succession.

Admiral Scheer Speaks Out

THROUGH the enterprise of the New York World, Admiral Scheer, the German high commander in the battle of Jutland, has been persuaded to relieve his mind of much perilous stuff. As to the sinking of the surrendered German ships at Scapa Flow, the Admiral rejoices because "the last act was true to the best traditions of the German Navy." Here all seagoing folk will say amen. The treacherous last act of the German fleet was indeed in the best tradition of that navy which sowed the high seas with floating mines and sunk unarmed merchantmen without warning, and riddled survivors in the small boats with machine-gun fire.

It is more difficult to follow Admiral Scheer when he likewise rejoices that "the stain of surrender has been wiped from the escutcheon of the German fleet." It will be recalled that the German fleet surrendered after a strike by the crews. They refused to go down fighting. Other fleets than Germany's have generally avoided the shame of surrender by going down with battle ensigns flying. Short of that, Germany could have avoided the shame of surrender by sinking her ships in her own waters. That would have been a breach of the armistice, but for the Navy itself it would have entailed no dishonor. What the German Navy actually did was to sail three hundred miles to a British roadstead, haul down its colors under British orders and accept internment. The German officers and men staid aboard in the capacity of paroled persons. Their obligation was no longer to Germany but to Great Britain. In military circles an officer's parole is sacred. How the failure of the German sailors to obey orders and the singularly ignominious surrender of the fleet can be atoned for by an act of treachery towards the foe we fail to understand. It doubtless is one of the profounder mysteries of the German mentality.

Under military law every German officer who was concerned with the sinking of the ships is subject to court martial and liable to the death penalty. His status is that of any naval commander who sinks his own ship. It would be an error, however, to give these scuttlers the treatment of officers. Let them be tried before the admiralty courts for destroying their own ships. Give them the punishment of ordinary criminals at sea. Such treatment might teach Germany something she sadly needs to learn. To gain honor by scuttling surrendered ships without risk may do for the German Navy, or for any navy of yesterday without accrued honor and tradition.

But it would be good indeed to hear the shades of Hawkins and Nelson and Dewey and Farragut express themselves when they learn of an Admiral who rejoices that his officers broke parole and sunk ignobly surrendered ships at their moorings.

Admiral Scheer's observations on the general naval strategy of the war are amusing, if quite without value. He sketches the German plan for a final successful battle off the Thames to be fought early in November. The British fleet was to be lured down against a left wing comprising the whole U-boat flotilla. To any one familiar with the anti-submarine preparations in the Channel the notion that a submarine fleet could be kept intact off Dover while the British fleet was approaching from the Orkneys seems highly fantastic. It is at least interesting to learn on high authority that such a naval forlorn hope was planned by Germany with hope of victory, and only prevented by the sailors' strike. To put submarines in battle line without support is a novelty in naval tactics. Every naval theorist will regret that the experiment was not tried.

The German Admiral also believes that a swift blow by the British Navy at the beginning of the war would have settled matters against Germany within a few weeks. This retrospective vision grows less brilliant when one notes that the mission of an aggressive British fleet was to be to land Russians on the Pomeranian coast. One can imagine the wink with which such a plan was outlined before the sympathetic correspondent of the World—it might serve to make the British victors uncomfortable. No consideration could ever have justified risking the British fleet in a general action the unfavorable outcome of which would have given Germany control of the sea. Even Admiral Scheer admits the complete correctness and success of the British naval blockade. Even theoretically, it is difficult to see how a general engagement could have been forced upon the German fleet, lying as it did at the entrances of the Kiel Canal. Evidently this would have involved sending a great British fleet into the Baltic—a movement about as difficult tactically as it seems strategically vicious.

In general, Admiral Scheer's sensational remarks should not be taken too seriously. Fundamentally they only illustrate certain depths of naval bad breeding. Even worse than to laud your own officers who have broken parole is it to hint that your completely victorious foe after all lacked enterprise and valor. Such comment merely shows that the German Navy was far too new and socially raw ever to have got its moral sealegs. Having sunk itself without trace, it will not be greatly missed. Nothing became it like its taking off.

Germany Not Russianized

IN many a Catholic district of the old world the Feast of the Innocents on December 28 is a happy time for children. They change parts with their parents, who, for that one day, yield authority to their offspring. Dressed up in the clothes of father and mother the girls and boys, rattling a huge bunch of keys, search the house for hidden treasures stored away in cellar and cupboards. It is Anstey's delightful story Vice Versa coming true once a year, a pleasure dearly bought, in the remote past, by the death of the little martyrs of Bethlehem. Such a feast of the innocents was the ephemeral rule of the proletariat at Munich. The naïve, the simple-minded, the unwitting, ousted the politicians of mature experience from power and revelled for a while in the pleasures of topsy-turvydom. But whereas the little children's feast has its origin in the massacre of the innocents, the Munich travesty ended in murder. Real children make sport of death and its terror, their grown-up equals make terrible earnest of their sport.

Spartacism is hardly a movement, it is the wild prank of a raw unbalanced class. In a country like Russia, where the bulk of the nation seems to consist of childlike, untutored enthusiasts, the momentary prank may grow a habit, vitiating the people's character for generations to come, but in countries of a maturer culture it is doomed to be short-lived. The Russian Bolshevik leaders themselves recognize in the well-organized social-democracy of Western Europe a formidable enemy. Twelve years ago Trotzky, in his book "Our Revolution," expressed himself thus: "The European Socialist parties, especially the most powerful of them, the German one, have developed a conservatism of their own. That is why the Social-Democracy as an organization forms, in some respects, a direct obstacle in the way of the open collision between the workers and the bourgeoisie."

The party routine of the Internationale, in the eyes of Lenin and his followers, shelters the bourgeoisie from the just vengeance of the proletariat. The disturbance of that party system and of the government supported by it is part and parcel of Bolshevik policy. By the secret action of their agents they aim at making unrest and revolt a chronic disease of the body politic in Germany, in order to accelerate the process of decomposition which is the conditio sine qua non for a successful importation of Bolshevism into Western Europe. In the troubled waters of German domestic warfare the emissaries of the Soviet Government had good fishing; the return of order and domestic peace would deal the death-blow to their expectations.

The success of the Government troops at Munich was the first victory of organized democracy over Russianized anarchy, and in this well-begun offensive the Government of Ebert and Scheidemann has unexpectedly received support from a quarter from which they could least of all have hoped for help. The drastic terms of peace prescribed by the Entente have suddenly sobered the nation to the recognition of the hard reality of its defeat, and brought home to it the necessity of national consolidation. Far from bringing grist to Lenin's mill, as pessimists and tender-hearted pacifists predicted, the severity of the Entente seems to make for an internally pacified Germany under the social-democratic régime, which will prove a safer barrier against the Russian danger than a cordon of Entente troops would be. While making front against the hard terms of Versailles the Germans are making themselves immune from Bolshevik contagion. In the hour of its deepest humiliation the people has recovered its self-restraint.

Motor Boating After the War

THE war proved that the motor boat had about four times the endurance generally credited to it. About ten years ago the occasional ventures of power-boats across the ocean passed for and were the maddest hazards. Captain Crapo's feat of making the crossing in a whaleboat with jury rig seemed far safer, and rightly so. During the war, scores of the submarine chasers (110-foot class) made the crossing under their own power, some in winter time. The eight-foot motor launches of the British Naval Volunteer Reserve kept the North Sea—perhaps the worst mixing of waters in the world—in all weathers. Hundreds of still smaller power-craft, built for slipping from port to port in fair weather, proudly assumed their war gray, mounted their popgun and kept going in our turbulent coastal waters, under conditions that would have seemed impossible before the war. The emergency forced such a test as could never have been given otherwise, and the power-boat was not found wanting.

It was proved as well—notably in the submarine chaser class—that of similar hulls, one propelled by gas motors and the other by steam, the steam-driven vessel is incomparably superior. This was already the conviction of all deep-sea men, as of merchant seamen and fisherfolk generally, but even they had to concede that the motor-boat was no longer to be regarded as merely a dangerous toy. Grudgingly they granted it its place on the great waters.

Besides proving the toughness of the motor-boats, the war trained thousands of young men in their management. There may be, we judge, no less than five thousand young Americans with pluck, skill, and experience to take a power-boat to Europe, and probably double the number of competent engineers. This must have a distinct influence on the future of motor-boating as a sport. For the moment, young America is probably pretty well "fed up" with motor-boating. It was possible to keep the seas amid the tide rips off Nantucket and Block Island, but memory does not as yet certify such a feat as a pleasure. It will probably never be precisely a privilege to cross the Atlantic in a power-boat, at least until invention gets rid of the dangerous and distressing "gas" fumes. What we may expect is that our thousands of new vikings will no more permanently remain ashore than Ulysses did after his seven years of sea travail. Adventure will make her appeal anew. The old tame pleasures of motor-boating will largely be left to the aged and dufferly. There will be ocean races, distant travel, audacious exploration. Our yachting flag, now a rare apparition abroad, will be seen up and down the Seven Seas, and it will enjoy a respect it never before commanded.

The convenience and relative economy of the gas engine are likely to keep it dominant for all smaller craft. By reaction, however, a certain number of old sub-chaser officers will promote themselves to steam yachts, while a chosen few, wishing the full flavor of pleasure and hazard at sea, will go into big sailing yachts, which generally will have the handy auxiliary motor apologetically concealed below. Thus all forms of large yachting should in the long run profit through the vindication of the motor-boat.

The record of the scouting and fighting Scout Patrol—consisting chiefly of converted power-boats—is a splendid testimony to the conscience and skill of the American boat builder and motor maker. Without any thought of war conditions, they provided an unbelievable margin of safety. The hulls and motors stood up under conditions completely unforeseen and terribly trying. No one who has staggered home rudderless through a November gale, in a craft built for summer seas and engined for easy "day sailing," will fail to be grateful to the boat builder who provided extra strength in the slight hull and to the engine maker whose motors under the most untoward conditions continued to furnish steerable way, headway, and safety.

The Attempt to Discredit Kolchak

IT'S a hard fight, a fight to the finish, the struggle between civilization and Bolshevism. The adversary is cunning and cruel, and fights foul. The battle-line encircles the globe, but the key-point is Russia. This is why we can not wash our hands of Russia and leave her to stew in her own juice.

Russians themselves are struggling on. In America, generous but unseeing America, they are trying to make the issue clear. They are not numerous and they labor under the disadvantage of an unfamiliar tongue. They have no money with which to engage journalistic and forensic talent. Arrayed against them are men whose purses are plethoric with the loot of Russia, their own property. Most of all they fear, not their avowed adversaries, but those who profess to be their friends only to stab them in the back.

The latest and most insidious of these attacks by the false friends of Russia is an article in the current issue of the New Republic entitled "The Rise of a New Russian Autocracy." The article in question is well written, and since its author, Dr. Joshua Rosett, has been connected with the Committee on Public Information, it will appear to many people as a sort of official pronouncement and public opinion may be sadly misled thereby. For the statements contained therein are not only full of misrepresentations but they are cunningly arranged to do the utmost damage to the present Omsk Government, in which the hope of the regeneration of Russia rests. It is therefore necessary that these misstatements be corrected and the public be informed of the truth.

In the first place, Dr. Rosett creates an entirely false atmosphere by quoting a conversation with a Russian, possibly imaginary, whom he met on the steamer going from Japan to Vladivostok. In the mouth of this man he puts violent monarchistic phrases and then proceeds to hold Kolchak and the Omsk Government responsible for them. Of course Kolchak never heard of the man and would disavow such views if they were brought to his attention. There could scarcely be found a more unfair method of attack than to pick out some reactionary supporter of the Government and then play him up in such an authoritative manner. But this is characteristic of the whole article.

Dr. Rosett has attempted to judge the Siberian situation from Vladivostok. Any one who knows this city and the character of its population at the present time knows that it is about as suitable for judging Russia and Siberia as El Paso would be for judging America. This probably explains the author's lamentable ignorance of the Zemstvo Institution and its situation in Siberia. The Zemstvos of Siberia were instituted, not by the old Imperial Government, as stated by Dr. Rosett, but by the Provisional Government after the first Revolution. Many district and provincial Zemstvo Councils were formed during the Bolshevik upheaval and were conducted under the banner of the Left Socialist Revolutionaries. These, of course, were openly hostile to the non-socialistic Omsk Government and many of their members were openly Bolshevik. To entrust the government of districts or provinces to such bodies would have been suicidal. Furthermore, these councils did not in any way represent their constituents and were frequently made up of strangers and outsiders. What Dr. Rosett does not say is that these non-representative bodies were replaced by Zemstvo Councils that were representative.

What he says concerning the coördinating of several Siberian Zemstvos at Tomsk is utterly absurd. On the other hand, a convention was summoned at Ufa (a town on the European and not the Siberian side of the Ural mountains) in which participated all the members of the original Russian Constituent Assembly who could be got together, as well as representatives of the various local provisional governments that had been set up. This convention evolved a form of government to include all Russia and designated as members of the Directory of Five men who represented the chief parts of Russia and Siberia, freed of Bolshevik rule. The dominating factor at this convention was the Samara Government, which was very socialistic. When the government was moved to Omsk, whose local provisional government was non-socialistic, there was considerable friction, which was temporarily alleviated by the formation of a Cabinet of Ministers to act under the Directory. In this cabinet, Admiral Kolchak was Minister of War.

The friction between the socialist and non-socialist elements came to a climax in the middle of November last year. The armistice with Germany had just been signed and the Czechoslovaks, who up to that time had been the mainstay of the Russian defense against the Bolsheviks, were anxious to return to their native land. The Russians were in a panic, for Avksentiev, the President of the Directory, and his socialist colleagues not only had done nothing to build up an efficient Russian army, but were undermining and disintegrating such troops as had been got together by a dangerous propaganda aimed at overthrowing their non-socialist colleagues. It was further discovered that in company with Chernov they were negotiating for a rap-prochement with the Bolsheviks in accordance with the plan of the left Socialist Revolutionary Committee at Moscow. Fortunately the plot was discovered in time and some army officers arrested the plotters. Admiral Kolchak was asked by the loyal members of the Government, as a patriotic duty, to assume supreme command. At the time he was at the front and knew nothing whatever of what was taking place at Omsk. On receipt of an urgent telegram he at once returned and undertook the task imposed upon him. He assumed command of the army and navy and associated the Cabinet with himself for all administrative work. How all of this was garbled in the Vladivostok press is well known to all students of Russian affairs. What is particularly disgusting is that Dr. Rosett should quote these garbled reports as if they were serious accounts of the affair at Omsk. His account of the coup d'état is not only utterly false but his reading into the record his conversations with Bolsheviks in Vladivostok, is an example of his innate unfairness and lack of reliability.

Another example of the character of Dr. Rosett's testimony is his statement in regard to the January election in Vladivostok. Mr. Zimmerman, whom he speaks of as "the hated Commissar," is a well-known public worker of the Far East, who was Mayor of Vladivostok, Director of Associations for Mutual Credit and prominent in other public-spirited enterprises. It is true that he struck off from the ticket the names of a number of candidates and it is further true that he eliminated from the electorate a number of men who had voted at the previous election. The reason was simple. The Bolsheviks had voted the soldiers and transients, and the new Commissar restricted the franchise to the regular residents of Vladivostok. Further, he eliminated from the list of candidates those who were out-and-out Bolsheviks, and not to have done so would have been stupid in the highest degree.

Dr. Rosett's mention of "the shrewd M. Agareff, Mayor of Vladivostok," is delicious. This is a Bolshevik from America who was parading under an assumed name. The only pity is that the Commissar did not imprison him at once for the criminal that he was, instead of allowing him to continue in office. It may be mentioned in passing that the Nikoforov mentioned with approval by Dr. Rosett is a criminal who had served a prison sentence. Dr. Rosett makes the statement that Kolchak has either jailed, exiled or murdered every member of the Russian Constituent Assembly upon whom he could lay his hands. This statement is simply a downright falsehood. How utterly false it is may be seen from the fact that he has employed a number of Constituent Assembly members as officials and representatives, and that he himself was also a member. On the other hand, certain members of the Constituent Assembly are Bolsheviks and one of them—Chernov—president of the Constituent Assembly, is a Bolshevik Commissar in Moscow at the present time. It is hardly to be expected that such would be welcomed by the men who are striving to free their native land of the terrible Bolshevik régime.

These instances should be sufficient to indicate what degree of credibility is to be given to Dr. Rosett. But worse than his direct misstatements and misrepresentations is his persistent effort to create a false impression through the misuse of casual conversations and ephemeral newspaper articles.

The Kolchak Government at Omsk is naturally far from perfect. It has made many mistakes itself and many more have been made by its agents or officials. But this was to have been expected. Its task is exceedingly difficult and to ask that it should function in a perfectly orderly and efficient manner under the conditions confronting it, is to ask too much. What is true, however, is that it is an honest effort to establish orderly conditions, rebuild economic life and restore Russia. Socialists and Bolsheviks hate it because it is non-socialistic and they are using every effort to arouse unjust prejudice against it. But loyal Russians feel that it is their one great hope and that if this effort to set up a Russian Government should fail, there lies ahead black chaos, from which Russia can only recover after years of anarchy and frightful suffering.

Very interesting authoritative testimony as to the splendid work being done by Admiral Kolchak and his Government, in spite of tremendous obstacles, is brought by Mr. John A. Embry, who has just returned to America after serving many months as American Consul at Omsk. He was at Omsk at the time of the coup d'état, had frequent conversations with Admiral Kolchak and was a careful observer of the Omsk Government's Administration of Siberia. Consul Embry brands Dr. Rosett's article as an outrageous slander of Admiral Kolchak and an utter misrepresentation of the character of his Government. He visited Admiral Kolchak immediately after the Commander-in-Chief had issued his splendid declaration to the Russian people, outlining the policy to which he had pledged unswerving allegiance, and he testifies that throughout the period that has elapsed since that time he has personally witnessed Admiral Kolchak's faithful adherence to the principles laid down in that declaration.

Although this declaration has already been published, it is worth while repeating it here because of Mr. Embry's definite, personal testimony. It is as follows:

To the people of Russia—the All-Russian Government has dissolved. The Council of Ministers, after accepting the full power, has transferred the same to me, Alexander Kolchak, Admiral of the Russian Fleet.

Having decided to take up the cross of power under the exceptionally difficult conditions of civil war and complete disorganization of national life, I declare that I will follow neither the road of reaction nor the road of party struggle which leads to oblivion.

I hold as my main objects the creation of a fit-for-battle army, the conquest of Bolshevism, and the organization of law and order so that the Russian people may select unhindered the form of Government they desire, and be enabled to achieve the great ideas of liberty that have lately been proclaimed throughout the entire world.

I appeal to you, citizens, for united action in the struggle against Bolshevism, for work, and for sacrifices—Kolchak.

How well Admiral Kolchak has performed his difficult task is shown by the testimony of Mr. Adam Leya, of Omsk, for many years the Russian representative of the International Harvester Company, and who at the present time, in addition to his duties to that company, is Honorary Treasurer of the Western Division of the American Red Cross in Siberia. Mr. Leya stated to Mr. Embry that, although he had never taken part in public life, yet as an intelligent and patriotic Russian citizen he had closely studied the events in Siberia since the 1917 Revolution, and that, having known the black despair of Bolshevism, he was once more filled with hope by the wise and sound administration of Admiral Kolchak, which presaged to him that Russia would soon master the forces of disorder within her borders. He declared unreservedly that notwithstanding the incompleteness of the reorganization of Siberia's economic and political life which Admiral Kolchak and his Government have undertaken, Siberia at the present moment is enjoying the best government it has ever had in all its history.

JEROME LANDFIELD

Hungary's Communist Experiment

SINCE that day in March when the weak but honest Government of Count Karolyi fell because of its failure to preserve what Hungary demanded as its national boundaries, enough news of the Soviet Government has come out of Budapest to give the world a fairly clear idea of what applied communism actually means. Comparatively few people have the picture, however, because few put together the bits that appear in the Austrian and the German and the Hungarian papers; yet everyone who is interested in world progress and in the future of our civilization ought to understand what is going on, if for no other reason than that the unrest in other countries may lead to the communist experiment elsewhere. Hungary is a far better field for study than Russia, because the people are better educated and because there has been comparatively little terrorism. It is on this aspect of communism that one's attention is riveted in Russia, yet terrorism is in no sense a necessary part of the philosophy of the movement. The communist would, of course, say that Hungary is not a fair example because there is so much opposition to the new régime. If this is true we can never have a fair example, because in no country in the world could communism be adopted without opposition.

Hungary is at present governed by thirty-two People's Commissaries. It may and it may not be accidental that twenty-five of the number are Jews. By far the best known is Bela Kun, partly because in the Foreign Office he comes into contact with the world outside. He is a Jew, a friend and follower of Lenin, a fair orator, uneducated, an inveterate self-advertiser, a good bit of a charlatan. Georg Lukacs, one of the Commissaries on education, was formerly a professor of philosophy in Heidelberg. He is honest and an idealist. It was Lukacs who had the happy thought of taking all children away from their parents and educating them in the palaces which had been made the property of the state. Joseph Saxe, who has charge of the press propaganda, is a Hungarian Jew who has spent a good part of his life in Germany, part of the time as a reporter for Vorwaerts. The Commissary for Foreign Affairs is Joseph Pogany. He is a clever man, suspected in Hungary, and perhaps with justice, of being in reality no communist at all but an agent of the German military party. The rest of the Commissaries are men of no particular importance. The real governing body is the executive council or "Directorate of Five," consisting of Bela Kun, Bela Varga, who was a writer on economics and in the Karolyi Government, Joseph Pogany, Sigmund Kunfi, and another. A very important man is the secretary of the Directorate, a Jew named Alpari, who has all his life been an extreme radical and in consequence has often been in prison.

Theoretically the supreme authority rests in a National Congress, chosen by the various Councils. Every 50,000 of the population is entitled to one member of the Congress. But the right to vote for the local councils, which in turn choose the members of the Congress, is limited to actual workers, either on the land or in the factories. Women workers as well as men have the franchise and in practice no work is recognized as conferring the franchise except manual labor. Among those specifically excluded from voting are merchants, priests, people with private incomes, employers of labor—and this would exclude even the family which employs one servant—criminals and lunatics. Probably it was the restriction of the franchise which led one of the Commissaries to complain of “the ingratitude of the masses toward the communists who have removed from them all causes for worry.”

In this remark lies the secret of the failure of communism—for even if the communistic Government in Budapest should continue in existence for a few weeks it must still be judged a failure in that the vast majority of the people hate it. And they hate it, as the Commissary naïvely says, because it has removed all worry. The main worry of life is ambition, and in a communistic state ambition can not exist. One can never have more money, because there is a maximum as well as a minimum wage. One can never improve one's position in business because it is never permitted to change from one trade to another. One can never have a better house because all houses are to be just alike. The only scope for the ambitious man is in politics, and the only man who can hope to succeed in politics is the unscrupulous man.

These may seem to be broad statements but they are proved by the published laws. Take, for example, the question of housing, which has been worked out in some detail. All houses, of course, belong to the state, and everyone must pay rent to the state. The proletariat is placed first on the list of allotments for rooms, but even so the hardest-worked proletarian may never have more than the prescribed number of rooms, theoretically one room to a man and never more than four rooms to a family. When rooms are allotted in houses already built, as they have already been wherever the communist rule extends, people are allowed the use of the furniture that happens to be in the rooms, and joint use, with other tenants, of the kitchen. Rent must be paid within three days under pain of eviction. The scandals connected with this allotment and the misery caused by it so far have been endless, but this is all to be righted as soon as the state builds its own houses. These are to be nineteen houses to the acre, all exactly alike, all containing a kitchen, a pantry, a sitting room, two bedrooms and a small piazza. The rent for these houses will be 600 kronen a year and later it is planned to build others with three bedrooms and a bath, the rent for these to be 1,000 kronen a year. The idea of the Commissaries is that it will be impossible not to be happy in these houses—presumably, unless human nature is to be regenerated, because none of the neighbors will have better houses. There will not even be the normal trouble of house-keeping, since commissions will be established to do all the necessary marketing for blocks of houses and to pass on requests for any extras in the way of kitchen or other furnishings that individual lessees may want to buy. Naturally nothing will be permitted unless real need can be shown. The housewife, therefore, will have nothing to trouble her because her larder will be filled by the house commission and her children will be taken away to live in one of the state schools. Nor will she find time heavy on her hands, because women must work as well as men.

Laborers will be perfectly satisfied because their entire lives will be guided by rules laid down by the state. There will be no strikes, because strikes are not permitted. There are workers' councils for all the trades and also a Commissioner for Production appointed by the Government. In case of a dispute between the workers' councils and the commissioner, the decision of the latter is final and if the workers refuse to accept it the Red Guard will be called in to compel obedience. Rates of pay are settled by the state. A man working in the fields will have 25 to 30 kronen a day and the woman 20 to 25. In factories a skilled laborer may earn from 2,000 to 2,500 kronen a month, the ordinary rate being 1,800 kronen. Work is compulsory for all who are physically fit, and although no laborer will be likely to save money because he would then become a man of independent income and therefore not allowed to vote, he need have no fear for old age since insurance is compulsory, half to be paid by the man himself and half by the state. Conditions in all factories and shops will be identical; those employing more than ten people have been taken over by the state, and smaller shops are so closely watched by the state that the owners can not make more profit than would be made by a skilled laborer. If a shopkeeper conceals any goods he is punished by death and if he sells to anyone who does not produce a ticket certifying his need he will be removed and put into a factory. Naturally no shops selling, or factories producing, luxuries will be permitted to exist, and as a corollary to this the state is taking over all articles of precious metal of more than 500 kronen in value. Every worker will be satisfied, because he can never expect anything better.

People who happen to be owners of property are relieved of all their worries by the benevolent rulings of the Government. If a man has income he is permitted to draw from the bank 10 per cent. of his account monthly, up to 2,000 kronen, the rest going to the state. All private safes have been opened, and any foreign currency replaced in Hungarian money. Valuables have, of course, been confiscated. In this way it is thought to level the classes; the troubles resulting are viewed as merely temporary, because the next generation will be made up entirely of workers. In the meantime the Government makes much of its generosity to the holders of property, in that, although under no compulsion to do so, it gives them something. If all property belongs to the state, it is clear that no individual claims have any standing in the eyes of the law.

The administration of justice is exceedingly simple and effective. Courts, still called Revolutionary Tribunals, are made up of a president and two members, with minor officials appointed by the local soviet. The law setting up these courts says specifically that no special qualifications are necessary for appointment to these courts. The man suspected of crime is to be brought immediately before the court, his case tried without any formalities. The judges vote secretly, and the only limitation on their power is that if the sentence is death they must be unanimous. There is no appeal from this sentence and no plea for clemency will be considered. The sentence is executed immediately. Labor courts are conducted in the same way, the only restriction on the appointment of members being that two must be of the laboring classes. It is quite clear that nowhere in the world is justice meted out so swiftly, but it can hardly be maintained that there is no room for error.

All children of the proletariat—it is to be noted that the laws ignore the very existence of other children—are to be educated in state schools, and to assist those who are too old to go to school but still young enough to learn, special instruction is to be given during working hours. All the teachers in the schools have been taken over by the state, and those retained whose views on economic questions are considered sound. Children are taken from their parents and put through an examination, the nature of which is not clear, in order that they may be classified in one or another trade. They are then to live in houses adjacent to the workshops of the trade to which they have been assigned, and are to be taught in the palace schools until they are eighteen or, if they are very bright, until they are twenty-four. The courses of study are to be the trades, the history of the revolution, and the theory of the communist state. It might appear to some of us in the outer and unregenerate world that this uniform scheme of education would be narrowing. The answer is two-fold: people will be more contented if one is no better educated than another, and culture, "which is the exclusive privilege of the proletariat," will be gained by especially cheap theatre tickets and lectures given by other proletarians in the schools and universities; people will have no need of further education, because there will be no way in which they can use it. For example, travel is forbidden, either outside of Hungary or from one part of the state to another. Therefore, no knowledge of geography or of foreign languages is necessary. No books are to be read except those approved by the Commissaries, such as books on the revolution and technical works, and therefore, it would be useless to develop the power of individual thought. People will not even write letters, because all letters will be posted in open envelopes and will always be censored.

One might go on indefinitely, summarizing these minute laws. But enough has been said, perhaps, to show the principles on which the state is conducted. These principles are not those of Marx, however much the Commissaries may call on the name of Marx. The state is not controlled by the trades unions; the assembly is not elected by these unions, but, in the old fashion, by districts. There is no class war, because classes are eliminated and reduced to one dead level. Hungarian communists did not even begin with such theories as did Lenin. They built on what Lenin had learned when he came up against facts, and yet, avoiding his failures, they have themselves made a failure almost more abject.

How does communism work in Hungary? It works only death to the state, as it would undoubtedly work death to any state, unless human nature can be made over. The educated classes have fled from the country. The people are oppressed as they never have been before. The country is starving, and not only because of the blockade. The farmers will not plant crops that will never be theirs; farmers are no more altruistic in Hungary than elsewhere. Production in all lines has dropped to a minimum. The individual man is the mere creature of the state, not permitted to complain, taken away from his trade to be thrust into the Army at the first alarm, with no hope of bettering himself, his children gone, his wife a slave like himself. The Red Army and the Red Guard, which corresponds to the police force in a democratic country, are omnipresent and often malevolent. Men go in fear of their lives because, if someone complains that they are not in sympathy with the revolution, they have before them the court—and death. These are, in truth, worries different from those which the Commissaries have removed, but gnawing always at the vitals of the cowed and silent population. The Commissaries themselves do not share them because they are all-powerful. They have a thousand kronen more pay per month than anyone else, and all their expenses are paid by the state; they have automobiles and chauffeurs; they are thoroughly happy. They believe that in communism they have found the Eldorado for which the world has been seeking all these weary years. But they are the only ones who believe it. They, and they only, a mere handful, have found what the Red orator in Madison Square promises to every poor workman who will raise the red flag of revolution. If communism in Hungary had succeeded in putting the working classes on top and the monied and intellectual classes underneath, it might not be without its appeal. But it has done none of those things. It has ruined the rich, of course, but it has ruined the poor along with them. The man who was poor finds himself poorer and with no hope of bettering himself. The man who was a loafer finds, perhaps, that he has to work, but when the nightmare is over he will loaf more enthusiastically than ever, because he has not learned to work with a purpose. The farmer sees the little plot of land that his family has owned for centuries taken away and himself a tenant of the state, and the poor farmer, who was promised a plot of land by Karolyi, finds that the soviet will not give it to him. He merely becomes the tenant of the state in the place of the nobleman, who often maltreated him but who was human, and sometimes spoke a kind word or gave a fowl to him at Christmas. The laborer in the factory finds his hours shorter, but he always knew that this would come in time, and with the shorter hours he finds himself more than ever a little piece of machinery and nothing more, unable to complain, unable to change his trade or even the factory in which he works, living possibly in a grand house but with no privacy, no rights of his own.

The Hungarians are a patriotic people, and so long as the Czechs and the Rumanians and the Serbians are on Hungarian territory they will support the Government they have, no matter what it may be. But the whole country knows that the communist experiment is a failure. They are afraid now of the Army and of the Red Guard; but the members of these organizations know also what communism means, and, just as soon as the pressure from without relaxes, all except the criminals among them, who are plundering in anticipation of the future or for very love of plunder, will turn against the Government and show the Commissaries what they, the people who are the victims of the experiment, really think.

Belgium's Annexationist Claims

OPEN diplomacy, which was to be the gift of the League of Nations to a democratized world, is slow in coming. The Governments of the Great Powers withhold from their own peoples the complete phraseology of the peace terms, and those of the small ones can do little better than follow suit. For months doubts have obtained as to the wishes of the Government at Brussels with regard to the settlement of the alleged Belgian grievances against Holland. Did the Government, it was asked, intend to support the annexationists? Or did it disapprove of their claims? Would it adhere, in practice, to that sound democratic principle of a people's right of self-determination, in which case it could not demand from Holland the cession of territory inhabited by a populace confessedly averse to such a change? "It does adhere to it," Minister Vandervelde replied in a socialist meeting at Antwerp, "otherwise the Cabinet would not count me among its members." But the annexationists scorned his disavowal of their propaganda. They laughed at this socialist lip-service to Wilsonian ideals; the Government, they persisted, was actually on their side and would, when the time was ripe, show to the world that Belgium would not allow high-sounding principles to override practical considerations of the country's economic interest and military safety.

The recent conference at Versailles, where both the Belgian and the Netherland Ministers of Foreign Affairs were heard by their five colleagues of the Allied and Associated Powers, has proved them partly in the right. Mr. Hymans, in the meeting of May 20, demanded no less than "the recognition by Holland of the necessity for Belgium to base the strategic safety of her territory on the entire course of the Lower Scheldt, which would imply Holland's renouncing all military measures that might counteract the execution of that right by Belgium." And for the Dutch province of Limburg Mr. Hymans desired "a régime whereby Belgium would be safeguarded against the dangers resulting for her safety from the configuration of that territory and which would provide Belgium with the necessary guarantees for her economic interests." The formulation of these claims, especially of the latter, is purposely vague, but both, if they were granted, would doubtless impair Holland's territorial integrity, and impose vexatious servitudes on Dutch lands.

On June 3 the Netherland Minister, Jonkheer Van Karnebeek, explained the standpoint of his Government. This, he said, could never meet the Belgian Government in any proposals which, either for economic or military reasons, involved a transference of sovereign rights from Netherland to Belgium. But the Government at The Hague had never refused, and was still willing, to examine and discuss all points that concerned the navigation and the economic interests of Belgium and to remove such obstacles as could be proved to be unnecessary in their way. The military question, however, he declared to be no private concern of Holland and Belgium only but one that ought to be viewed in the cadre of the League of Nations.

The decision of the five Ministers, communicated to Mr. Hymans and Jonkheer Van Karnebeek on the following day, was a triumph for the latter's point of view. To a committee of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and Holland, the Great Powers delegated the task of "examining the measures which must result from a revision of the treaties of 1839, and to formulate proposals which may not involve either a transference of territorial sovereignty or the imposition of international servitudes." Especially gratifying to Jonkheer Van Karnebeek was the additional decision that Holland and Belgium were invited to lay before this committee "common formulas with regard to the navigable waterways to be drawn up in conformity with the general principles laid down by the Peace Conference." For it has always been the express wish of the Netherland Government that Brussels and The Hague should come to an agreement on those questions that concerned them alone. But the Belgian Foreign Office would not agree to that, hoping, evidently, that the heroic part played by Belgium in the war would make the Great Powers inclined to grant her the luxury of indulging even such desires as were incompatible with the ideals in whose name the war had been waged and won. The Hollanders have never disguised their warm admiration of Belgium's brave resistance against the invader, and it is just among her best friends in this country that the annexationist propaganda has been followed with the greatest regret. Hostility and estrangement between the two sister-states will never lead to the prosperity of either, but can only be eyed with satisfaction in certain German quarters where Pan-German ambitions are still secretly fostered.

Against the revival of that danger neighborliness and a close-knit economic union between Belgium and Holland will be more effective than Belgian military domination in Dutch Limburg. The annexationists refused to heed the lesson the war has taught them: that the society of nations is more firmly founded on trust and good will than on strategic safeguards. They wished to restore part of the old makeshift machinery of Europe which became the very cause of her destruction. It is to be hoped that the decision of the five Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Associated Powers will silence them for good. If their press, after this open disavowal by the Conference at Versailles, should continue to feed ambitious hopes that take their inspiration from the past instead of the future, it would only supply the quixotic spectacle of a fight against wind-mills. The Belgian people, in the aggregate, have never been enthusiastic for their claims. The Flemings were dead against them, and so was the Belgian labor party. The agitation was chiefly the work of influential capitalist circles among the French-speaking Belgians, and it may very well be that the Government at Brussels, with a view to satisfying these powerful elements at home, defended a policy at Versailles which it could not itself whole-heartedly support, seeing that it lacked the approval of the nation as a whole. Otherwise the continuance in office of Minister Vandervelde and two of his socialist colleagues would be inconsistent with the principles embraced by their party. The mildest comment on their attitude is to presume that in order to throw the odium of the annexationists' disappointment on to the Conference, they let Mr. Hymans go to Versailles to defend a lost cause that deserved to be lost.

A. J. BARNOUW

The Hague, June 7

Correspondence

The Bartender and Woman Suffrage

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

An article in your issue of July 5 on "The Passing of the Bartender" is interesting in several aspects. The adroit welding of the welfare of women and wine is, of course, one. Another is the surprising disclosure to your readers that some one writing in the Review, even though in trivial vein, is aware of a movement in society to which the name of suffrage is attached. A third is the fact that your contributor, as might have been foreseen from the context, has reversed the point of view of what he is pleased to refer to as the woman suffrage party.

"Night school courses on new ways to hold poor husbands," as he puts it, would be the last thing suffragists would think of undertaking. The elimination of poor husbands is, of course, necessary. The passing of the bartender is not more certain than theirs. Poor husbands make poor fathers, and for the good of the race must be got rid of. But there are ways and ways. With more to interest her, with an equal share in the political education of her sons, with a say in regard to the schools in which they are to be taught, with a new sense of municipal and national responsibility, the wife of "faithful dull aridity," produced by the present system and its prop the bartender, will also be eliminated. The voting woman will replace her.

In the meantime the sufferings of poor husband, "from an everlasting matrimonial monotony," bereft of the soothing hand of the bartender, are doubtless to be deplored. But never fancy that any woman suffrage party ever imagined would rush in to replace the services of that lamented functionary. The suffrage plan is the other way about. It is the uplift of wives from matrimonial monotony.

J. ROGERS

Baltimore, July 5

'Fed Up With the French'

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The writer of "Fed Up With the French" expresses what many of us have heard since the return of the soldiers from France. But is not this matter of being fed up with the French—or the English—a case for the application of the old remedy, "Least said, soonest mended?" There has been overmuch talk as to whether our soldiers did or did not like the French and rather too much insistence that they ought to and must like the French, because Lafayette fought for us a good many years ago. Gratitude of a nation and personal affection are wide apart, and neither Lafayette's action nor the gallantry of the French nation to-day has transformed the French people into angels. Nor have our men attained beatitude with bravery; differences were bound to occur between such different races, both composed of average, ordinary human beings. The case is really not very serious.

We are also in some danger of being "fed up" with the English as a result of the war. There are a number of Anglomaniacs now piping, people who before the war could scarcely see straight when England was mentioned, but who now slop over in their admiration. They admire chiefly the things that the most thoughtful English men and women realize must go—much as they may deplore the necessity. They like the class differences, the servility of the "lower" classes, the titles of nobility and all the fading feudal system, and often, by their attitude, provoke Americans who have really nothing against England into taking a hostile tone—as a counter-irritant. Some well-meaning persons even declare that the American Revolution was waged and won against a German king and his German soldiers. Now, to tell most Americans that they only licked a lot of Germans in 1776 is tantamount to depriving them of their birthright. Much of the good feeling between the nations during the late war was due to the fact that the family had fallen out, and since made friends.

Some years ago I heard an old man (in Europe for the first time) portentously wondering what the feelings would be of an Englishman standing in front of Independence Hall. I said that he would probably be quite able to bear up, and told him that my son was at that time in a Swiss boarding-school where Americans and English celebrated together the king of England's birthday and the Fourth of July. The old man was the exponent of an obsolete idea. The youngsters, left to themselves, expressed the feelings of their generation, and to that natural expression we can always trust. To force declarations of love for England and France may lead to the fate of the young couple who vowed to exchange a mile of kisses. Before the first yard was completed the engagement was broken.

No one will deny the extreme effort of the French to profit by the American Danaë shower while it lasted; but would our boys have fared any better at home? In the village in which I am now living every newcomer is regarded as legitimate prey. I have frequently been congratulated on the fact that I have not been nearly as much robbed as other strangers and complimented on my own honesty, which I had hitherto taken as a matter of course. I could a tale unfold, but for the honor of the Yankee will hold my peace. Suffice it to say that we are not logically in a position to throw stones through France's shattered windows.

Oblivion's soothing syrup is the best cure for overseas-sickness.

G. G.

June 14

Palimpsest

I KNEW him when the wistful dreams of youth
Dwelt in his eyes, and all men said of him:
"His face is as a book where God doth limn
The love of beauty and the search for truth."

I watched his face through all the crowding years
Of struggle and bereavement and mischance;
And saw the heavy hand of circumstance
O'erwriting histories of doubts and fears

And gray discomfitures—until, indeed,
The beauty was quite gone, and only sorrow,
Regret for yesterday, dread of tomorrow,
Were written for the casual eye to read.

But I who loved him read the old lines still,
And knew that what I saw all men should see—
Beauty and truth once more writ visibly,
When time should purge what time had written ill.

I waited, but the years went by in vain;
Till now—a moment since, it was, his breath
Fluttered and ended—the quiet hand of death
Has made that fair scroll visible again.
EDMUND KEMPER BROADUS

Book Reviews

China, Japan, and the Western Powers

DEMOCRACY AND THE EASTERN QUESTION.
By Thomas F. Millard. New York: The Century Company.

THIS is a work with a single purpose—to point out the significance of the recent acts of Japan, especially with regard to China, and to indicate what should be the policies of the Western Powers in the light of these acts. It is not unlikely that most of its readers, without any special knowledge of conditions in the Far East, will close the volume with the impression that it is a piece of highly colored special pleading and that its recommendations are to be accordingly discounted. And yet the volume gives an accurate account of the part that Japan has played during the last few years in the Far East. The writer of this review has spent a good part of the last four years in the Orient and has made every possible effort to obtain a knowledge and understanding of the political situation there presented, and has thus been able to check up most of Mr. Millard's statements and has found them correct.

It is not too strong a statement to say that Japan's record with regard to China has been uniformly, since 1906, an oppressive and immoral one, glossed over by repeated assertions of friendliness, but controlled by the determination to demoralize China and thus provide an opportunity as well as an excuse to increase Japan's political influence and control in that country. Japan can point to no single act on her part that has been affirmatively and disinterestedly helpful to China. On the contrary, in South Manchuria and Shantung, where her control has been predominant, she has permitted extensive smuggling in fraud of the Chinese revenues and to the prejudice of fair competition with the other Powers trading with China; she has allowed the importation and sale of morphia in large quantities, in many cases with the open aid of her consuls, from which large profits have accrued to herself and infinite injury to the Chinese people; she has exported from China, contrary to Chinese law, enormous quantities of copper "cash"; she is the one nation that has arbitrarily refused to allow the Chinese customs authorities to examine postal parcels sent into China from Japan through the post offices which she maintains in China; she alone, during the war, prevented China from taking steps similar to those taken by the other nations of the world, to conserve her supply of silver; in the tariff revision commission which was recently held at Shanghai to re-value goods for customs purposes, it was her representatives who made it especially difficult to secure for China the effective five per cent. ad valorem duties which, under treaties, she is entitled to levy; in many well-established cases in Shantung, through her control of the railways and railway zones, she checked the efforts of the Chinese authorities to suppress the brigandage that is prevalent in that province; and, through the importation of arms and munitions and the many loans which her bankers have made during the last three years, she has knowingly made possible the continuance of the civil strife that has devastated so many of the provinces and made impossible the institution of administrative and financial reforms in China. It is true that these loans have not been made directly by the Government of Japan, but, in her own official reports, she has described the manner in which she has given to her banks additional powers in order that they might negotiate and float these loans, and by the issuance of belated restraining orders she has shown that there never was any lack of legal power to put an end to such deliberate financial debauchery of the Chinese politicians.

Earlier in the war, Japan vetoed the proposition that China should come into the war upon the side of the Allies, and, after her consent to this step was finally purchased and China had become a belligerent, she entered into agreements with the military leaders in China, whom she was able to control, whereby it was made practically impossible for China to take any military steps without her consent. These Military Conventions, the exact terms of which Japan insisted should be kept secret even from her own allies, provided for joint consultation and action, on the part of the two countries, upon the northern border of China, but, in fact, when action was finally taken, China's voice played absolutely no part. Indeed, through her control of the South Manchurian railways, Japan prevented, in a very large measure, the transportation of those troops to the Siberian border which China was anxious to send. Of events in Siberia the reviewer has no personal knowledge, but all his information is to the effect that many acts of the Japanese officials there tended to keep alive the contests among the several factions and thus to render more difficult for the Allies the solution of the political and military problem. The contest between China, Japan, and the Allies with regard to the status and operation of the Chinese Eastern Railway running through the north of Manchuria constitutes an interesting story in itself. Certain it is that, after coming to an understanding with the United States and the Allies as to the number of troops she was to send to Siberia, Japan at once passed ten times that number into that country and north Manchuria.

The whole record of Japan in Manchuria since 1906 has been one of continual violation of those sovereign rights of China which Japan has repeatedly undertaken to respect, and a disregard of the substance, if not the letter, of the Open-Door doctrine.

In the forefront of Japan's offenses in China are her actions in Shantung. This part of the story is now becoming more or less known in the Western World, but, in view of the provisions of the treaty of peace that bear upon this point, it is important that the essential facts should be again stated. From beginning to end, the Shantung story reflects discredit upon all the parties concerned, with the exception of China, which has at all times been the helpless victim. In 1898 Germany forced from China the lease of the Bay of Kiaochow and the surrounding territory including the city of Tsingtau, together with valuable railway and mining rights in the Province, the only excuse for this act of aggression being the fact that two German Jesuit priests had been killed by bandits. Thus was inaugurated a series of demands on the part of the other Powers for leases to spheres of interest in China which, by provoking a legitimate anti-foreign feeling upon the part of the Chinese, did much to bring about the Boxer outbreak of 1900.

At the outbreak of the Great War in 1914, Japan at once entered as a belligerent, moved to this action, most of her statesmen have asserted, by her obligations under the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. This obligation has, however, been denied by Ambassador Ishii. An ultimatum was sent to Germany to evacuate Kiaochow and to surrender possession to the Japanese with a view to the eventual return of the territory to China. Official statements were made to the world by the Japanese that they had in view no territorial or other advantages that would be in derogation of the rights of the Chinese or of the Western Powers. From the beginning, however, it was evident that more than military considerations were to control. Japanese troops were landed on the coast of neutral China a hundred miles from Tsingtau and military occupation of the railways was pushed westward to Tsinanfaun, the capital of the province, more than two hundred and fifty miles distant from the ostensible object of the military expedition. Not content with military occupation extending to the very heart of this great province, which in size and population practically equals Great Britain, the Japanese openly disregarded the territorial sovereignty of China and instituted civil governments at various points along the railway line, and even at Tsinanfaun itself.

In the Spring of 1915 came, like a bolt out of the blue, the Twenty-one Demands presented by Japan to China, one group of which related to Shantung. There is not space here to review the scope of these demands, but certain of their general characteristics and of the circumstances attending their presentation can not be too often emphasized.

1. In the first place the demands were presented directly to Yuan Shih-Kai, the President of the Republic, and not through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs as ordinary diplomatic usage would have required. Yuan was told that he must not divulge the fact that demands had been presented to him, and he was given to understand that if he acceded to them he might be assured of Japanese aid in the promotion of his own ambitions, but that if he did not accede the Japanese Government would not hold itself responsible for acts that might be taken against him by disaffected parties who, as he knew, were to be found in both China and Japan.

2. These demands, if they had been fully granted by China, would have made of China virtually a dependency of Japan, and have been in flagrant violation of the treaty rights of other Powers in China. Especially was this true of the now famous "fifth group," into which the demands of a general and comprehensive character were gathered. So strong in the end became foreign pressure that Japan consented, not to abandon, but to postpone this fifth group of demands for future discussion—a status which they still retain.

3. The Twenty-one Demands were, for the most part, not in settlement of previously pending controversies between China and Japan, and they were not advanced on the ground that Japan had suffered wrongs from China for which compensation was due; nor were there any treaty or other promises obligating China to surrender the important rights that were demanded. The only justification put forward at the time by Japan was that the arrangement proposed would promote peace and good will between the two countries. In short, the demands were nothing more than a list of Japan's wants presented at a time when China was helpless and the other treaty Powers not in a position effectively to object.

4. When, notwithstanding the injunction of secrecy, it became rumored that certain demands upon China had been made by Japan, the Japanese diplomatic officials denied the fact. When it became no longer possible to maintain this mendacious denial, the Japanese Government officially supplied the other treaty Powers with what purported to be a list of the demands—a list which it presently appeared omitted some of the most important and drastic features.

5. Finally, Japan, after somewhat revising her demands and postponing, as has been said, the Fifth Group for future discussion, issued an ultimatum couched in the most unequivocal terms, and at the same time took steps to strengthen her military forces in China. "It is hereby declared," the ultimatum ran, "that if no satisfactory reply is received before or at the specified time, the Imperial Government will take such steps as they may deem necessary." China was thus given no option: she had to yield, and as a result treaties were drawn up and signed, embodying the demands that had been made. And it is upon these treaties that Japan has chiefly relied before the Paris Peace Conference in support of her claims to rights in the province of Shantung.

Under one of these treaties the Chinese Government agreed "to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests and concessions which Germany, by virtue of treaties or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung." In an accompanying exchange of notes the Japanese Ambassador to China promised in the name of his Government that the leased territory of Kiaochow would be restored to China, but only upon the conditions that the whole of Kiaochow Bay should be opened as a commercial port, that there should be "a concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government," and that there should be also an "international concession," if the other Powers should so desire. In anticipation of the second of the conditions, the Japanese have already marked out for themselves an area in the city of Tsingtau which includes the entire waterfront suitable for commercial purposes and the railway approaches and the site of the railway station. Thus, if the time comes when Tsingtau is handed back to China, it will be only the empty shell that will be returned. The former German railway and mining rights in Shantung are to remain permanently in Japanese possession; and, as regards those rights, it is to be observed that already Japan has claimed and is exercising under them privileges which Germany some time before the war had formally returned to China. In addition to the rights claimed under the Treaties of 1915, Japan has since obtained additional special privileges in Shantung under secret agreements with certain of the Chinese officials.

One more important fact has to be mentioned before we come to the action upon the Shantung situation taken by the Powers at Paris. It now transpires, according to secret documents that have been published, that in 1917 when, at the instance of the United States, China was again urged to enter the war upon the side of the Allies, Japan, as a condition precedent to giving her consent to the proposal, required of Russia, France, Great Britain, and Italy that they should promise that, at the end of the war, they would support Japan's claims to the German rights in Shantung as well as to possession of the German islands in the Pacific and north of the equator—a promise which these Powers then gave.

On the face of the diplomatic correspondence that has been published the consideration moving the Powers to make this promise was, as has been said, that Japan should give her assent to China's coming into the war, but it is a strain upon one's intelligence to be asked to believe that the Powers expected to receive from China's entrance aid sufficient in amount, not only to balance the considerable concessions which they themselves had to make to China, but to compensate for sanctioning the lodgement of Japan in Shantung and the possession by her of the Pacific islands, which would inevitably be strongly objected to by the Australians. Furthermore, Japan had not herself made such sacrifices in the war as to merit substantial payments. Indeed, from the standpoint of trade, shipping, and industry she had profited enormously by the war. One can, therefore, only speculate as to the existence upon the part of the Allies of a feeling in 1917 that they would be well advised to keep Japan as well satisfied as possible—a feeling which may conceivably have played a part in inducing the United States to consent, in the Ishii-Lansing notes, to recognize the "special interests" of Japan in China.

After all, however, the most reprehensible feature of the promises exacted and made in 1917 remains to be pointed out. At the very time that the Allies were inviting China to enter the war as their co-ally and pointing out to her the advantages of so doing, they were secretly agreeing among themselves to reward one of their number with spoils to be taken from China. It is impossible to imagine an act of worse faith than this, and that the statesmen of the European Allied Powers should have been induced to be guilty of it gives further weight to the argument that there was some reason, which it has not been deemed wise to avow, why, at the time, it was deemed imperative that Japan's wishes should be met. The United States, too, was not fairly treated, having been kept in ignorance of the fact that these engagements had been entered into.

Here in outline is the Shantung situation, with injustice, deceit, brutal force, and unfair dealing characterizing every step of its development; and yet upon it has been set the seal of approval or at least of confirmation by the Powers at Paris. It is understandable that Great Britain, France, and Italy should have felt themselves bound by their promises of 1917, but why should the United States have consented to a proposition which was in flagrant contradiction of the fundamental principles of political justice and right which, through President Wilson, had been so emphatically declared? Why should America have been unwilling to violate the rights of a great and friendly people struggling to maintain democratic institutions, for the benefit of a people whose institutions and traditions are admittedly copied from those of Prussia, and whose political philosophy and practices have been strikingly similar to those of that damnable country?

The treaty of peace thus leaves politics in the Far East in a very unsatisfactory situation. It is to be hoped that the League of Nations will prove an instrumentality by means of which a better condition of affairs may be secured.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

First Fruits of Henry James

TRAVELLING COMPANIONS. By Henry James. New York: Boni and Liveright.

JACKETED like a best-seller of 1919, here appear for the first time in book-form seven charming tales originally published in the Atlantic, Scribner's, and the Galaxy between 1868 and 1874, the bright early springtime of James's talent. Mr. Albert Mordell has written a "foreword" to assure us that they are not difficult to read. "To those who associate the name of Henry James with all that is tedious and involved in the art of fiction," he declares, the stories in this volume "will appear as revelations of simplicity in style." Several of the fables are indeed such as Hawthorne might have handled, and technical difficulties which the author of "The Sacred Fount" would have delighted to solve by intricate devices are here disposed of with the naïveté of folklore.

As for the style, it is clear and fluent but it is not simple. It is, on the contrary, quite deliciously sophisticated, self-conscious, and so subtly ornate that one can scarcely get through a paragraph without pausing to study its curious felicities. In his latest books James attempted to reproduce the natural movement and order of the flow of ideas from his own mind with the aid of a stenographer. In these early tales he is obviously under the spell of the great Victorian euphuists, Tennyson and notably Ruskin. Take, for example, a bit of his description of the summit of Milan Cathedral in the titular story:

In looking back on the scene into which we emerged from the stifling spiral of the ascent, I have chiefly a confused sense of an immense skyward elevation and a fierce blinding efflorescence of fantastic forms of marble. There, reared for the action of the sun, you find a vast marble world. The solid whiteness lies in mighty slabs along the iridescent slopes of nave and transept, like the lonely snowfields of the higher Alps. It leaps and climbs and shoots and attacks the unsheltered blue with a keen and joyous incision. It meets the pitiless sun with a more than equal glow; the day falters, declines, expires, but the marble shines forever, unmelted and unintermittent. . . . With confounding frequency, too, on some uttermost point of a pinnacle, its plastic force explodes into satisfied rest in some perfect flower of a figure.

It may be safely said that the author of this passage was a fervent æsthetic. And an æstheticism pure, romantic, intensely sentimental, flavored with wit and irony, is the note of this interesting collection of first fruits. At twenty-seven, James had already fully defined his attitude towards the American rawness and poverty, and towards the European richness and ripeness of scene. He was infatuated with the picturesque, the antique. He was devoted to the observation and discrimination of "sensations." Romance for him meant the refined excitation of a highly cultured memory. Love for his leisurely dilettanteish heroes is a passion to be dreaded and avoided till it becomes a part of their general appreciation of formal grace, and its object an element in a picture, a gem in an appropriate setting, a note in a harmony of agreeable impressions. Any young woman who married one of James's Europeanized exquisites would have frequent occasion for jealousy. She would not need to fear any vulgar infidelity, but she could never feel sure, one imagines, that the perfection of her husband's devotion to her might not be marred or destroyed by some sudden devastating passion of his for a view in the Campagna, a sculptured saint, or an antique cameo. When we have said this, we have explained why James's work as a whole gives many readers a large measure of refined delight without ever quite satisfying the heart.

Labor's Attitude to the War

BRITISH LABOR AND THE WAR: RECONSTRUCTORS FOR A NEW WORLD. By Paul U. Kellogg and Arthur Gleason. New York: Boni and Liveright.

AMERICAN LABOR AND THE WAR. By Samuel Gompers. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE simultaneous appearance of these books is an interesting coincidence, and not without its value in social therapeutics, as the one is a sort of antidote to the other. Certainly, the respective doctors differ as widely in their interpretation of the common symptoms as physicians of opposing schools, and the patient reader is left in a state of dazed neutrality, wondering what is the matter with him and to whom he should go for proper treatment.

In the spring of 1918 the Survey sent Mr. Arthur Gleason to England to attend the June Conference of the British Labor Party and to study the attitude of British labor towards the war. His reports, together with some articles by Mr. Kellogg, which at first appeared in the magazine, are now published as a book. As articles they were rather newsy and readable, with numerous quotations from speeches, editorials, reports, proceedings and programmes; but it is a pity that this mass of material had not been systematized, boiled down, and pre-digested before being presented in book form. However, there are several redeeming features—especially the fine collection of "sources," including the Constitution of the British Labor Party, Labor and the New Social Order, abstracts of the Whitley Reports, and the like. Also the close and intimate view that is given of the British labor movement makes the reading of so many pages well worth while.

It is often hard to tell just what the authors are driving at, but the main thesis of the book seems to be a justification and glorification of the more socialistic leaders of the British Labor Party—Snowden, MacDonald, Henderson and Smillie, as contrasted with mere trade unionists like Fisher, Appleton, Havelock Wilson, and our own Samuel Gompers. These true leaders, it is stated, were not visionaries, nor defeatists, nor Bolsheviki; they were not for peace at any price nor for a separate peace—they were a group of far-seeing internationalists, experts in social psychology, who had no confidence in brute force, but wished to appeal, with all the strength of right reason and idealism, to the submerged democracies of the Central Powers.

Obviously, our authors protest too much. Those British labor leaders were not visionaries, perhaps, but some of them, like Ramsay MacDonald, thought that the invasion of Belgium was no affair of England's. They were not defeatists, exactly, but Snowden said in August, 1917, that the governments could never settle the war; and Smillie, in January, 1918, demanded a peace by negotiation. They were not Bolshevists, of course, but they insisted that the Allies should stand aside while the Bolsheviki worked their will upon their wretched country. They were not for peace at any price, but they were the spokesmen of the war-weary who believed in Scheidemann and the coming German revolution.

The case for the British labor leaders involves, it seems, a condemnation of Mr. Gompers, who balked at the recognition of socialists and would have nothing to do with the Stockholm Conference. Mr. Gompers, apparently, did not know who the real leaders of British labor were, for during his visit he foregathered with such people as the General Federation of Trades Unions, the Sailors' and Firemen's Union, the Merchant Seamen's League, and other henchmen of Lloyd George, and neglected the chief men of the British Trades Union Congress and the British Labor Party. The Seamen, by the way, under Havelock Wilson, were the men who refused to carry Arthur Henderson to Stockholm and who declared a five years' boycott on Germans because of submarine outrages.

Mr. Gompers was narrow and obstinate, too, in refusing to sit with American socialists at any congress with which he had to do. Finally, however, he did consent, with four other delegates, to represent the American Federation of Labor at the Inter-Allied Labor and Socialist Conference of September, 1918; but this was after victory was assured, and the Conference strongly declared that the militaristic autocracy of the Central Powers must be destroyed.

Mr. Gompers speaks for himself in "American Labor and the War," which is a collection of his speeches, together with some documents giving "Labor's Official War Record." These addresses are not notable for variety or originality, but they have a strength and directness that might well beat down the more keen and delicate weapons of his "intellectual" opponents.

True, Mr. Gompers had little to say concerning the war in its early stages, but, when the United States went in, the cause of democracy had no stronger champion than he. At the very outset he lined up the Federation in support of the Government, and an agreement was effected for the keeping of industrial peace until the end of the war. Of course, the contract was not without its consideration, for there was a war with-in a war and labor was fighting more or less for its own hand. Then, too, statistics of strikes show that the agreement was more than strained here and there. For all that, Mr. Gompers has reason to be pleased with his war record, and he may justly claim that organized labor did its "bit."

A notable resolution was passed at the Philadelphia Convention in November, 1915, in favor of holding an international labor conference at the same time and place as the general peace congress. This proposal was rejected by the labor organizations of Europe, but it was not without its influence upon the course of events, for the Inter-Allied Labor Conference has actually met at Paris and its recommendations have been given due consideration by the Peace Conference.

As to Mr. Gompers's defence against his socialistic critics, the following quotations from his speeches show how he can hit back:

"If you read the philosophy of the German Socialist school, you will find that it is patterned after the autocratic power of the Imperial German Government; that it is at variance with and in opposition to the great labor movement as expressed by the trade unions of the world."

"There has never been an assemblage of the organized labor movement in America, Canada, England, or any other country but that an endeavor has been made to foist upon this labor movement the German militarist idea as modified and understood by German Socialism."

"Whatever people have said about me, no one has accused me of being a fool. You can perhaps fool me personally quite easily, but it is not easy, I think, to catch me napping on any big question. My belief is that when these invitations to international conferences were sent out from Petrograd or Stockholm or Berne, they were already more or less tainted with German militarist sympathies. You never have heard any German representative or any one with German sympathies urge an international conference of labor so long as it seemed likely that the Kaiser's forces were marching triumphantly on Calais or Paris."

"If ever there was evidence that peace by negotiation with the present government of Germany is impossible, it is found in the example of Russia, defeated, crushed, humiliated, accepting provisions that it was scarcely believable any people, or representatives speaking in the name of people, would or could accept. At this moment I want to say that the people of the democracies of the world shall be wiped out before they accept such a treaty of peace."

History has not yet pronounced the final verdict as to this dispute, but at least the British elections of December 14, 1918, constituted a vindication of those who had so long stood for peace with victory. Mr. Lloyd George obtained a clear majority of 235 over any combination of other parties. The labor representation was increased from thirty-eight seats to seventy-five, but MacDonald, Henderson, and Snowden were defeated, and British labor will carry on the work of reconstruction under other leadership.

The Villain Pursues

THE WEB. By Frederic Arnold Kummer. New York: The Century Company.

IN SECRET. By Robert W. Chambers. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE LADY OF THE NIGHT WIND. By Varick Vanardy. New York: The Macaulay Company.

THE EYES OF THE BLIND. By Arthur Somers Roche. New York: George H. Doran Company.

MISS MAITLAND, PRIVATE SECRETARY. By Geraldine Bonner. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

AMONG minor benefits conferred, the war has poured a deal of fresh grist into the yawning hopper of the mechanical romancer. For a long time to come we shall be listening, or be asked to listen, to yarns of the spy and the secret service man, of strange codes and manifold inventions by which, at one juncture or another, the war barely missed being stopped or the world barely missed being blown definitely into space. "The Web" is a good example of this kind of thing, being quite preposterous on examination, but sufficiently plausible for a coming-on ear. To take up such a book is to ask for a story, after which the only thing one could fairly resent would be the truth. A young German-American in London whose sister is wife to a British Peer connected with the Admiralty is naturally of interest to certain sinister officials in Germany, during the early days of the war. He consents, for a large price, to act as secret agent for Germany in his brother-in-law's household, duly conveys much information to his employers, and after many adventures in and out of England—the unexpected happens. The storyteller prepares for his "surprise finish" by a rather impudent course of deception, for which we are obliged to him. The beautiful female agent who takes part in the action appears to be an indispensable figure in the current story of this type. She is very active in the latest figment of Mr. R. W. Chambers, which concerns the chance discovery by an escaped British prisoner of the Great Secret of Germany, and the duel that ensues between him and that intolerant Power. There is, it seems, a hidden canton in a corner of Switzerland, which is the secret price of her immunity from Germany. There Germany has contrived, under the mountains, a path to France's least protected frontier. But Germany reckons without the fact that the young Scotchman, Kay McKay, and his comrade of the Secret Service, Eve Erith, are not only a most determined pair, but that they are under the special protection of an authority named Chambers. Therefore, the Teuton's wrath, his malice and his knavish tricks are, we know, of purely titillating value. Kay and Eve, after making great play with the everlasting "piquant" situation of the young man and young woman alone and unwed in the wilderness, bring about the confusion of the Boche. To the finale Mr. Chambers gives that touch of vulgarity for which we may always look to him with confidence. "I simply won't marry you," cries Eve, emerging from the valley of the shadow with her hero, "until I have some decent gowns and underwear."

In all the other romances of this group the woman sleuth is prominent. In "The Lady of the Night Wind" she is a professional operator whom the author has already made available if not famous. In the present yarn she is married, but still ready and able for business (the same thing is true of "Molly" in "Miss Maitland, Private Secretary"). She will appeal to readers who like a long and elaborate performance connected with the theft of priceless jewels from the Orient. It is a marvel if a single jeweled orb remains in the socket of a single idol of India, after the recent activities of the Western adventurer, as chronicled by our novelists. This tale proves that an Indian ruby as big as a pigeon's egg with a two-carat emerald embedded in it has as much right to be struggled for in America as in its elder milieu among the nobility and gentry of England. "The Eyes of the Blind" brings us back to the Hun and his emissaries among us during the late war. The scene is New York, the action concerns a young newspaper man, a wealthy pacifist and his belligerent daughter, and a German Secret Service agent, very "high up," who is masquerading as a French Comte de Grecque. The rich man in his hatred of war is induced by the wily "Count" to cast the influence of his many newspapers, during our period of official neutrality, in favor of Germany. His are those "eyes of the blind" which must be opened for the sake of humanity. Towards this end, and towards the foiling of "De Grecque" and his minions, three persons work, somewhat at cross-purposes and in a cheering confusion:

the girl, the reporter, and a professional sleuth who is supposed to have retired. Of course the girl and the young reporter are in love almost from the outset, despite their frightful suspicions of each other; and of course, by their finally united agencies, the blind old victim of De Grecque at last welcomes the light and a son-in-law; and the unmasked Baron von Something, having lost both the game and the girl, very properly shoots himself.

All of these stories are rather better "written" than such tales used to be or strictly need to be. In mechanical romance it is primarily the mechanism that counts, and for many readers anything more, anything in the direction of genuine action and characterization are pure waste or impertinence. Those famous scientists and divines who have found relaxation in "a good detective story" have not, so far as we are able to discover, exacted or desired, at such moments, anything respectable from a literary point of view. To the contrary, they have rather exulted in their temporary escape not only from the field of learning but from the paddock of literature. They liked the machinery, the mental puzzle, and they wanted nothing more. And yet there is no real reason why, for most of us, the illusion of the mechanical action should not be heightened by an illusion of authentic atmosphere and even characterization. More people seem to be asking for yarns that are not sillier than need be. "Miss Maitland, Private Secretary," is a perfectly readable story, apart from its well-contrived plot. There is plenty of adventure and mystery in it, jewelry-robbery and kidnapping and sleuthing of divers sorts. The uncommon thing is (for it is, after all, still uncommon) that all these queer experiences seem to be coming to a group of people we might very well know or know of in the flesh. That is, they are as real as the characters we meet in the ordinary novel of serious intention. Those parts of the story which are told by Molly, the woman detective, are in a really amusing vein of Broadway monologue.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Run of the Shelves

AT the bar at which the aviators assembled after the day's work was a sign which read, "Ici on explique les coups." At the mess there was another: "Défense d'expliquer les coups ici." To put it into corresponding English, post-mortems were not allowed at the table; the coroner's inquest was supposed to terminate its session before it adjourned from the bar. For our part, we should be willing anywhere to listen to Charles Bernard Nordhoff explain his "coups"; indeed the whole range of his adventures and impressions gained from his service with the French aerial forces. His papers, originally appearing in the Atlantic Monthly, now form a volume under the title of "The Fledgling" (Houghton Mifflin). It is a modest and straightforward account of what he was himself no small part, set forth without apparent artifice and without much plan, but with a charming directness and a satisfying fullness. The crowded hour of the aviator at the front has nowhere its like in history. If its like never reappears in the world, and it may not, mankind's memory of it all will persist only—but how vividly!—by virtue of a few faithful accounts such as this.

Mr. Morrison I. Swift puts the question: "Can Mankind Survive" (Marshall Jones Co., Boston). We gather that it can not—not, at any rate, unless it gets behind Mr. Swift pretty speedily and takes to heart his burning revelations. The first step towards race salvation, we are simply and elegantly told, must be "a purgative house-cleaning of the human cranium." Such pearls are prodigally cast, and may be readily distinguished, even afar off, by liberality at the expense of the italic font. The hortatory sublimity of the valedictory adjuration challenges full quotation: "Make your peace with the new order of things by creating the new order of things. That is your salvation and the world's. Recognize that you are choosing between selfishness and survival, and have no third decision." The jacket of this book tells us that it "will arouse the indignation, and outrage the cherished convictions, of the majority of people: that is why it ought to be read." We can not agree with this bid for martyrdom, for Mr. Swift's outpourings confirm, without rousing a spark of indignation, the following cherished conviction, to wit: There are always certain areas of thin soil, but meagrely endowed with plant-foods, into which the flying seeds of a fecundation-period fall. The ensuing sprouts are of interest to the plant-pathologist, but to no one else whatsoever. The granaries are not destined to groan from the fruit thereof. The stalks lack substance even as fodder. There is a tincture of regret that human time and capital have been spent in gathering, stamping, and binding the leaves. On the whole, the question of man's survival stands where it did before Mr. Swift set pen to paper.

The Colver lectures for 1919, delivered by William Roscoe Thayer at Brown University, have been issued in book form by Houghton Mifflin Company under the succinct title: "Democracy: Discipline: Peace." Their subjects are briefly: the righteousness of democracy, the need of discipline in democracy, the need of race consolidation in America. In their reduction to formulæ the propositions may seem axiomatic, but they are handled by Mr. Thayer with a force and freshness which prevents their submergence in the commonplace. The lecturer's enthusiasm for democracy as a principle is unbounded; its actual workings he commends with an engaging moderation. Mr. Thayer sees that democracy can not fairly be blamed for that degree of imperfection which is inseparable from the human nature which supplies both its operators and its material. Its success is partial, but in a race like our own, where the success of no institution is complete, a partial success may be a perfect vindication.

Mr. Thayer is sound and eminently timely in his insistence on the association of discipline with democracy. He is very anxious—almost needlessly anxious—to defend this association from the charge of inconsistency. Democracy is freedom, and discipline is restraint. How, asks Mr. Thayer, is this contradiction to be settled? But work is activity and sleep is repose. Would a physician feel that he was caught in a logical contradiction if he recommended sleep and work to the same patient? Mr. Thayer's self-extrication from his difficulty is more ingenious than convincing. "Just as he who loses his life shall find it, so he who of his own choice gives up his will shall find it." It will be seen that Mr. Thayer's ground is very high—so high that America can scarcely clamber up behind him. There is hardly any pinnacle, material or moral, wide enough to afford standing-room for a hundred million people. This form of reconciliation is surely not available for the myriads of persons to whom the Biblical "He that loses his life shall find it" or Dante's "E la sua volontate è nostra pace" (a state of mind which Dante, less venturesome than Mr. Thayer, restricted to Paradise) is unpalatable or unmeaning. But any common man who has paid a fire-insurance premium, or seen his neighbor pay one, knows that the giving-up of part of one's property to secure one's title to the remainder is a normal and rational process. Discipline is the premium on freedom. Mr. Thayer's gospel is much better than his theology; the latter indeed is ideal enough to surprise us a little in the possession of that type of hardheadedness to which universal military training for America on the Swiss plan is a desideratum.

Mr. Thayer sometimes makes a point with admirable neatness. "You can not make honest men of criminals by applying to them an inhuman system which would make criminals of honest men." Or he can be adept in the selection of a figure: "no hyphenates, whose hyphen, like the kiss of Judas, is a link for treachery." He can manifest, when he will, a sweet reasonableness that conduces to receptive geniality in the reader; but his antipathies are bitter, and at their approach the sweetness vanishes, with a certain tendency on the part of the reasonableness to participate in the flight. The privilege of girding at Mr. Bryan is one of the things that endears freedom of speech to a certain class of Americans, but recreation has its times and seasons, and a eulogium on democracy is not the fitting place for an expression of contempt for William J. Bryan.

Familiar Misquotations

A CORRESPONDENT, in calling attention to a poetical misquotation in a recent number of the Review (June 21), says "Misquotation is not a crime." It most assuredly is not. It is one of the most delightfully human reactions to the great fact of literature. Everyone, of course, is the victim of a more or less trothless memory. Even a well-trained literary sense is prone to be a little vague, sometimes, in the recollection of the ipsissima verba; it can recall the drift, the weight, the shape, the texture of a quotation, and reconstruct a sort of equivalent which is almost if not quite so good—sometimes better, indeed, for the world's daily use.

Dr. Johnson, whose verbal memory was as good as any human being's is likely ever to be, in quoting the line from Gray's Elegy,

Leaves the warm precincts of the cheerful day mistook one word; "for," says Boswell, "instead of precincts, he said, confines." Matthew Arnold, in his essay on Maurice de Guérin, quotes Keats's

Moving waters at their priestlike task
Of cold ablution round Earth's human shores.

Keats wrote pure ablution, and it might be a hard matter to choose between the two. Certainly a reader of Arnold will always be a little uncertain, till he looks it up, just what Keats did write. But Arnold's misquotation in this instance can hardly be said to have gained genuine popular currency. Arnold was of course quoting from a memory richly stored with the touchstones of true poetry, and there is in that practice, with all its dangers, a fine disdainful grace; quoting, as it were, like a gentleman, and not heavily, with chapter and verse, like a Dr. Pangloss. Hazlitt thus out of a full mind misquotes Shakespeare freely, and in this there is no harm—no more than in Scott's trick of making up a quotation to suit his needs and ascribing it to "Old Play"—provided there is no attempt to make such manufactured evidence prove anything in particular.

The case cited by our correspondent is excellently in point. Professor Tupper, in his paper entitled "Mobilized Philology," attributed to Tennyson the line

The blood-red fury of Seine.

Our copy of "In Memoriam," and presumably our correspondent's, puts it quite differently:

The red fool-fury of the Seine.

If Professor Tupper had felt constrained to run down the line he would of course have quoted it as it stood in his text. But he felt no such compulsion, and it is therefore of considerable interest to observe the form in which the line has found a place in his extremely powerful and highly sensitive literary consciousness. "Red fool-fury" is a pretty big mouthful. It may be better poetry than the other but it is not nearly so fitted as the other to the rôle of a popular quotation.

Popular quotations—and misquotations—have their source not so much in the printed page of the writer or in the repositories like Bartlett. They arise from just such an act of literary creation as we have here been privileged to witness. They go to make up a fund of oral tradition, a folklore of gnomic wisdom, which is careless of copyright, innocent of nice scholarly conscience, and which has some rather definite ways of putting its own peculiar stamp upon the sayings to which it gives permanent room. It is in the form Arnold gave it that a line from Dante's "Paradiso" has become permanently fixed in the popular mind:

*In la sua volontade è nostra pace,
(In His will is our peace.)*

I can not say that I have ever heard or seen the line quoted otherwise, save by a professed Dante scholar. Yet the modern texts of Dante give quite another and perhaps a really different reading:

*E la sua volontate è nostra pace,
(And His will is our peace.)*

Perhaps the two differ very little, but taken with the context I am inclined to think they do—a little. But whatever Dante may have himself written and however Arnold's own text of the poet may have preserved the line, it is quite apparent that most people who quote it to-day get it from Arnold and not from their own reading in Dante. Or rather, they get it from that fund of folk-quotation to which Arnold in this instance has made a definite contribution.

Not every literary utterance, however good, is at once perfectly formed to fall easily from the lips of men. Much that has found its way into general humanity's little bag of literary tricks was not in its first form proverbial; it was not self-sufficient, but part of a context. And all connective tissue must be cut away, it must be completely freed from its matrix, before it can prove viable on its own account. This, perhaps, accounts in part for the popular preference for "In la sua volontate" over "E la sua volontate"; e (and) implies that something has gone before, and just here we particularly want something complete in itself. Keats, again, began his "Endymion" with the statement that a general proposition which he proceeds to illustrate and adorn. But the great community of talkers and writers want not a declarative statement but a descriptive tag; they wish to describe something—anything—as "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." And they proceed to do so.

A thing of beauty is a joy forever,

Brevity is the soul of this sort of popular wit. An expression which otherwise commends itself to gnomic use may seem in its original form a little too long. Solomon the wise said, or rather his diligent translators made him say, "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." Most people, however, telescope this into "Pride goeth before a fall" and find themselves better satisfied with the condensed form. Touchstone, who was somewhat given to loquacity, introduced his Audrey as "a poor virgin, sir, an ill-favored thing, sir, but mine own." A little long, and too specific; the world finds itself better served with "a poor thing but mine own."

An unusual or antiquated grammatical form has small chance of survival in the popular mouth. The Ancient Mariner complained of Water, water everywhere, nor any drop to drink.

As commonly quoted,

Water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink, there is some loss of distinction; as a patch the purple is a bit faded, but for that very reason it matches better the home-spun fabric of everyday discourse. Cowper, singing the praise of tea, speaks of the cups

That cheer but not inebriate.

Before this can pass into genuine popular use, two things must be done: "cups," the particular, must be generalized into "cup"; and the construction of "not" before the finite verb, good Elizabethan English but now a little antiquated, must be got rid of. We hear much in these days, with a fine disregard of metre, of "the cup that cheers but does not inebriate."

Horace said of the verses of Ennius that no matter how you disarranged them you could not make prose of them, you would still recognize the poet in them:

invenias etiam disjecti membra poetæ.

"The limbs of a dismembered poet" is not a phrase that the world can do much daily business with, but "disjecta membra" is worth something. Nevertheless, the world goes on dismembering its poets, and for no reason more often, apparently, than its love of driving words in pairs. Let it acknowledge and confess its manifold sins and wickednesses in respect of this rhetorical trick, the striving for dignity by means of an obvious symmetry. It has been a characteristic of the English language for more than a thousand years, and the old notion that it originated in a desire, by employing a French word and its English synonym, to make oneself intelligible to a bi-lingual population, still lingers among people who should know better. The real origin of the device is to be sought in the desire of translators, from the earliest times, to do full justice to their originals and to that of certain writers of the Renaissance who strove at once to enrich the English language and to make their French or Latinate importations intelligible. No longer consciously aimed at in carefully made prose, it still lingers as one of the characteristic tricks of proverbial wisdom. "My way of life," says Macbeth, "is fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf." "Sear and yellow leaf," however, fits better. Milton closes his "Lycidas" with the dawn of Tomorrow to fresh Woods, and Pastures new.

So he wrote it, but the world prefers "fresh fields and pastures new." Fields is more nearly than woods synonymous with pastures.

Fate has played a similar trick with the poet Prior, who, overlaying with classic gilt the fine gold of the "Nut-brown Maid," describes the tapering waist of his Emma as Fine by degrees and beautifully less.

The popular muse, however, tickled with the phrase, substitutes small for fine, for no other reason apparently than that small and less make a better matched pair. I had thought that the quotation

Like angels' visits, few and far between was a popular perversion of the lines in Blair's "Grave":

In visits
Like those of angels, short and far between.
The change from "short" to "few," obliterating a distinction and employing two more or less synonymous words, is precisely what is to be expected. But on looking the matter up I find that the popular form has been dignified by inclusion almost verbatim in Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope":

Like angel visits, few and far between.

Such is sometimes the fate of the popular misquotation. Hamlet's "heart of heart," meaning, as he said, the heart's core, has been altered, probably in imitation of such Hebrew superlatives as "King of Kings," into "heart of hearts." In this form I think Wordsworth somewhere uses it.

No book has contributed more to the general stock of misquotations than the Bible. No book exists in such a multitude of forms, which may account for some of the popular departures from the wording of the King James Version. But it is not easy to supply reasons for most people's habit of saying "In the sweat of thy brow," when the text reads "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Why "the parting of the ways" instead of the "parting of the way"? "Bone of my bone," instead of "bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" may be due to the desire for perfect parallelism. And the same explanation may hold for "Thus far shalt thou come, but no further," instead of "Hitherto shalt thou come." But why the general preference for "better part," when we are expressly told that "Mary hath chosen that good part"? The Vulgate, for whatever reason, says "the best part"—optimam partem—often cited in the Middle Ages in proof of the superiority of the contemplative life, as represented by Mary, over the active life, symbolized by Martha. But apparently no such contrast was originally intended. Why, again, "a multitude of sins," when it is said of charity that it "shall cover the multitude of sins"? Perhaps there is no other reason save that the tongue is an unruly member; such at least the world agrees in calling it, though the Biblical text describes it as "an unruly evil."

HARRY AYRES

Some One-Act Plays

- FATHER NOAH AND OTHER FANCIES. By Geoffrey Whitworth. New York: Robert M. McBride and Company.
- THE MOON OF THE CARIBBEES. By Eugene G. O'Neill. New York: Boni and Liveright.
- EVERYBODY'S HUSBAND. By Gilbert Cannan. New York: B. W. Huebsch.
- BITS OF BACKGROUND. By Emma Beatrice Brunner. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- NUMBERS. By Grover Theis. New York: Nicholas L. Brown.

THE most remarkable play now before me is a small affair in free verse to which its unknown or dimly-known author, Mr. Geoffrey Whitworth, has given the unpromising title of "Father Noah." One is surprised to learn that, with literature as captain, the Ark is still seaworthy. The first success of the play is the choice of its setting—the hold of the vessel. The second is a question put by the grave Noah to the humane Japheth after Shem and Ham have made them the unwilling witnesses of a sordid wrangle on the subject of inheritance: "Do you desire that this world should go on?" The third altitude in the play is a bit of mechanics—a chain attached to a bung in the keel of the Ark, the removal of which will admit the water by which the scant remnant of a corrupt race will be swept to the death that has overwhelmed its companions. Noah's hand reaches for that chain. Here is a situation at once finely grandiose and truly great, a situation that would have charmed Hugo and shaken Carlyle—the Pyramids and the "Iliad," the "Prometheus" and the Laocoön, Calvary and Pentecost, the Roman Empire and the fleets of Venice, Titian and Copernicus, Shakespeare and Angelo, the Declaration of Independence and the French Revolution, hanging on the displacement of a valve. The other qualities of the play, character, craftsmanship, rhythm, diction, while by no means on a par with these sublimities, are not unworthy to be their setting and support.

Mr. O'Neill's seven rather long one-act plays all deal with sea or sea-shore, and in four of them the same group of low, but not vile, seamen reappears. Mr. O'Neill's work I should call literature—vigorous though repellent literature. I am less sure that its quality is dramatic. There is an obvious fitness for the stage which, resting on action, passion, climax, and suspense, is palpable even to the book-reader. A jockey can often recognize a fast horse even in a stable. Not all fast horses can be so recognized, however, and there is an occult fitness by which plays sometimes succeed in the absence or the dissimulation of the virtues I have named. I am not able, and never expect to be able, to discern this occult fitness with any security on the printed page. The point of certainty is that Mr. O'Neill's plays do not possess the obvious fitness. The tension is slight, the movement dilatory, and the absence of logical cement is the eminently logical outcome of the absence of events to be cemented.

The "Moon of the Caribbees" is simply a specimen—a sample, if one likes—of a sailor's row in the West Indies, the incitements to which are supplied by contraband whiskey and venal women. "Bound East for Cardiff," perhaps the best of the seven, instructs us in the fashion of a sailor's death. In "Ile," another outstanding play, a wife's brain is turned by the refusal of the husband, a sea-captain, to return with insufficient profit from a protracted voyage. It is curious that the two ugliest and hollowest plays, the "Long Voyage Home" and the "Rope," are precisely the two in which Philip Henslowe or David Belasco might have been expected to see possibilities.

These plays are grimy, but grime and slime are two distinguishable things, and the plays are on the wholesome side of that distinction. "This sailor life," says the dying Yank, "ain't much to cry about leavin'—just one ship after another, hard work, small pay, and bum grub; and when we git into port, just a drunk endin' up in a fight, and all your money gone, and then ship away again." The sturdy and pounding diction of this passage is sufficient proof of the author's sensitiveness to the ruder forms of vigor in words. As for the sentiment, it is that of Pierre Loti's "Mon frère Yves," with the shimmer gone. Mr. O'Neill's sailor is at least a good fellow, but the extrication of the good fellow from the drink and the lust and the blasphemy and the riot in which he is stowed away, like treasure under hatches, demands time and patience and faith. Mr. O'Neill, who is unhelped and likewise unhindered by any subtleties, had a true feeling for the larger prominencies, or headlands, of masculine character. His Yank—upright somehow on his very deathbed—and his Smitty—prostrate even when erect—abound in vital, because unacknowledged pathos.

Mr. O'Neill saves human nature—saves it, as it were, by a reprieve at the foot of the scaffold; but when it comes to that other culprit, life or destiny as you choose to call it, he suffers the execution to go forward. The seven plays are all dark; Mr. O'Neill depicts a pitiless universe. The reader may partly console himself with the observation that, to prove the savagery of life, Mr. O'Neill is often—not always—obliged to resort to those accidents or misunderstandings which are interruptions to the normal course of life. To prove a man's cruelty by adducing his conduct in his cups would be tantamount to admitting that he was humane when sober. Of course in presenting the dramatist as the prosecutor of the universe, I go much too far. Mr. O'Neill is simply an artist on whose artistic sense certain truculencies in the behavior of the cosmos have made a strong impression. Tommy Traddles drew skeletons, not because he was morbid, but because skeletons were the things that it amused him to draw. Mr. O'Neill's artistic pessimism has very probably no deeper and no darker source.

Mr. Cannan's pliancy and nimbleness are seen to good advantage in the handling of the pre-nuptial play, "Everybody's Husband." The girl, on the eve of marriage, is beset with doubts, which mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother, appearing successively in a species of fantastic masque, confirm by their very disagreements. The piece is light and bitter; it uses bodkin or hat-pin as stiletto. The women are agreed that the perversity of husbands is generic rather than individual. But to indict a sex has its difficulties, like the indicting of a people. There is every probability that husbands are as differ-

Big Vision and Infinite Exactness

"We must have a laboratory!

"This was the decision arrived at during the first meeting which formulated the present Crocker-Wheeler Company.

"Nowadays, laboratory research underlies every great achievement. But back in 1888—there was shaking of heads when the Crocker-Wheeler Company built its laboratory before it equipped its plant.

"It has always been the C-W idea to lead!"

Ed Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

ent as men. The play is daintily malign in sending the girl to the altar after all its protests; Mr. Cannan, in effect, gives away the bride. His conduct in this point is rather painful. He has the right to say: "Marriage is an evil; don't marry." He has the right to say: "Marriage is good; do marry." He has also the right to keep still, a right of which he seems quite willing to forego the exercise. But he has chosen to do the one thing which he can not decently and rightfully do; he has said in substance: "Marriage is an evil; do marry." To unnerve the volunteer for the step which you finally commend to his acceptance, to dishearten, yet not to dissuade—that is diablerie, if not diabolism.

Miss Brunner in "Bits of Background" and Mr. Theis in "Numbers" are still in their dramatic pupillage; they produce inventions, contrivances, experiments. Not one of the playlets has an inside; Miss Brunner, in particular, amid the strongest emotional crises, exhibits a witchlike faculty of handling hot iron and treading on hot ploughshares without contamination from the heat. Mr. Theis, in serious themes, is powerless. "Numbers," a one-act war play, which somehow suggests the proximity of trench to latrine, aims to be searching, but really gropes; "Between the Fires" is one of the gripping plays which merely fumble. In lighter themes he is more at home; the last three plays, though made to order, show marks of ingenuity and spirit. Miss Brunner's training has gone further; the work is studious and disciplined. The motives are incisive and novel, and she has mastered the mallet-like or bludgeon-like dialogue of the modern expert. Each of the first three plays has a real asset. "Over Age," though plotted to death, has timeliness, suitability to the moment. The "Spark of Life" has a tremendous motive, under which, as under an avalanche, its fragility is crushed and buried. "Strangers," much the best of the plays, is strong in process, in the variation and graduation of interest. The combination of these parted assets might help Miss Brunner to a future.

O. W. FIRKINS

Books Received

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Gordon, George. The Men Who Make Our Novels. Moffat, Yard. $1.60 net.

Johnson, R. B. The Women Novelists. Scribner. $2.00.

TIFFANY & Co.

PEARLS AND DIAMONDS AN UNEQUALED SELECTION

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Moore, G. F. History of Religions. Scribner. $3.00.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Parker, W. B. Cubans of To-day. Putnam.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

British-American Discords and Concords: A Record of Three Centuries. Putnam. 75 cents.

Fletcher, C. B. The Problem of the Pacific. Holt. $3.00 net.

Frank, Glenn. The Politics of Industry. Century. $1.50.

Goldstein, J. M. Russia: Her Economic Past and Future. Russian Information Bureau. $1.75 net.

Ioteyko, J. The Science of Labor and Its Organization. Dutton. $1.60 net.

Marshall, H. R. Mind and Conduct. Scribner. $1.75 net.

Neilson, Francis. The Old Freedom. Huebsch. $1.00.

Ross, E. What Is America? Century. $1.25.

Select Cases Before the King's Council, 1243-1482. Edited by I. S. Leadam and J. F. Baldwin. Harvard University Press.

Taft, W. H. and Others. The Covenant. Doubleday, Page. $1.25.

Tunney, T. J. Throttled: Detection of German and Anarchist Bomb Plotters in the U. S. Small, Maynard. $2.00 net.

Veblen, Thorstein. The Vested Interests. Huebsch. $1.00.

POETRY AND DRAMA

Cheney, Sheldon. The Open-Air Theatre. Mitchell Kennerley.

Oppenheim, James. The Solitary. Huebsch. $1.25.

EDUCATION

America and the League of Nations. Addresses in Europe—Woodrow Wilson. Rand McNally.

Breasted, J. H. Survey of the Ancient World. Ginn.

Powell, L. P. The Spirit of Democracy. Rand McNally.

The World and Democracy. Selected by L. P. Powell and C. M. Curry. Rand McNally.

STUDENTS OF THE FINE ARTS

will be interested in the following volumes both for their authoritative information and as examples of unusually fine typography.

ATTIC RED-FIGURED VASES IN AMERICAN MUSEUMS. By J. D. BEAZLEY $7.00 Mr. Beazley has so developed the study of Greek ceramics that he has created almost a new science.

A HANDBOOK OF ATTIC RED-FIGURED VASES. By JOSEPH C. HOPPIN. 2 vols.... $8.00 each Makes practically accessible to the student for the first time every well-known vase signed by or attributed to the various masters of the sixth and fifth centuries, B.C.

EUTHYMIDES AND HIS FELLOWS. By JOSEPH C. HOPPIN $4.00

GIOTTO AND SOME OF HIS FOLLOWERS. By OSVALD SIRÉN. 2 vols..... $12.00 Dr. Sirén's wide reputation as an authority on Italian art gives this work special significance.

7 Randall Hall, Cambridge, Mass.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

280 Madison Ave., New York

On the bare announcement of the publication of THE REVIEW, many hundreds of annual subscriptions were received even before the first issue went to press. A magazine dealer of forty years' experience has described as unprecedented the welcome thus accorded this publication.

Subscribers frequently send us the names of others who are likely to be interested in THE REVIEW. In this way a remarkable number of names have been received.

In order to make sure of receiving every issue of THE REVIEW, place your order with your newsdealer.

If you find this inconvenient, send your subscription direct, using the coupon below.

THE REVIEW, 140 Nassau Street, New York:

Dear Sirs: Enter my subscription for fifty-two issues beginning immediately and bill me for five dollars.

Name

Address

(If you prefer not to be billed for the above subscription, please enclose check for five dollars with this order.)

The following may also wish to subscribe:

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

Name

Address

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 10

New York, Saturday, July 19, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	199
Editorial Articles:
President and Senate	201
Production, Distribution, Happiness	202
More Secret Treaties	203
The Ocean Fleights	204
Unbinding the Spellers	205
"Little Americans." By H. de W. F.	206
The Non-Partisan League. By Eye-Witness	207
The Freedom of the Seas. By Caspar F. Goodrich	209
Correspondence	210
Book Reviews:
The League of Nations	211
Foreign Capital in Mexico	213
Vulgarity Outside and In	214
The Whole Law of Income Tax	215
War and Treaty-Making Power	215
The Run of the Shelves	216
Some History That Might Have Happened. By G. E. Partridge	217
The French Stage During the War. By William H. Scheffey	218
The Canadian Trades and Labor Congress	220

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

THE promptness with which Finance Minister Erzberger has taken hold of the problem of ways and means to meet the indemnity is worthy of all praise. According to the announcements that have thus far come by cable, he means to take hold of the job without giving any countenance to schemes of repudiation, and without indulging in any idea that the money can, in the main, be raised in any other way than by a tremendous tax on wealth. The notion that repudiation of the home debt would have to be resorted to is doubly false; for the money can be raised without repudiation, and repudiation would not be of the slightest help in raising it. To repudiate the home debt would not mean that people would, on the whole, be taxed any less, but only that the tax would be levied more inequitably—that those who had put most into Government loans would be punished by being subjected to the greatest exactions. In addition to the dishonesty and the injustice of this, there would be the disastrous effect upon banks, savings institutions, etc., which would clearly be thrown into bankruptcy by the destruction of a large part of their assets. This circumstance has been put forward as a reason why Germany can not pay the indemnity at all; the argument being that she can not meet the foreign demand without repudiating her home debt, that repudiating her home debt would mean bankruptcy for banks, savings institutions, and other great corporations, that this bankruptcy would mean ruin to millions of "little people," and that the ruin would so undermine the morale of the whole nation that its productivity would be fatally impaired. A long chain, and hanging together very well; but the trouble is in the peg from which it hangs—the idea that repudiation of the home debt has any connection with payment of foreign claims. Herr Erzberger evidently knows better than that; he is perfectly aware that robbing Fritz will not make it a bit easier for Fritz and Max together to pay Pierre and Paul.

FOR sheer bad taste it might be hard to choose between Sir Edward Carson's "serious admonition" to America: "You attend to your own affairs," and the reply of a Sinn Féin enthusiast in this country: "America won the war and has therefore a right to dictate the terms of peace." The fomentor of rebellion in Ulster happens to have the right of it as against the fomentor of rebellion in the rest of Ireland. Most assuredly it is none of our business; there are few things that give promise of causing more trouble in the world than our thoughtless encouragement of Irish nationalistic propaganda in this country. Nothing could be more absurd than the Sinn Féin contention that America went to war to bring self-determination to all the oppressed peoples of the earth. America went to war to rid herself and the world of the German menace. Having aided materially in the achievement of that purpose, America's interference in the internal affairs of the British Empire would be just as improper and just as fraught with danger to the well-being of the world as it would have been before the war. But we should like to say very seriously to Sir Edward Carson that his own frantically irresponsible utterances, and his own behavior, which differs from ordinary sedition chiefly by reason of its truculence, are at this moment quite the most serious threat aimed at good understanding between the United States and Great Britain. If, as he says, he has the maintenance of such relations at heart he must at all costs keep himself, his doings and his sayings, out of the newspapers.

IN his eagerness to fasten upon the United States the rôle of Chosen People, Mr. Wilson strains recent history and present facts rather sorely. In his message to the Senate he says, "We entered the war as the disinterested champions of right." Were that really true, we should have entered the war very early. The "intolerable aggression" of Germany was as evident in three months as after three years. As a matter of record and cold fact, President Wilson kept us out of the war under a narrowly legalistic theory of neutrality, and he brought us into the war at length because our national rights had been grossly and repeatedly assailed by Germany's submarine warfare.

Nor is it easy to justify his account of the nature of what was put into the war by the spirit of our soldiers and sailors. "A great moral force," he says, "had flung itself into the struggle. The fine physical force of these spirited men spoke of something more than bodily vigor. They carried the great ideals of a free people at their hearts and with that vision were unconquerable." There was unquestionably this fine spirit in our men; but it was not a spirit that belonged to an ethereal region unknown to others. The implication that the French and British lacked our "vision" or ideality will be resented by every well-informed soldier and sailor. Was it just bodily force that thrust the victorious German armies back from La Fère Champenoise? Was there lack of moral force in the thin line that barred the road to Ypres and the sea? Were those immortal Frenchmen who held at Verdun deprived of any vision of freedom that is ours? The moral superiority which Mr. Wilson ascribes to our fighting troops will be painful to really reflecting soldiers and sailors. For them it is honor enough to share a moral and military equality with their French and British mates.

Considered in the light of his own record and of facts, all these theories of our campaign as a crusade and our nation as a chosen people are so many sublime afterthoughts. We may wish to make them real retrospectively. That is precisely the issue before the nation. It is far too important an issue to be prejudged along lines of sentimentalism, and misrepresentation of our actual war and pre-war record.

STRIKES and food riots have run through Italy, breaking out not merely in such classic centres of agitation as Rome, Florence, Milan, Brescia, Naples, and Palermo, but also in such tranquil municipalities as Padua, Vicenza, Parma, and Perugia. In the Genoese region, Calabria, and Sicily the picture is the same. As yet there is no indication of organized revolution, though in Florence a workmen's committee transiently assumed control. The immediate cause of the disorders is high prices and poverty—urgent distress accentuated by the thwarting of political hopes aroused by the victory. The usual thing has happened. There has been wholesale looting, tempered by commandeering of stocks, arbitrary lowering of prices, and punishment of profiteering by royal decree. The sacking has been indiscriminate. Especial sufferers have been the admirable coöperative stores. The rather obvious remedies that have been applied are of a sort that can not soon be readministered. It is easy to make a merchant in terror of complete spoliation sell his stock at a loss, but it is difficult to compel him to restock for future sales at a loss. What the Nitti Government is gaining is merely a breathing spell. Short of food control by the nation for a considerable period, it is hard to see a way out. It should be recalled also that Italy suffers not merely from hunger but from disappointed hopes and moral isolation, for which the Versailles Conference and Mr. Wilson are largely responsible.

WHEN the New York City police forbade the meeting that was to be held in Carnegie Hall on July 4 under the auspices of anti-Bolshevik Russian societies, it was generally surmised that there was at least the justification of some special information actuating the police and unknown to the public. It is no longer possible to suppose that even this excuse existed. Governor Smith's answer to General Dobrjanski's dignified and proper letter of protest does not enter into the question, being merely a disclaimer of jurisdiction; but presumably the letter would have been made the occasion of an explanation from some quarter, had an explanation been possible. That a perfectly legitimate meeting should have been choked off, not because of any suspicion whatsoever as to the character of the meeting or the purposes of its promoters, but solely because of fear that lawless people opposed to the meeting might make trouble, is humiliating to the last degree. Surely Americans have not reached the point where they are afraid to meet for a lawful purpose because of the harm that may come to them from persons unknown who are hostile to that purpose. Whether Bolshevik plotters would have attempted a bomb outrage if the meeting had been held, nobody can say; but nothing is more certain than that such an attempt, whether successful or not in its murderous design, would have aroused public resentment so fierce as to put an end for a considerable period to all further danger from Bolshevik propaganda in this country.

IN the multitude of comments on the prohibition question the remarks made by Professor Giddings in an address at the Church of the Ascension in New York stand out as of unusual interest. Strongly as he is opposed to the prohibition amendment, he declares his conviction that if it "had been offered to the people of the United States for a popular vote they would have voted for its adoption." While many signs point the other way, it is by no means impossible that Professor Giddings is right in his opinion. The amazingly skilful campaign—to use no harsher designation—of the Anti-Saloon League is without question primarily responsible for the putting through of the amendment with a rapidity which has astonished its advocates as well as its opponents. But something more is necessary to account for a phenomenon which even a few years ago would have been pronounced utterly impossible. That something else is the decline, among apparently all classes of the population, of that regard for the idea of liberty which a decade or two ago we thought to be almost universal.

What Professor Giddings says of this is that "a certain degree of fanaticism and bigotry has prevailed in this country in respect to all questions that touch upon liberty." But evidently what he has in mind is not only the positive factor of "fanaticism and bigotry," but quite as much the negative factor of indifference to the ideal of liberty in itself. When any good end is proposed, the question of whether its attainment involves a fresh intrusion upon the domain of liberty, a question which in former times would at once have been in the forefront of all men's minds, is in these days raised but feebly, if at all. The erecting of democracy into the position of not merely one essential, but the be-all and end-all of national life, has shoved the idea of liberty almost completely into the background. The time may come when a juster balance will be restored, but for the present there is little indication of any limit to the existing tendency. How great a departure this tendency is from the original spirit of our institutions, Professor Giddings reminds us:

How can we protect liberty against majority? Is there no way in which we can say to the majority: "Thus far shalt thou go and no further"? The Constitution of the United States and the Supreme Court were created by the founders of this Republic as an attempt to do precisely that thing—as an attempt to say to the majorities: "You may do some things, but there are some things that you shall not do."

Familiar as all this was to Americans a short time ago, we fear that to many to-day it will be an intellectual novelty.

THE President did a courageous act as well as a public service in vetoing the Agricultural appropriation bill on account of its rider repealing the daylight-saving law. That rider was peculiarly unjustifiable because the repeal would not come into practical effect until next Spring, so that there was ample time to have it considered upon its merits in a separate bill. Any delay that might have resulted in making the appropriations available would have been chargeable wholly to Congress, but Mr. Wilson was of course quite aware that he would have been made to bear much of the blame for it, as well as the ill-will of those farmers who are opposed to the daylight-saving plan. If that plan is to be abandoned, the country has a right to demand that it be done by a straight vote of Congress and not by a provision smuggled into an appropriation bill.

ALIFE hard to match in its many-sided beneficence, in its devotion to high principles of thought and action, and in the love and admiration which have been accorded to it by the elect and the multitude alike, was that of Dr. Abraham Jacobi. His astonishing vigor and activity in extreme old age was only the last phase of a life almost as remarkable in its early beginnings as in the professional eminence and extraordinary usefulness which marked his medical career. He made signal contributions to medical progress both in the way of scientific research and of the improvement of medical education and the advancement of professional standards; yet he was not less notable for the numberless acts of kindness which marked his sixty-five years of active medical practice. And he was as fine an example of the sturdy citizen and lover of liberty as he was of the medical scientist and the humane physician. His association with Carl Schurz in connection with the German revolutionary movement of 1848 was the beginning of a friendship as loyal as any that history or legend celebrates; and nothing was more beautiful than to hear the doctor speak of the statesman and publicist in accents almost of veneration. Many a time, during the dark days of 1914-17, must all who knew of the bond between these men have thought with deep regret of the loss which our fellow citizens of German origin suffered in not having the voice of Schurz to rally them—as we feel quite certain it would have done—to the side upon which Dr. Jacobi unhesitatingly planted himself, the side of freedom and right.

THE present war did not count solely on the playing-fields of Eton to furnish forth victory. It drew heavily, to be sure, on the finished product of school and college athletics, but to make assurance doubly sure it organized its own playing-fields. In a thousand camps, here and "over there," the old athlete "came back" and put himself into condition for a struggle outranking in importance any of his former contests. And there, too, the young man of brawn whose upbringing had afforded no opportunity for the refinement of both spirit and muscle that only organized athletics provides, found in life a new joy while learning to become a better soldier. It would be a pity if so valuable an instrument as the war has proved athletics to be should be allowed to fall into disuse with its close. Ample opportunity for athletics, especially among the factory population of the Eastern states, would materially have reduced the thirty per cent. of rejections in the draft. Something, too, might well be done for those to whom military training has given an enthusiastic and effective liking for athletics. Mr. Walter Camp, in a recent article in the Outlook, performed a service by pointing out what England is already doing to make possible a more general participation in athletic sports. It is a matter which we in this country might well look to. The war has taught us how to organize athletics effectively on the large scale. There is no reason why its lessons should not be wisely applied in time of peace.

WHEN Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig said that the British won the war, he evidently did not mean that they did it alone—he is far too canny for that. Yet in his inmost heart Haig, being a Scotchman, doubtless thinks that that the Scotch did it, and upon occasion he would freely say so. "God gie us a guid conceit o'oursels," is the Scotchman's morning and evening prayer, and he tries to live up to it. Self-confidence such as this is a great source of strength to any people. Certainly, the British, including the aforesaid Scotch, the English, the Welsh and the Irish, together with their kinsmen from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, and other parts of the Empire, did great work by land, on sea, and in the air. The old "contemptibles" who struck in at Mons late in August, 1914, made possible the victory of the Marne, and from that time on the bulldog did not relax his hold on the dachshund's throat until the latter animal turned over on his back, beaten. But fortunately we can all say that we won the war, because the war could not have been won without us. Belgium's matchless daring delayed the invading hosts for three weeks and made possible all the defense that followed. Russia has the glory of helping to save Paris by effecting a diversion in East Prussia. Serbia's brave struggle, at the beginning, kept the armies of Austria away from the western front. Italy's timely aid saved the situation at least twice. If the United States had not come in at the eleventh hour the war would have been at the best a draw—and therefore a victory for Germany. There is glory enough for all, and it ill becomes any one of the Allies to depreciate the work of any other.

President and Senate

THE President's speech in New York upon his return to the country, his address to the Senate, his talk with the newspaper men, and Senator Swanson's speech in opening the great debate, leave the issue of the acceptance of the Treaty and Covenant little, if at all, changed from what it has been these many months. There was a genuine impressiveness about the President's address to the Senate that has often been lacking in previous utterances directed to the same general end; for it enforced upon the mind the gravity of the difficulties with which the Versailles Conference had to grapple, it claimed nothing like perfection for the result, and it was marred only here and there by phrases of sentimental unreality. One could not rise from a reading of it without the feeling that whoever stood in the way of the completion of the work done at Versailles was assuming a responsibility which no consideration less than that of the highest needs of our nation could cover. Beyond this, however, the address did not carry; if there were honest reasons for hesitation before, those reasons remain.

What is going to happen in the next few weeks, if one may judge by present indications, is much less the threshing out of the inherent merits either of the peace terms or of the Covenant than the feeling out of the situation. There is no doubt that substantially the whole of the Republican membership of the Senate is strongly set upon the policy of attaching reservations to ratification, and that in this stand one or two Democratic Senators concur. It is equally certain that the President desires unconditional ratification, and that he can command the unhesitating support of nearly the whole body of Democratic Senators in this programme. The undetermined question is the degree of firmness—in other words, the degree of confidence—with which the two sides will back up their position.

To our mind the best solution of the impending difficulty would be found in a sincere attempt of the two sides to get together upon some reasonable ground. The President's great weapon for the forcing of unconditional ratification is the picture that he can hold out of terrible consequences which may possibly result from prolonged delay. But this is a weapon that can be wielded by the other side also, provided it shows the necessary sagacity in its proceedings. There is no reason why men who are willing to accept the League in principle, but who sincerely dread what they regard as great potentialities of evil in some of the features of the Covenant, should be cowed by a mere bugbear. The question whether any proposed reservations hold out a genuine danger of upsetting the work done at Versailles depends on whether those reservations are of such a nature as would be at all likely to incite any of the important Powers to protest against them. The urgent task now laid upon the Republican Senate leaders is that of so formulating their proposed reservations as to make the danger of such a happening too improbable to be taken into serious account.

The greatest weakness of their position lies in their failure thus far to have arrived at such a result. With this accomplished, the whole strategy of the situation would take on a new character. It would be perfectly competent for them then to say that the path to an early settlement lies not through their unconditional surrender to the President, but through his assent to a plan which, in deference to the need of the time and not in fulfilment of their own judgment of what ought to have been done, they had framed as a reasonable and practicable solution of the problem.

It may be said at once that the complete striking out of Article X proposed in Mr. Root's recent letter does not come under this description. To reject Article X would be to arouse in the minds not only of statesmen, but of peoples, throughout the world, an instant feeling that the Covenant had been attacked in a vital part. It would be felt everywhere that the whole thing would have to be gone over again. This is over and above the comparatively technical consideration that a qualification of this kind would fall unmistakably and completely under the head of an amendment, not of an interpretation, of the Treaty. What we have to reckon with, in the extraordinary and unprecedented muddle in which the world's affairs now are, is, first of all, the reactions actually to be expected from anything we may do. Mr. Root's earlier proposal, made some months ago, that we limit our obligations under Article X to a period of five years would be clearly an amendment likewise, but it would not in its nature be fundamentally disturbing. It might or might not be overtly objected to; probably the chances are that it would not.

But a way still less open to this danger is plainly suggested by some of the President's own words in his talk with the newspaper men, and also by Senator Swanson's statements in the Senate. The ground of objection to Article X is that it may place upon this country the obligation to take part in wars which Congress or the country did not approve. The words of the Covenant do not empower the Council of the League to command such participation, but only to advise it; and Mr. Wilson and Mr. Swanson tell us that Congress would be quite free to refuse to act upon that advice. What opponents of Article X have asserted is that although on its face the action of the Council is stated in the Covenant to be advisory, the whole structure of that instrument implies that the Council's advice would carry with it the full force of a moral obligation. If Mr. Wilson feels that this is so, his statement that Congress would be free to disregard the advice is an evasion of the issue; if, on the other hand, the President means that Congress would really have this freedom, that in the exercise of its own judgment in the premises it would not be violating any obligation of honor or duty, then a reservation declaring this to be the Senate's understanding of Article X could be open to no objection, either as an amendment that alters the Treaty or as a declaration that defeats its actual purpose. Nor is it to be supposed that a reservation having this content, and worded in a way to give the least possible offense, would, if adopted by the Senate, stir up any of the Allied Powers to make trouble over it. It must be remembered, after all, that if we in America have reason to wish the settlement promptly established lest dreadful consequences ensue in Europe, Europe has at least as much reason to be chary of making difficulties about our coöperation.

The other two reservations proposed by Mr. Root—those relating to the power of withdrawal and to our position on the Monroe doctrine and on questions which we regard as purely domestic—require no further comment at this time. It seems clear that if the Republican leaders embody these and a careful and conciliatory treatment of Article X in a well-drawn resolution—if they do this and eschew all extreme proposals and all displays of mere irritation or obstreperousness—they will place themselves in a position to test out, with considerable prospect of success, both the feeling of the country and of the Senate.

They ought to do this without a moment's delay. Even so, the President may elect to go to the country with a flaming appeal for the acceptance of the Versailles document just as it stands. It is possible, too, that in a whirlwind campaign he may succeed in bringing out a sentiment in its favor so strong as to sweep everything before it. But this is by no means certain. Once, twice, thrice, he may rest his case solely on generalities; but in the end he would have to come to grapples with the specific issue between him and the critics of the Covenant. The one thing needful is that the issue be defined. The President has the immeasurable advantage at present that his side of the issue is perfectly defined already. To make good against it a position which consists only of a miscellaneous lot of inharmonious objections would be manifestly a hopeless undertaking.

Production, Distribution, Happiness

IT was by accident, not design, that two articles, contributed to the last two numbers of the Review, dealt, from quite different points of view, with two of the vital aspects of all socialist schemes of economic distribution. Professor Lovejoy discussed the assumption, which underlies so much of the socialist agitation of our time, that "there annually accrues to society a surplus income vast almost beyond calculation, and adequate, if it were more equally divided than at present, to assure a high standard of well-being to all." That this assumption is without foundation, and that in fact an equal division of existing income would place all individuals in a stage above poverty, indeed, but not greatly above poverty, was Professor Lovejoy's conclusion from the best available data. Accordingly, the stress of his article was laid upon the importance of increased production as an indispensable basis of that radical improvement in the general well-being which many social reformers imagine can be attained by a mere change in the principles of distribution. Furthermore, if such change had the effect of lessening productivity, it might prove to have attained its goal of supposed justice in distribution only "at the cost of the general impoverishment of the community, as well as the wholesale sacrifice of other values, moral and material, which belong to the life of man."

The wholesale sacrifice of moral values to which Professor Lovejoy thus refers in passing, is presumably that which competent thinkers in general apprehend as the consequence to be expected from an abandonment of that individual responsibility which, along with individual liberty, is of the very essence of the régime of competition. Upon the nature of that sacrifice, the article on Hungary's experience under communism, by "Examiner," a writer having exceptional acquaintance with the facts, throws most interesting light. What thoughtful men have inferred from the characteristics of human nature, the Hungarian experiment shows to have actually taken place. That the experiment is not conclusive, we cheerfully admit; it may have to be tried many times, and under many varieties both of external circumstance and of human agency, before anything like a trustworthy verdict can be passed upon it. But in one essential particular the Hungarian experience goes a long way towards being convincing. "Examiner" tells us that the vast majority of the people of Hungary hate the communist Government, not because it has failed to give them the material comforts that they expected, but because it has reduced their lives to a mechanical routine. Towards the paternalism that has "removed from them all causes of worry" they are not grateful, but resentful. Hours of labor have been shortened, but the worker "finds himself more than ever a little piece of machinery and nothing more, unable to complain, unable to change his trade or even the factory in which he works, . . . with no privacy, no rights of his own."

In the Hungarian experiment this moral loss, this loss of individuality, has not been accompanied by material gain; as in Professor Lovejoy's supposititious case, so in this real case, the casting down of the rich and well-to-do has resulted not in betterment for the masses, but in the general impoverishment of the community, as well as in the wholesale sacrifice of moral values essential to the life of man. On the side of productivity, it would undoubtedly be possible to do much better than has been done in Hungary. With sufficient skill and energy, with sufficient purpose and intelligence, on the part of a socialist or communist Government, people could be got, in one way or another, to do fairly well in the matter of the mere quantity of production. But the other difficulty we believe is insuperable. You may adopt this device and that, but you can't fool people into feeling that they are free when they are not; still less can you give them the sense of having fought their way through the world when they have been labeled and docketed and supervised and graded by a paternal government, however benevolent. Instead of the crudities of the Bela Kun régime there may be introduced the utmost refinements that socialist theory can devise; yet the one thing needful will be lacking—the possibility of escaping from the machinery.

It may be answered that for the vast majority of men there is under the existing order little chance of escape from a pre-ordained fate. Little enough, perhaps, when coldly and practically examined; but between that little and none there is all the difference between life and death. When we say we have to submit, we really mean only that if we don't submit we shall be worse off; hardly anybody is so situated that it is literally and absolutely impossible for him to kick over the traces. He may feel that as a practical matter it is out of the question for him to change; but yet he has always the consciousness that it is he himself who decides that it is out of the question. And it is nobody's business but his own. He is not publicly labeled a failure because he earns twenty dollars a week instead of forty; he may ascribe his condition to outrageous fortune, to spite, to injustice, or even to his own indifference. And in any case—if we except the actual derelicts of society—there is the consciousness that one has kept his head above water, that he has maintained himself without being beholden to anyone's grace. It is the absence of the sense of struggle, as well as the absence of the feeling of liberty, that makes the fatal flaw in any socialist régime.

You may make such a régime very pretty, but you can't make it virile. How essential it is that the system be made interesting, attractive, stimulating, and not merely economically productive, Fourier a hundred years ago knew so well that it is somewhat surprising how little thought is given to that vital requirement by the socialists of to-day. But perhaps they recognize that, ingenious and in some respects profound as was Fourier's scheme, its artificial perfections provided after all no real equivalent for the natural realities of human striving and struggle. Happiness can not be handed to men on a silver salver—at least not if the salver is for everybody. It was not in pursuance of any theory, but in obedience to one of the deepest of human instincts, that the young women for whom A. T. Stewart built that futile home on Park Avenue would have nothing to do with his perfect arrangements, or that the workmen at Pullman found that model town more unendurable than the most squalid city quarter. Vicissitude, individual variation, the possibility of faring worse quite as much as of faring better—all this is necessary to the savor of life. When we leave "the warm precincts of the cheerful day," it is at "this pleasing anxious being," not this pleasing care-free being, that we "cast one longing, ling'ring look behind."

More Secret Treaties

WITH the publication of the Anglo-French agreement concerning Palestine and Mesopotamia we probably have the last of the famous secret treaties. Like its fellows, it does not correspond minutely to the principles of the Covenant of Nations, but it does, like most of these too much decried treaties, meet the emergency in view of which it was drawn with a reasonable measure of justice and common sense. This will appear as its terms are analyzed.

The agreement was confirmed on May 16, 1916. Its object was to dispose of the German claims connected with the Bagdad Railway, while considering the new fact caused by the Arab revolt against Turkey, the Hedjaz Movement. The practical issue was to bring some sort of order into regions where Turkish sovereignty was vanishing, and to control the terminus of the German corridor to the East. As underlying principle, France and England agreed to work for an independent Arab State. The territory was to be divided into an A (French) zone comprising most of Mesopotamia with the potentially rich valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris, and a B (British) zone running from the lower Palestinian coast to the British protectorate at the head of the Persian Gulf. The Palestinian ports of Acre and Haifa were to serve respectively France and England. The French sphere of influence finds its Mediterranean outlet at the port of Aleppo, Alexandretta, and thence southwards covers the coast to about the Lebanon region. Thus France falls heir to the Bagdad railway.

The jurisdiction of France and England was necessarily left vague. Each had commercial priority in its own zone, each agreed to respect existing concessions of the other. England agreed to build a railway from Haifa to Mesopotamia, connecting with Bagdad, reserving the right to move troops by this railroad at all times. France promised to furnish a stipulated amount of water from the great rivers to the parched Syrian regions in the British sphere of influence. Each nation agreed to put its railroad facilities equally at the disposition of the other, and not to alienate its zone without the other's consent to any power save the independent Arab state. To safeguard the sea approaches, England engaged not to cede Cyprus without the consent of France.

In minor details the treaty respected the existing order of things, doing nothing to dislocate present trade relations. The Turkish tariffs were to stand for twenty years, the revenues going to the zone for which the goods were billed. The whole territorial agreement was to be submitted to Russia for approval.

Meanwhile Russia collapsed. Summing up the matter, there was to be an Arab state divided into a French protectorate and a British. The French zone bordered on the Russian sphere of influence and was commercially the more promising. The British zone was strategically important as checking Germany and protecting the approaches to the Suez Canal. It covered regions to which it has been long known England would admit no unfriendly power. Finally the immediate capital-charges involved in the treaty were mostly assumed by England. As regards commercial concessions, England and France claimed priority in their own zones; as regards general trade by other nations, the situation was to remain unchanged.

We have perhaps tediously analyzed the treaty, because it has been represented as a peculiarly iniquitous and imperialistic one. We wish our readers to be in a position to judge for themselves. Unless one is prepared to maintain that the Palestine-Mesopotamia question would settle itself without European intervention, one is in poor case in condemning the treaty. What are the alternatives to an Anglo-French protectorate? What nations are likely to do better in the premises than these two powers who for years have dealt successfully with Moslem dependencies? The only thing lacking to make the treaty valid under the new Covenant of Nations is the consent of the protected tribes. We have no doubt that the arrangement actually is acceptable to the Arab tribes involved and that their consent could readily be obtained. In short the framers of the treaty, envisaging as they did expressly the future sovereignty of the Arab State, and avoiding the pitfall of joint control, showed an extraordinary prevision of the spirit of the League of Nations. We feel confident that the League can but confirm in essentials the treaty of May, 1916.

Subsequently the agreement was marred by the admission of Italian claims in Asia Minor—especially in Smyrna and Adalia. This was unquestionably a mistake, for it put a Greek population capable of self-rule under alien control. It was, however, a natural error, for Greece, the natural reversionary of these regions, was at the moment virtually hostile to the Entente, while the temptation was strong to give Italy such inducements as she might wish for her military support. Only unreasonable theorists will imagine that in the agony of a world war military considerations will not occasionally becloud political decisions. Perhaps the negotiators of nations fighting for life ought to maintain the intellectual detachment of a Norman Angell, or the high serenity of an Oswald Garrison Villard. As a matter of fact they do not. As for the Italian pretensions in Asia Minor, Italy herself has shown the moderation and sense not to insist on them. Thus the error has already largely been righted. If Italy should wish to trade on these concessions, it need surprise only those who believe that human nature has just now been radically reconstructed at Versailles.

A vast amount of nonsense has been written about the secret treaties contracted during the war. These agreements have been represented as the malign or stupid work of diplomats sunk in that nether depth of political murkiness, the old order. The publication of the treaties reveals a truth at once more prosaic and more convincing. We see the honest effort of puzzled and wearied men of affairs trying to keep up with the whirling changes incident to the war, here making a plan to meet an emergency, here temporizing, always seeking in stress and confusion something like order and justice, making their mistakes and rectifying them as they can, meeting the need of the moment in some sense that may tend to future peace—such is the human background of the despised secret treaties. They have their defects, but by and large they do credit to the old-style diplomacy that framed them. To have the prophetic gift to discern peace covenants months and years before they are drawn, to preserve entire wisdom and serenity while a world is rocking with war, is too difficult a poise for mere diplomats to maintain. It comes easier to doctrinaire apostles of peace and to editors of journals endowed beyond human hazards.

The Ocean Flights

IN the portent of three transatlantic flights within eight weeks that tenacious thinker, the late Henry Adams, would have found welcome evidence of his favorite theory of acceleration. Successively a flying boat of our Navy, a British Army bombing plane, and a British Army dirigible have flown from shore to shore. All three flights were made in untoward conditions of weather. The hypothesis of luck has to be excluded. The air route across the Atlantic is as definitely demonstrated as was some four hundred years ago the passage round the Horn by Magellan. It is too early to forecast the practical results of these ocean flights for commerce, pleasure, or war. We prefer rather to review these achievements as a whole, and especially to point out the very different human capacities called for by the three successful flights.

On May 17, Lieut. Commander Read took NC-4 through an opportune hole in a cloud to a safe anchorage at Horta in the island of Fayal. Read had flown the 2,150 miles from Trepassey, Newfoundland, in twenty-six hours and twelve minutes. His flight was made possible through the most elaborate preparations. Every fifty miles a destroyer marked the way. The navigational preparation, however, especially the wireless direction finders, failed to work. That NC-4 won through where her flying mate NC-1 perished, while NC-3 limped in disabled to Punta del Garda, was due, as such successes usually are, to a combination of good luck and good management. Read flew the truest course of the three, he showed judgment in running away from his bad weather faster than his fellows did. The clouds opened for him and did not for them. Being in the best position to profit by any incidental luck, he had it, and in fullest measure deserved it. He has modestly said: "The voyage of the NC-4 was very monotonous on the whole. It's a fact that I believe the science of aviation will benefit more from the experiences of the men in the NC-1 and NC-3."

To one who knows the sea the extraordinary adventure in the Navy flight was not the successful hop of NC-4, but Commander Towers's feat in bringing the crippled NC-3 through the storm-tossed billows running between Corvo and San Miguel. He says: "We learned after a fashion to sail the big seaplane. That is, we turned it stern foremost to the waves, and by manipulating the controls got the wings and rudders to act as sails. We got pretty good at this after twelve or fifteen hours of it." All this in fifty knots of wind with a hull a shade stronger than that of the ordinary cedar canoe. We can not imagine a more hazardous feat of seamanship more gallantly accomplished.

The NC flights, while they brought undying glory to the adventurers, practically tested only matériel. The newer navigational methods either failed or were not employed. The success was won under conditions which could not be generally reproduced. Lieut. Commander Read's personal triumph rested on that sort of knack and adroitness which consummate pilotage requires. It had been proved that both above and on the water the flying boats had unexpected endurance. Not much more than that was won from the experiment.

When in the early morning of June 15, Capt. John Alcock and Lieut. Arthur Whitten Brown of the British Royal Air Force landed their Vickers-Vimy biplane in an Irish bog near Clifden, they had completed the most sensational of all the ocean crossings. They had flown the 1,960 miles from Newfoundland in sixteen hours and twelve minutes, through storm, wind, and scud, and by an extraordinary effort of pure pilotage they hit their mark exactly. Unlike Hawker, who, in a spirit of pure deviltry, stimulated by great money rewards, attempted the flight in a single engined plane and with slight navigational resources, Alcock and Brown had powerful wireless and disposed of two engines. But the wireless broke down in the first few minutes, the heavens were covered, the flight was made by dead reckoning. Nothing favored the intrepid pair of aviators except that the storm winds followed, veering from Southwest to Northwest, and approximately equalized the drift. To make the desired landfall under these conditions was an extraordinary feat. Yachtsmen recalling the worry of a five hours' run through fog for a lightship in an uncertain tideway may begin to appreciate Lieut. Brown's problem. The chances of his hitting within fifty miles of the aviation field at Clifden were one in a hundred, and when he saw the outer seamount, High Island, slipping westward below him, his heart must have leapt within him. If the pilots of the world want to take on a saint or a hero as patron of their hardy calling, we know no fitter candidate than Lieut. Brown.

Lieut. Commander Read's terse comment on Alcock and Brown's transatlantic jump was, it was "one great stunt." It is the fitting word for all the crossings, complete or partial, by heavier than air machines. What emerged was simply the unexpected toughness of the structure and mechanism of the planes themselves, and the fully expected cleverness, hardihood, and endurance of the flyers. It was clear that these passages strained human endurance to the breaking point, that they were likely to remain in the field of adventure and scientific experiment, that nothing like a regular air service across the ocean was likely to come that way. To be sure, certain critics considered the possibilities of gigantic flying boats, with cabin accommodations, and organization for proper relief of the officers and crew. What was not considered was the greatly increased danger incurred by these giant planes when on the water. Indeed about the most useful invention for a flying boat would be a device by which, on being forced down to the water, it could at need shed its wings. Almost without exception the transatlantic fliers agreed that for a regular air service we must look to the lighter than air machine, the dirigible. This view was soon justified by the most significant of all ocean crossings, that of the monster British Army dirigible R-34.

The R-34 is indisputably the finest airship in being, yet from an American point of view not quite up to date. She was sustained not by the new non-inflammable helium gas but by the tricky hydrogen, which deprived her crew of the solace of smoking. Apparently her navigator was not provided with that indispensable new instrument, the bubble sextant, which contains within itself an artificial horizon. Such conservatism was eminently British; they like a few handicaps. The airship carried in relative comfort twenty-nine officers and men, with abundant stores. She made her crossing like any seagoing liner, by dead reckoning corrected by celestial observations and by the new wireless direction finders. She first proved out on a great scale what is likely to be the navigation of the future. The direction of an incoming wireless wave may be read. At one time R-34 knew her direction lines from East Fortune, Scotland; Clifden, Ireland; St. Johns, Newfoundland; and the Azores. By simply plotting these four lines on a chart, their intersection would give an accurate fix. She followed the classic procedures of seamanship. When a storm centre was located she ran around it; she rose above or skirted local thunder storms. She covered 3,200 nautical miles in 108 hours and 12 minutes, progressing at an average speed of 29½ knots, about two knots faster than the Mauretania. She illustrated in every sense the practical seagoing superiority of the airship over the aeroplane. She could stop and drift, saving her engines and gasoline, whereas a plane must keep going. The strain on her captain, Major Scott, and on her navigator was severe; but the conditions were exceptionally adverse, and the personal wear and tear of a sort to which sailors are well accustomed. She fully demonstrated the weatherly qualities of airships and the fact that their navigation is now well understood. What remains to be dealt with in order to make airship lines regular and common is merely the problem of cost and the technical difficulties of landing and anchorage. With these latter difficulties invention should be able to cope.

The successful ocean flights will encourage flying everywhere, whether over sea or land. Upon sport, travel, and mail communication it must produce far-reaching results. Now is not the moment to play the prophet's part. Evidently life is going to be immensely speeded up. Plainly there is going to be a tremendous increase of noise. Such at least is the conviction of one who winters on the New York-Washington air-mail route, and summers on the beat of a jitney biplane. Flying for flying's sake and for war's sake has been thoroughly exemplified. Remains the serious problem of flying for good and permanent use. In any event the romantic chapter has closed, leaving undying fame to the gallant men who have made or attempted the ocean flights, and the utilitarian chapter opens. A new and great power has been placed in the hands of man. How will he use it?

Unbinding the Spellers

THE University of Wisconsin has boldly cut the Carnegian knot. By its faculty vote to grant diplomas to three young men who had failed to pass the regulation spelling test, it has established the precedent—which, as everybody knows who is acquainted with the ways of faculty legislation, means the solemn principle—of allowing students to graduate who spell neither by the reform rules nor by the rules of orthodox orthography, but by the grace of God.

The history of the seven-league stride in educational progress thus happily accomplished is, according to recent advices, somewhat as follows. A number of years ago, a senior in the College of Letters and Science having failed to meet the spelling test, a motion by a prominent member of the faculty to grant him a degree none the less was lost by only a few votes—whereupon, it may be added, the young man went off, learned to spell, and took his degree in the Summer Session. The injustice rankled, however, in the heart of the defeated parliamentarian. Not many years afterwards, a young woman, who, like the young man, was "a brilliant student in every other respect," also failed in the spelling test. The faculty attitude this time, as manifested in the discussion of the case, was noticeably less dogmatic, and the motion to graduate the young woman would probably have carried without farther persuasion; but its proposer, the professor above mentioned, removed all possible doubt by calling attention to the fact that the student in question had already been elected to membership in Phi Beta Kappa, and that it would ill become a mere university faculty to reject where an organization of so superior quality had accepted. The motion was passed with considerable enthusiasm, only the good spellers and the non-Phi Beta Kappas dissenting.

But there was room for still another stride in the march of freedom. A definite principle was lacking: not every poor speller could be expected to belong to Phi Beta Kappa. When the names of the three unorthographical young men of the class of 1919 were introduced with the familiar recital, not omitting the "very brilliant in every other respect," the doughty champion of the orthographically oppressed led his forces once more unto the breach. As these candidates were not PhBK's but were SATC's, a conscientious and really discerning but tactically mistaken professor, thinking to avoid trouble, moved that all SATC seniors who had failed in the spelling test be granted their degree. In this way, he argued, the faculty could be both faithful to the principles of their fathers and merciful to the unfortunate victims of the rule; the SATC's would all soon be graduated, and it was not likely they would occur again. This brought to his feet the paladin of emancipated spelling with an amendment to grant the diploma without regard to service in the SATC. It was noisily carried two to one; not that there were more poor spellers on the faculty than before, but that the love of freedom had grown, together with the conviction that the right not to spell was somehow bound up with the principle of democracy.

And is this all? God forbid. The friends of freedom in orthography will next year make one more drive against autocracy in spelling. They will not, as might be expected by the superficial, declare for the superior faculty of Carnegie spelling, nor yet for the Henry Holt variety. The sort of orthographical genius that writes "neckless" for "necklace," and presents three versions of "little" in one short sentence, will hardly with eyes open subject itself to the tyranny of rules that require "kist" instead of "kissed" or "kisst" or "kict," or "yu" instead of "yue" or "yew" or "yoo." Their effort will be in a different direction. We are "credibly informed" that they have already under way an elaborate array of statistics culled from the records of the registrar which will have the effect of at last giving the deficient speller his due. They will prove with these statistics that the failure of a student to satisfy the spelling requirement is unimpeachable evidence that he is "brilliant in every other respect," and that he should be graduated without question and without delay. They will place the burden of proof where it really belongs, on the shoulders of the spiritless slaves of tradition who imagine that law is a necessity and the keeping of the law a virtue. They will prove Dogberry corrupt, and emend him: "To be a well-favored man is the gift of fortune, but to read and write and spell comes by nature. . . . Well, for your favor, sir, why, give God thanks, and make no boast of it; and for your reading and writing and spelling, let that appear when there is no need of such vanity."

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION

140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

“Little Americans”

THE term has been coined and has begun to pass current. What does it mean and what will be its value in the campaign now gathering force for the great decision?

To be a little American is to oppose unreserved acceptance of the League of Nations. The reasoning has become familiar. As the isolation of this country is now a thing of the past and we must look forward to playing a responsible part in world politics, especially in helping to maintain peace, therefore—with such broad premises various conclusions might follow that “therefore.” Yet let the “big American” do the reasoning: therefore we must agree explicitly to all the clauses of the Covenant. Is it not curious that many who now boldly preach this doctrine are the very ones that helped to make our entrance into the war long overdue? The issue was as clear cut as any issue is likely to be in the future, yet they hesitated until the mere mechanics of international relations forced us in. As the saying is, they were “all right after we got into the war.” Most of the so-called “little Americans” devoutly wished that the United States might take up arms nearly two years before the President gave the word. Though no binding agreement existed, they felt that decency and devotion to the best principles of civilization required us to throw in our lot with those Powers which had chosen to risk all rather than submit to the dictates of a despot.

Can it be that those who proudly label themselves big Americans have become big so quickly that their growth is of the mushroom variety? This is not a cheap fling at them. It brings up a consideration which goes to the heart of the matter and which must give pause to many a man who otherwise might not be averse to the proposed plan of the League. The real question is this: To what extent are the advocates of the League convinced of its regulative power and to what extent have they fallen under a spell as soft votaries of a perfectionist? In their half-formed conceptions of the new order to be ushered in by the League there are much the same aspirations which visionary pacifists have cherished these many years. By organization, the latter have argued, the rivalries of nationalities, even the feeling for nationality, can be wiped out and the world transformed into a Christian brotherhood. Organization—that was ever their cry. It would not be strange if pacifists should now claim the credit for the great reliance placed by the “big American” upon organization as a cure-all.

In a previous paper I attempted to show that debate on the League has not been characterized by reasoning that reaches home—on the one side an array of theoretical cases designed to show the embarrassing positions in which this country might find itself as an unqualified member of the League; on the other the repeated assertion that America's defection would spoil a glorious plan to compose differences without bloodshed or ill-feeling. Admitting that our presence in the League may indeed be needed for the first few years, one is bound, in any just consideration of the permanent value of the League, to reason from the known character of the American people. Will it be to our moral advantage to have much of our thinking done for us by a world council? Shall we as a people retain our passion for fair play if, in the presence of altercations abroad, we are practically forbidden to lend our moral support as conscience dictates? Can a nation with such a proud past, even if it would, silence its sympathies? Let it be remembered that the President's admonition to be neutral in our thoughts made, not for neutrality of thought, but for the unloosing of violent partisanship. For it encouraged pro-Germans to trot out technicalities and allegations which would have appeared ridiculous if the issue had not been officially put in question, and it forced their opponents into equally silly positions.

One can not believe that even the “big Americans,” with all their high hopes for the League, would cease exercising their sympathies as international disputes came up for adjustment. They would start, no doubt, by relying upon the sweet reason of the League's representatives. They would trust that this body would not put reason through such capers as those devised by that other representative body, the United States Senate. Yet even when reason is made to function properly one has to admit that there are certain questions which do in truth require other resources than reason. After reason has failed, man is left with convictions which transcend reason and are compact of various subtle elements, from his home training on, which make him what he is. And it might well happen that the best sentiment of the American people would strongly dissent from the decisions of the League. Ah, but America would have its representative. Well, America's representative at Paris, just returned, acquiesced in an agreement concerning Shantung which has made his fellow-countrymen blush with shame and has subjected China to a crushing disillusion. (Must we break the heart of such a vast nation in order to keep the “world's heart” intact?)

The country is still rumbling with the injustice done to China, and we may be sure that there would be numerous occasions in the future on which we as a people should feel humiliated to obey the mandates of the League. If so, would we not resort to technicalities so as to release ourselves from the action we were called upon to take? This, in my judgment, is the most dangerous possibility of the League idea. From a nation which has habitually experienced strong moral reactions, we might tend more and more to look to the small points of law for our warrant. At the outset these would be used in the interest of our solidest convictions; later, as the habit grew, they would not do us credit. The experience along these lines during our overdone neutrality prior to 1917 makes the assumption in no sense ridiculous.

“Little Americans,” “big Americans”—how foolish the distinction! The difference lies not in the calibre of the mind so much as in the quality. For there is beyond question in both camps an earnest desire to see the whole world put in as decent order as may be. The “big American” has a mind which yields easily to the glowing picture of vast political machinery, of civilization organized. He has the trusting nature which can hardly imagine that out of all the discussion which has been going on at Paris there should not come a sovereign remedy for the world. “Big American” has the superior manner which becomes the fanatic. He has seen the light of happiness about to dawn for small nations, and if you can not see it too, why, perhaps you will by and by. Let him, however, beware of this feeling of moral superiority. Pacifists have already exhibited it overmuch. Finally, “big American” has the sort of mind for which the language of lofty exhortation may pass as solid argument.

“Little American” has a tougher mind—some would call it cantankerous. Perhaps it is, in fact, a heritage from the traditional Yankee. He has more faith in the conception of original sin than in that of man's perfectibility. He wishes to make the whole world happy if it can be done, but he is determined that his own country shall not be sacrificed for an experiment. He hears the House of Commons greet a serious mention of the League with a derisive shout, and knows by other testimony that Europe views the proposed organization somewhat cynically. Is he to blame if he imagines that there may be danger ahead for his country? In some respects his moral sense is more highly developed than that of “big American.” Thus he fears that the League might conceivably prevent us from giving comfort and support to peoples in distress quite as much as he fears that we may be drawn into an imbroglio which legitimately should be none of our affair. While devoutly hoping that the better feeling which has come into the world through the war may be perpetuated, he looks to practical realities and not to short-cuts.

These are the two types of mind which

The Non-Partisan League

IF the activities of the Non-Partisan League in North Dakota were merely an experiment in state socialism worked out on a large scale, those who disbelieved in its theories might perhaps stand by complacently to see it "run its course" as a necessary and inevitable demonstration of its futility, even though, meantime, it was disastrous to all business interests as well as to the misguided victims of the socialist propaganda. But it must be recognized as the personal adventure of an unscrupulous man with a more than shady past, who has gathered into his own hand almost absolute power over the political and property rights of one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and who will use his control of that State to promote and extend his political power in adjoining States and throughout the entire country—most of all perhaps at the National Capitol.

A. C. Townley is a political boss without an equal in the history of the United States. His power is comparable to that of Nicholas Lenin, with the difference that he has no Trotsky to share the throne. Nearly every member of the State's Government from Governor Frazier down is of his designation and takes orders from him. More than two-thirds of the members of both houses of the Legislature have been elected by the Townley machine and are pledged to carry out the will of a "caucus" which received its instructions direct from the head office in St. Paul, or from Townley in person and on the spot. It would not be proper to say that many of the courts in North Dakota are manned by Townley's creatures, but the Justices of the Supreme Court elected on the Townley ticket show great alacrity in interpreting the law as the needs of the machine may require. Indeed, Chief Justice Robinson declared from the bench that he had made a pre-election promise to overrule the decision in State ex rel. vs. Hall, and that he would not have been elected if he had not done so.*

There can be no question that the Government represents the present wishes of the majority of the people of North Dakota, but how was this extraordinary power obtained? How were they persuaded to put themselves into are now attempting, in debates formal and informal throughout the country, to come to grips, hoping that a good American campaign of education will at length enable the country to reach a right decision.

H. de W. F.

the hands of a man of Townley's character "without recourse"? Why did they supply the two million dollars or more that enabled him to carry through his successful campaign? It is an extraordinary tale of political and financial "green goods" operations. Admitting that the farmers had grievances against the business men, as all people may have against those with whom they do business, those grievances have been made the basis of an extravagant campaign of vilification and misrepresentation designed to arouse the bitterest class hatred. This campaign has been conducted by an organization of smooth-tongued agitators of the soap-box variety. By denunciations, and warnings against the "kept press," Townley has managed to close the ears of the farmers to every voice but his own. Now he has secured a "strangle hold" on the members of his league by creating a "kept press" of his own which embraces a very large proportion of the country newspapers throughout the State. Strange that all this power should be in the hands of a man whose actual residence is in Minnesota and who is not even a taxpayer in North Dakota. Indeed, the Federal Court formally pronounced him a bankrupt, in December, 1918, with less than $1,000 assets against listed liabilities of $70,000. This bankrupt now has control of all the property, all the wealth, and all the business interests in the State.

Although Townley speakers and writers have been almost exclusively drawn from the ranks of professed socialists, he has until recently denied that his movement was socialistic, since the farmers themselves have little use for socialism. Now that he has fixed his hold on the Government he has thrown off the mask. The Hearst paper in Chicago in an article dated Bismarck, February 1, says:

The Non-Partisan League no longer denies that its programme is socialistic. In fact, it rather glories in the term once applied in reproof. Members insist that socialism means merely the rule of the people, by the people.

The Legislative programme was described as follows in an article in the Chicago Herald and Examiner:

They have imposed on Governor Frazier more power than ever before has been held by a state executive. As chairman of the Industrial Commission, he will be head of North Dakota's greatest bank. He also will be head of America's greatest state-owned distributing agency, the greatest elevator and flour mill system outside the Twin Cities, and of the Home Building Association, which expects within a few years to have millions of dollars in assets. He also has absolute veto power. The Industrial Commission has wide powers of its own without specific legislative authority. The Constitution has been amended to enable the state to engage in any business not prohibited a private individual.

This programme was carried through during the session of 1919 with neatness and precision. Every Non-Partisan member of the House or Senate had been bound by a pre-election pledge to abide strictly by the will of the majority in caucus, and the new legislation was determined in caucus meeting, held between 8 P.M. and midnight. All important bills were introduced from the caucus, and no amendment—not even correction of typographical errors—was permitted on the floor of the House or through Legislative Committees.

The foundation of the Townley system is the Industrial Commission. This powerful body is composed of three members, the Governor, the Attorney General, and the Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor. The right of the Industrial Commission to engage in any business not prohibited to a private individual is accompanied with the right "to determine the location of such utilities, enterprises and industries"; "to acquire by purchase, lease or by exercise of the right of eminent domain all necessary properties and property rights"; and "generally to use the same so as to promote such utilities, enterprises and industries"; "to fix the buying price of things bought and the selling price of things sold, incidental to the said utilities, enterprises and industries"; "to make rules, regulations and by-laws"; "to procure the necessary funds by negotiating the bonds of the State of North Dakota"; "to conduct investigations of all matters directly or indirectly connected with or bearing upon the success of any of the utilities, enterprises or industries under such management and of all matters which may directly or indirectly affect the manufacturing, preparing, or marketing of any of the products or by-products thereof." The banking and grain businesses have been brought within the scope of Townley's operations and a "home building" plan has been developed "whereby every city worker will be placed in a $5,000 home and every farm hand on a $10,000 farm, if he so wishes," presumably by a liberal exercise of the right of eminent domain.

All these enterprises are to be supported by discriminatory taxation, an extensive issue of State Bonds, and the possible manipulation of funds in the State Bank—a system of confiscation and financial inbreeding which will make the State independent of outside capital and lift it to prosperity by its own boot straps.

*See State v. Hall, 171 Northwestern Reporter, p. 234.

The launching of all these schemes involves a tax levy of over $6,000,000 for the coming year—or $12,000,000 for the biennium—which is three times the levy of the preceding year. Most of the taxes, of course, will fall on people who do not belong to the Townley league—that is to say, the money will be paid by one set of people and spent by another. When to this amount is added some $2,000,000 from special revenues and fines, $17,000,000 to be raised by the sale of State Bonds, the estimated $40,000,000 legal reserves of State banks to be placed in the People's Bank of North Dakota, and the School and Institution Fund of some $60,000,000, we have the enormous total of $131,000,000 at the disposal of Mr. Townley and his fellow-adventurers.

The perpetuity of the political machine is assured in several ways. There will be thousands of comfortable jobs at the disposal of the Government; not only the usual public offices, but the employees of the Bank, the Home Building Associations, the Elevator Company, and all the other State enterprises. This will assure political solidarity among all the beneficiaries of the State. Control over elective offices is effected by the power vested in the Governor to remove from office "any County Commissioner, Clerk of the District Court, County Judge, Sheriff, Coroner and County Auditor, Register of Deeds, State's Attorney, County Treasurer, Superintendent of Schools, County Surveyor, City Commissioner, City Treasurer, City Auditor, Mayor, Chief of Police, Police Magistrate, Deputy Sheriff, or other public officer, or any custodian of public moneys, except the State Treasurer."

The legislative provisions for the Townley propaganda are very complete. In each county a League newspaper designated by the State Printing Commission is to be put on the payroll, and it is estimated that this will put some two hundred independent country newspapers out of business. The League workers are to be State employees and their salaries and hotel expenses will be paid by the State. Most minous are the provisions for control of education. A State Board of Administration will supersede the State Board of Regents (the present Board of Education) and will have complete control of the public school system, nullifying in practice the office of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction—the one State office which was carried by the opposition in the autumn election. The State will print and publish its own school texts. Instruction in socialism is thus assured from the kindergarten to the university.

When the significance of the portentous laws enacted by the Legislative machine dawned on the public consciousness, a movement was instituted to have them submitted to a referendum of the voters. In the face of the strenuous opposition of the Administration a sufficient number of petitions was obtained, calling for a referendum on seven of the principal laws, i. e., those relating to the Industrial Commission, the Bank of North Dakota, State Printing (the League Newspaper bill), the Board of Education, the Tax Commission, the Commissioner of Immigration, and Judicial Redistricting. Governor Frazier set an early date for the election with the view of shortening the discussion as much as possible. The intensive two weeks' campaign was made more bitter by the active participation of six of the State officials elected on the Townley ticket who had revolted against the Townley autocracy. Attorney General Langer (who will be one of the members of the Industrial Commission), State Auditor Kositsky, Secretary of State Hall, State Treasurer Olsen, Tax Commissioner Packard, and others fearlessly exposed the personal crookedness of the League managers and emphasized the dangers of turning over the resources of the State to them. But the entire force of the Townley organization was brought into action. Townley himself took the stump to vituperate the "renegades" who were opposing the laws. He continued his speaking campaign till the eve of the election, disregarding an engagement with the judge in Jackson, Minnesota, where later (July 12) he was convicted of conspiracy under the State Sedition Law.

The referendum vote on June 26 resulted in the confirmation and approval of all seven of the laws, which will, therefore, go into effect during the present month; albeit the League majorities were much reduced from the election returns of last November. Thus the farmers, after hearing both sides, approved the programme. The Voice of the People confirmed the Voice of the Machine.

The people of North Dakota, of course, have a right to do as they please, and if the constitutional rights of a minority are violated they can secure protection from the Federal courts. What concerns the people of other States is, not the experimental temper of North Dakota, but the national ambition of the man who is the temporary master of the State and the genius of the Non-Partisan League. The power which Lenin has obtained in Russia by violence and revolution has been obtained by Townley through political means, but the actions of both men seem to be based on the same theory—the taking of property from one set of people to give it to another.

It may seem extravagant to say that Townley desires to be the Lenin of America, but both words and deeds of himself and his lieutenants give color to the suggestion. An article in the Chicago News of January 14 entitled, "New Political Party Seeks Entrance Here," told of the offer of the Non-Partisan League to coöperate with the new Independent Labor Party in Illinois in a kind of political marriage for the coming municipal campaign in Chicago. This was confirmed three weeks later when Governor Frazier, on February 8, met the labor chiefs in Chicago and made plans for uniting the farmers and the city workmen for political purposes. The labor representatives approved of the idea, and action was taken looking towards a national convention of representatives of farmers and city workmen.

But the most significant part of the article in question is the report of an interview with "one of the men high in authority in the League, who is understood to be the incarnation of the League's inward spirit." The interview is well authenticated and gives a frank statement of the ultimate objects of the League:

"DEMOCRACY IS A FAILURE. There is no hope for economic redemption through any of the political expressions of democracy. We must have an entirely new system, a system based not on politics but on industry. The producers on the farm and in the shops must unite in one great political union. All party lines must be ignored. The old parties are only empty shells. This new party composed of producers will take all the machinery of government production and distribution in the interest of the people." "That would be class government," it was suggested.

"Oh, no," said he, "it would be government by the majority. There are 6,000,000 farmers and millions of workmen. These constitute the vast majority of the United States. It is the purpose of the Non-Partisan League to bring these two great bodies of workers together; then we can dictate terms to the balance of the country. OUR UNION WILL BE MODELED AFTER THE RUSSIAN SOVIETS with the elimination of the objectionable features. It will be an adaptation of the Russian idea of government, of the producers, for the producers and by the producers, to American habits of thought. It will, however, be of THE COMPLETE RUSSIAN IDEA IN AN AMERICAN FORM."

These views, radical as they are, are quite in harmony with the utterances of Townley himself, who said, at a political meeting at Stillwater, Minnesota, on February 19, this year, "The red flag has always been the emblem of the oppressed." They are in harmony with the rejection by the Legislature of a bill prohibiting syndicalism and sabotage and the use of the red flag. They are in harmony, also, with the known views of Townley's henchmen—Le Sueur, attorney for the I. W. W.; Gilbert, formerly editor of the Spokane Socialist; Walter Thomas Mills, author of books on socialism; and others of that ilk.

Townley is not yet a Bolshevik, perhaps, but he is moving rapidly in that direction. He is not a potential Lenin, much as he may desire to emulate him, for he has not half of the Russian's ability. He is a smart and capable demagogue, however, one of the dissatisfied who has rebellion in his heart, and who, for that very reason, is able to play upon the heart-strings of thousands of his fellow-men. To put it another way, he is a sailor—not a trained seaman—who has lost his bearings, who has persuaded the people of his State to break away from their moorings, and who, if long allowed to hold the wheel, will run the ship upon the rocks.

EYE-WITNESS

The Freedom of the Seas

IT is to be feared that, in spite of the appalling experiences of the past five years, we are but too often beguiled into acceptance of striking phrases and are still reluctant to look facts squarely in the face or to go behind epigrams. The term "Freedom of the Seas" is a conspicuous example. It is neither out of place or time to inquire into its true signification.

That it is a term used from the beginning of history is admirably shown in Miss Brown's little book*, which gives a résumé of the contentions of opposing parties and interests of all eras and of the various efforts to establish a code of maritime law founded on the principles of abstract justice. The earliest instances she quotes, such as the Rhodian statutes, the Consolato del Mare (that great Pisan contribution of the twelfth century), deal more with matters of ship discipline, contracts, jettisoning, etc., than with the freedom of the seas. They may fairly be classed as relating rather to admiralty than to international law, although, unquestionably, leading to a broader view of the rights of all who go down to the sea in ships.

The story of the monopolies claimed and, where possible, exercised over colonial trade, remote fisheries, and waters adjacent to a nation's shores, extending in some cases to limits that seem to us to-day wildly preposterous, is briefly told by this author. Rightly, she points out that commercial greed on the one side and commercial envy on the other were largely responsible for the wars of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, in which colonies and trade with colonies were the great prizes. It was to plead for Holland's share in the wealth of the Indies that Grotius wrote his "Mare Liberum"—not at all to open up to foreigners the advantages she already possessed. It was to urge England's sovereignty over the North Sea and elsewhere that Selden retorted with his "Mare Clausum." To understand the innumerable wars which arose from the determination of every maritime nation in Europe to keep in its own hands all traffic with or between its colonies one must cast aside notions of pure justice (pace Grotius) to find the underlying causes in sheer national selfishness coupled with ignorance of the economic falsity of the belief that one can only thrive on the losses of one's neighbors. Doubtless to these causes was added the indignation felt in Protestant countries when Popes Nicholas V and Alexander VI gave to Portugal and Spain the entire newly discovered world with exclusive navigational rights in and on the seas lying between it and Europe; yet those same Protestant countries were not moved to open up to others indiscriminately the fruits of their own victories.

The treaties that ended the struggles associated with the name of Napoleon, in which Orders in Council, Berlin and Milan Decrees vied with each other in assaults on neutral trade settled few of the cardinal points concerning shipping. (Miss Brown's review of these prohibitory measures, bringing out, as it does, the mercantile character of twenty years of hostilities, is well worth the reading.) Our own treaty with England, that of Ghent, which closed the War of 1812, is silent on the main issue, the impressing of British, or alleged British, seamen from American vessels.

The Navigation Acts, through whose operations the British sought to bar foreigners from trade with British colonies or indeed from the carrying of British goods, had for one of their objects to develop a large merchant service as auxiliary and tributary to the great navy which her insular position made absolutely essential to her independent existence. Irritating as were these and similar efforts, they gradually passed into "innocuous desuetude" and repeal, to be replaced by a policy of astounding liberality. Long prior to this War of the German Aggression, foreign shipping was admitted freely to British ports, home and colonial, on the same terms as British shipping. Great Britain moreover had borne her part, and a major one at that, in suppressing piracy in all quarters of the globe, from the Yellow Sea to the Caribbean. Incidentally, it is pleasing to remember that our own country aided vigorously and effectively in this laudable undertaking. If Germany lent a hand at any time or anywhere the fact has escaped my notice. It is her habit to reap where others have sown. Practically our cousins abroad policed all navigable waters, establishing and maintaining a freedom of the seas under whose aegis Germany was able, at no expense whatever, to create and develop the second largest merchant navy in the world. In time of peace she certainly had cause for gratitude rather than complaint.

While we also have profited by so satisfactory a state of affairs, it must not be forgotten that we have always made one important reservation in permitting no vessel flying a foreign flag to carry freight or passengers between American ports, not excepting Hawaii and the Philippines. This remote echo of the old English Navigation Acts has alone prevailed to keep the American ensign afloat. In this fact lies the complete justification of our departure from the fundamental doctrine of the "Mare Liberum;" yet it should entail upon us a certain charity of criticism.

It is only in days of war that the term "freedom of the seas" is made use of to claim for neutrals privileges or rights, as some see them, inimical to the operations of belligerents. Although the principle, "free flags, free goods," appears in a treaty of 1742 between France and Denmark, it was forty-three years later that Frederick the Great gained the reputation of champion of the freedom of the seas in the treaty of 1785 between Prussia and the United States. The former, not being a maritime power, sought transit for her wares unrestricted by the nations actually engaged in hostilities. How completely she has ignored this treaty of late needs no telling.

It should be borne in mind that international law, as it existed until Germany reduced its whole structure to ashes, was the outcome of precedents and compromises and never based on abstract justice, useful and powerful as appeals thereto might be. Conflicting interests had often to be resolved by resort to a tertium quid. It is to be hoped that the new code which must be devised after the conclusion of peace will be based more upon right than upon opportunism; but the lessons drawn from the Hun's wrecking will serve eminently as a guide in the remaking.

Returning to the original question, what exactly is the freedom of the seas? To this there is no satisfactory reply. Each interprets the phrase in his own favor or in accordance with his own point of view.

Of President Wilson's fourteen points the second ran as follows:

"Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants"; or, as summarized, "Absolute freedom of the seas in peace or war, except as closed by international action."

*THE FREEDOM OF THE SEAS. By LOUISE FARGO BROWN, New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

The enthusiastic acceptance of this point by Germany and its prompt rejection by Great Britain are too recent to be forgotten. Naturally the former heartily approved a ruling which would enable her, despite her naval inferiority, to import at will food stuffs, raw materials, and munitions without let or hindrance, even while waging war on a maritime power, and would nullify any and all attempts at blockade. She knew well enough that "international action" based on unanimity of the members of a league of nations was, to say the least, highly improbable. For her no other course was conceivable. Great Britain, on the other hand, would have nothing to do with a proposition to deprive her of her one most effective weapon, the exercise of long established belligerent rights.

These cases are both typical and illuminating. The necessities of the crisis may be expected to prevail over transcendental notions of abstract justice, however praiseworthy. It was a matter of course that Germany should take the affirmative side of the question, since therein lay her own profit as a mighty land Power. Equally might it have been foreseen that Great Britain, a mighty sea Power, would adopt the negative. It is pertinent to ask what would be the condition of civilization to-day had the German view of the freedom of the seas been in force during the last five years.

Even this country has exercised the immemorial right of visit and search during this war—most properly, I hold—nor has she refrained from reviving the ancient "law of angary," seizing and operating foreign vessels which happened to be in her ports. It would appear that, under the compelling of Mars, "la nécessité n'a point de loi." But prudence dictates caution in abandoning a procedure which has served us well until a new state of things shall have provided us with absolute and irrefragable safeguards.

No one can or does deny that the ocean, as the greatest of all channels of commerce, is unreservedly open, in time of peace, to every sailor who cares to use it for legitimate purposes, subject to the one condition that this use does not conflict with the rights of others. This common enjoyment obtains in war as well, the qualification "non-interference with the rights of others" taking shape as the obligation of strict neutrality. When A and B are at war, C must do nothing to help or harm either. Now C, as a government, may be perfectly sincere in its policy and intentions, but its subjects or citizens are not always proof against the temptation of huge profits through carrying to A or B goods declared to be contraband. Hence arises the necessity on the part of B or A to assure itself of the due observance of the rules of neutrality by exercising the right of search on vessels flying C's flag. In a life and death struggle, such as we have just seen, B or A can run no risk. Their very existence is at stake. It must fairly be admitted that the hardships inevitably imposed on C's shipping, and great they doubtless were on occasion, were reduced to a minimum by our Allies.

The slogan "free ships, free goods," when viewed in the light of recent events passes into the limbo of theories rejected because they could not meet the test of facts. One shudders in thinking of the result had this specious phrase allowed Germany to draw upon the resources of the world in furtherance of her nefarious schemes.

And there is a corollary to this cry for the freedom of the seas which is quite universally overlooked. If freedom of the seas, the great neutral zone, why not the freedom of the land, the lesser neutral zone? Let us take the case of Germany, situated in the heart of Europe. She can draw freely upon adjacent countries, not hostile to her, for whatever she needs and they can supply. The vast products and raw materials of Russia, for example, would, but for her crimes, now be at her command, and could, by her, be easily denied to her foes, of whom the principal depend upon ocean traffic for almost everything. Germany would never for a moment think of letting foreigners cross her territory for the articles with which to equip and maintain their armies when at war, yet she clamors for a freedom afloat which she would not allow on shore. A demand for the freedom of the seas might, to be logical, be coupled with an equal demand for that of the land, but the mere statement of such a proposition carries its own refutation, so that I need not labor a grotesque point. Again, when the Prussians besieged Paris, they were merely waging war according to the rules, but when the Allies blockaded Germany they were fiends in human form. It requires reasoning powers beyond those of an average man to understand this distinction.

We are irresistibly drawn by a study of our subject to the conclusion that the forthcoming code of international law, if ever such a one be compiled, will in all probability be founded upon concrete facts rather than upon ideas of abstract justice, unless some instrument more potent than written engagements, which the present chief offender among the nations has not the least intention of observing, shall have been created to secure and preserve equal rights for all. Until that be done, the freedom of the seas will remain what it is to-day, a mere phrase of little value other than an expression of the individual views of any and binding on none. Even then, we can draw comfort from the knowledge that the sea in time of peace will be free and open because the British may be depended upon to adhere to their traditions and practice of clearing it of piracy and of policing it honestly for the benefit of all. If we are not satisfied with this benevolent work, we owe it to ourselves not to cavil, but to bear our share in it loyally and manfully to the same righteous end. Such should be the spirit and attitude of all maritime peoples who in harmonious coöperation will bridge the chasm between the present day and the formation of a proper international marine police force. Can this ever come to pass or, in hoping that it may, are we merely cherishing a counsel of perfection? The reply lies in the lap of the gods.

CASPAR F. GOODRICH

Correspondence

Proper Salesmanship for W. S. S.

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your commendation of Secretary Glass's announcement "that the sales of Savings Stamps and Certificates will be indefinitely continued," etc., in your issue of June 23, is aptly phrased—"It puts the possibility of Government investment within the reach of everyone at all times." So do Smith, Jones & Company when they compound their new panacea place it within the reach of everyone at all times. The latter do not, however, stop their efforts at the "compounding and placing," nor do they rely upon the good will of the amiable physician whom they can personally cajole into prescribing their remedy.

War Savings Stamps are a first aid for the cure of impecuniousness. If they had been handled with the same business acumen and salesmanship that is a prerequisite to success for the introduction of any new and unknown product the goal set for the thirteen months succeeding their presentation to the public might have been, probably would have been, more than fifty per cent. reached. They are beyond question the best kind of small investment to beget the saving habit and particularly in those sections of the country in which savings banks are inaccessible.

I have recently taken the pains to inquire at various W. S. S. agencies which display the Government sign that they have the stamps on sale, as to the present demand for stamps. There isn't any. Interest in them seems to have ceased, and will, in my opinion, not be re-aroused, even to the rather limited extent to which it had during the war been aroused, unless the stamps are backed by salesmanship and publicity.

With all their merit and social value, can not the Treasury Department be roused to a realization that reasonable and proper methods of keeping them before the public are in order?

JESSE ISIDOR STRAUS

New York, July 8

Questionnaire or Questionary

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

There's a new-fangled game known as Questionnaire,

Such a mouth-filling word with a scholarly air,

But the form is not English, though thought debonair,

To prove it, just look in the Dictionary!

Would you write Functionary or Fonctionnaire?

Do you like Missionary or Missionnaire? Which form would you place in your Vocabulary?

Questionary's good English; 'tis time to forswear

That sesquipedalian Questionnaire.

NOTE—The great Oxford English Dictionary, edited by Dr. Murray and others, shows that Questionary was used in English as a noun as long ago as 1541, while in the London Athenaeum of September 10, 1887, it was used precisely as the French form is used here to-day ("answers to the society's questionnaire of sociology and ethnography"). The adjective use is traced back to 1715 and earlier (Burnet's History of Our Own Time), and is found in Chalmers' writings of 1838. Is it not time to go back to the anglicized form of the word?

F. L. PALMER

Stillwater, Minn., July 5

States Rights and the League

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The reservation by the United States Senate either of the Monroe Doctrine or of the United States' right to withdraw from the League might be as worthless and ineffectual as the like reservation of the alleged right of Virginia, New York, and Rhode Island to secede from the Federal Union, contained in the respective ratifications of the United States Constitution by those States, was held to be during the Civil War. By the sword of war, and later by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court, it was established that, notwithstanding express reservations in their ratifications of the Constitution of the right of those States to secede, the Federal Union was perpetual and indissoluble. Texas v. White, 7 Wallace, 700, 722, 725-6.

Virginia's ratification of the Federal Constitution does "declare and make known that the powers granted under the Constitution being derived from the People of the United States may be resumed by them whensoever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression." 2 Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States, p. 145. New York's ratification of the Federal Constitution declares "that the powers of Government may be re-assumed by the People, whensoever it shall become necessary to their happiness." 2 Documentary History, pp. 190, 191. Rhode Island's ratification declared "that the powers of Government may be re-assumed by the People, whensoever it shall become necessary to their happiness." 2 Documentary History, p. 311.

The Executive Council of the League of Nations is an autocracy like the Holy Alliance without any Supreme Court or any other council or legislative body to hold it in check. It is the sole judge of its own powers. It is a union of the executive, legislative, and judiciary merged into one body. If its decision, however erroneous, is disregarded, an international boycott, embargo, or taboo will be followed by an international war in which it is the duty of every member state to support the international war to the utmost of its strength. There is no more reason to believe that in an emergency the Monroe Doctrine would be respected because reserved, or the reserved rights to secede peacefully allowed, than in the case of Virginia, New York, and Rhode Island in 1861.

HENRY A. FORSTER

New York, July 8

Book Reviews

The League of Nations

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. By Mathias Erzberger. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

THE SOCIETY OF NATIONS. By T. J. Lawrence. New York: Oxford University Press.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE AND A LEAGUE OF PEACE. By G. B. Adams. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

THE POLITICAL SCENE. By Walter Lippmann. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

HERR ERZBERGER pivots his league of nations upon compulsory arbitration, and so rejects the familiar distinction between "justiciable" and "non-justiciable" disputes.

"All international conflicts," he asserts, "however thickly invested with the pathos of irrationality, may be referred back, in the last resort, to a concrete difference, which is expressible in legal terms and is always formulated in an ultimatum (p. 178). . . . Every conflict, even that which is apparently incapable of settlement by legal means, is really susceptible of an objective solution. The decisive point is the obligation to resort to arbitration . . . fresh data will give rise to new legal prin- ciples" (pp. 180-81). Unfortunately, Herr Erzberger does not attempt to enlighten us as to the nature of the new legal principles which he expects to see arise, and that is a very essential matter. The great national states have always felt that they could not consent to a crystallization of the status quo, and it is that fact, rather than lack of legal principles, which still constitutes the supreme difficulty in the way of universal arbitration.

The machinery of Herr Erzberger's league is naturally very simple. The court of arbitration is always an ad hoc body to which each of the two disputants, acting through its legislature, appoints a member, these two in turn appointing a third; but in cases of persistent disagreement as to the third member, a more elaborate method may be resorted to (p. 181 ff.). Recalcitrant states are treated first to a severance of diplomatic relations, then to commercial and economic isolation, and finally to blockade (p. 322). Other features of the general plan are disarmament, "freedom of the seas," "equality of economic privilege," and the neutralization of Africa.

Herr Erzberger's notion of freedom of the seas is essentially the same as that which was taken to Berlin by Colonel House in 1915 and which afterwards found expression in President Wilson's "Peace without Victory" speech of January 22, 1917, and more vaguely in the second of the Fourteen Points. The most important trade routes of the world, like those through the Straits of Gibraltar, and the Suez and Panama Canals, must be internationalized; the rights of belligerents in connection with blockade and contraband must be abolished; there must be a general disarmament at sea. A rather optimistic programme for a German to have set out as late as September of last year!

Nevertheless, Herr Erzberger is quite right in insisting that the problem of freedom of the seas is still with us. As he writes: "Only an absolute Utopian will believe that it is possible to devise such arrangements as will preserve the world from the clash of arms under all circumstances," wherefore the regulation of land and sea warfare is still not superfluous (pp. 211-12). And especially is this so in view of the possibilities of the submarine, which has already put the superdreadnought in peril, has immensely enhanced the resources of defense by sea, and has made blockade a weapon available to large and small states alike. "This is why," Herr Erzberger sums up, "all states must renounce the use of warships for their own private purposes" (p. 218).

Professor Lawrence's volume also went to press after the victory of the Entente had become assured and takes color from that fact. Comparing a "dictated peace" with a "peace by negotiation" he remarks: "A peace dictated by a conqueror to a thoroughly beaten foe might conceivably be just, and even generous. A peace reached by diplomatic bargaining might be unjust and sordid to the last degree" (p. 146). "Conceivably"—there is much virtue in the word. Certainly it is more than questionable whether Dr. Lawrence's further assurances to Germany have been borne out by subsequent fact. "She will discover," he writes, "that the Allies have no intention of depriving her of a rood of land that is really German, or crippling her by penalties more severe than what is needful for reparation and security" (p. 151).

The necessary foundation of a "society of nations," Professor Lawrence urges, must be the recognition by every state of its obligation to assist in the enforcement of International Law (p. 182). Other features of his plan he summarizes thus: "First, the provision of Arbitral Courts to deal with cases susceptible of judicial treatment; secondly, the establishment of Conciliation Committees for the settlement of cases not capable of legal adjustment; thirdly, the organization of an international force to be used in the last resort for the purpose of compelling recalcitrant states to submit to the decisions of these Tribunals and Committees; and fourthly, the proportional and simultaneous disarmament of all civilized powers, saving only the forces necessary to safeguard the social fabric" (p. 186). Finally, there must be "something in the nature of a Legislative Assembly" to continue the work of the Hague Conferences (p. 187). For, no more than Herr Erzberger, does Professor Lawrence expect to see war abolished at once, wherefore it must be regulated. Indeed, the organization of the League of Nations, far from being one of the incidental tasks of the Peace Conference, "will take years to accomplish" and "will tax the utmost energies of the best intellects and highest characters to be found among men" (p. 153). Nor is the problem exclusively, or even predominantly, a mechanical one—at bottom it is "moral and spiritual. There is no real security for a better and nobler international society save the ennoblement of the thoughts and desires of men" (p. 188). As was to be expected, Professor Lawrence brings to his problem the luminous spirit of ample learning and disciplined reflection. His instructive pages should have many readers.

In decided contrast with the two preceding volumes is Professor Adams's suggestive little volume. From his important studies of the British Constitution, Professor Adams has derived a point of view and this point of view he now brings to bear upon the problem of international reconstruction. The British Constitution has in great part developed "unconsciously," that is, in piecemeal fashion, and has never ceased to rest upon good, everyday, British human nature. How entirely to be expected, then, that a life-long student of this process should avow his skepticism of "codes and constitutions" which exact either "the existence of common moral standards and ideals of conduct among nations"—in short, "a re-making of human nature"—or else must be enforced by war (p. 34). But the fact is, of course, that "no evidence has yet been presented by any nation, at least, outside of words, or by any body of men of controlling influence, that a decisive change has taken place" in the "elemental feelings and ambitions" of men. Hence, "even among the avowed supporters of a league of peace, the belief is freely expressed that future war can not be prevented, that the utmost that can be hoped for is to make it difficult and more than ever dangerous." It is apparent, therefore, that no sure conviction of success is derivable from "artificial and mechanical" plans drawing their only life from treaties and resting on the menace of armies. "What is imperatively demanded is an object lesson, an actual instance of . . . a league on a large scale among nations, with practical machinery that does its work." Nor is such an instance lacking. "The Anglo-Saxon nations at the present moment almost furnish the required example" (pp. 29-31).

Professor Adams clearly indicates the stages by which the league of nations he sketches would emerge into actuality. In the first place, the purely British problem of Imperial Federation would be solved by the transformation of the British Empire into a commonwealth of equal nations, each vested with exclusive powers of internal legislation but acting together for external purposes through a body akin to the Allied War Council. To such a commonwealth of nations the United States would readily seek admission, and after it, Italy and France. The adhesion of Russia and the Central Powers would depend upon the establishment within their borders of a genuinely democratic régime. Japan would be a more doubtful problem still.

Quite aside from the question whether he does not overestimate considerably the moral solidarity of what he calls "the Anglo-Saxon race," Professor Adams has been led, by his favorite studies, one suspects, to undervalue the importance of "artificial and mechanical" constructions. Hence, there are certain problems of organization calling for clear-cut answers from the outset to which his own answers are indefinite and unsatisfactory. The central body of his league is an international council in which each nation would have "an equal share" and whose method of arriving at decisions would be that of negotiation—but suppose negotiation should fail! Again, in attempting to draw the line between "internal" and "external" interests, he favors leaving "the vexed question of protective tariffs" and that of naturalization to local legislation, a solution which flies in the face of our own history as a federation. It may be true that "the primary and most essential object of a British federation or of an English-speaking alliance is not internal regulation but external unity" (p. 14); but the question remains, what internal tensions will make for and what against unity. And this question would not become less exigent with the expansion of the federation into a world union.

The great contribution which Professor Adams makes to our discussion is the reminder that the solid bases of international amity are not to be pulled out of a hat by some political prestidigitator, that they are the fruit of history, and that where they already exist they should be cherished, both for their own sake and for the support they may be made to lend to world peace and order. But it does not follow that their place may not be supplied to some extent, and indeed, their growth facilitated by "mechanical and artificial" means. Moreover, Professor Adams bids too high. "League of Nations" and "World Federation" are still far from synonymous in the vocabulary of most men.

Mr. Lippmann's agreeably written if somewhat misleadingly entitled little essay brings us approximately down to date and lands us somewhere in the neighborhood of the Peace Conference, from which, however, our too curious gaze is at once tactfully diverted by a rattle of interesting talk about "absolute victory," "the Covenant," "Bolshevism," etc.

While avowing himself a great believer in President Wilson, Mr. Lippmann evidently does not share to the fullest extent his chief's high opinion of the Covenant, at any rate, the original draft of it. "It can not be asserted too often," he writes, "that the indispensable action to be taken at Paris is to provide for a continuous meeting. Nothing else in the Twenty-six Articles can be regarded as beyond the reach of criticism and amendment" (p. 54). He then adds this interesting suggestion: "Revision need not delay the making of the Peace Treaty, because the Congress of Versailles—if it does not adjourn—can adequately perform the immediate tasks of the League." How unfortunate that this idea never occurred to the brilliant political strategists who brought forth the Knox Resolutions only to manoeuvre them into an untimely grave!

Mr. Lippmann succeeds in re-phrasing criticism of Article X and adds a point or two to the usual indictment. This clause, he writes, "will not protect a nation's independence against the kind of economic penetration which to-day constitutes the chief mode of conquest. But it will protect a government in bad practices and oppressions. It will hamper the honorable nations by ruling out interference; it will assist the dishonorable governments who have learned to manipulate affairs in a costume of legality. It may put minorities beyond the scope of the League's protection, and enforce the privilege of the oppressing state" (pp. 56-57).

Yet on the whole Mr. Lippmann's attitude towards the Covenant is one of approval. He commends, as Senator Root has done more recently, its provision for automatic conferences at a definite place when there is danger of war, its provision for joint action in matters of common interest, its provision for delay and for bringing disputes between nations to the bar of world opinion. But then, these are features which might well occur—probably would occur—in any scheme for a league of nations. The really distinctive excellence of the proposed League is something quite different; it consists in the fact, so Mr. Lippmann contends, that it makes "Anglo-American sea-power the nucleus of world organization," guarantees "its uses before the whole world," and binds "ourselves in honor to employ it only for the security of all nations. That," he proceeds, "is what the League does. The actual ownership of power remains in British and American hands, but its uses are stipulated in a covenant" (pp. 51-52). To complete the argument, we should add, from an earlier page of the volume, a description of sea-power as "irresistible in conflict and yet" incapable of being used "permanently to conscript and enslave alien peoples" (p. 42).

I must own to finding this complacent picture of a Pax Anglo-Americana not altogether convincing. What evidence, for example, has Mr. Lippmann that sea-power is "irresistible" except in very special circumstances, and what evidence has he further, that when it is "irresistible" it is incapable of serious oppression? Again, where in the Covenant are the uses of sea-power stipulated? In the preamble of the document, forsooth? But when did a preamble ever want in fair professions? The preamble of the Holy Alliance could hardly be exceeded for its pious benevolence.

The fact is that Mr. Lippmann adduces no convincing proof either that Anglo-American intentions—assuming their harmony—would prevail in the League, as organized in the Council; or that, if they did, the League would be essentially different from a mutual underwriting by the two Powers of one another's foreign policies. Moreover, he fails to distinguish things that need distinguishing. Few well-intentioned folk but will admit our duty as a nation to pledge our support to some mode of procedure having for its purpose the impartial and peaceable consideration of international differences; many will question very sharply whether the performance of this duty carries with it the obligation to join with a few other great powers with numerous axes to grind in assuming the rôle of international arbiter on all occasions. The enforcement of the processes of the peaceable adjustment of international difficulties is one thing, the assertion of hegemony quite a different thing, and one which, carried to the lengths suggested by the Covenant, exacts the abandonment of one of our soundest national traditions.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Foreign Capital in Mexico

MEXICO UNDER CARRANZA. By Thomas Edward Gibbon. New York: Doubleday Page and Company.

MR. GIBBON has written a remarkable book. Though incomplete, and at times one-sided, his presentation of the services which foreign capital has rendered to Mexico deserves closest attention. To it her railways owe their very existence. They were for the most part honestly constructed and, contrary to a widely held opinion, comparatively moderate privileges were obtained from the Government in the form of subsidies and grants. The subsidies granted to the Mexican Central Railway, against which the Carranzistas have brought so much criticism, were small as compared to the subsidies that were necessary to induce capital to build railways in the United States under even more favorable conditions. An examination of the details of this much-criticised "concession," which is printed in the appendix of the book, bears out Mr. Gibbon's contention.

Concerning the great services of foreign capital in developing the mines and the agricultural and other industries that largely depend upon the mining industry, Mr. Gibbon presents a strong case. For the most part, foreign enterprise had increased wages and raised the standard of living within its sphere of influence. A review of the history of every important gold, silver, and copper mining camp in Mexico shows that in practically every case it was high-powered pumps, the handling of low-grade ores, and the reworking of abandoned dumps that enabled the American and foreign miners to extract a wealth that could not have been produced by Mexican methods. And what is true of mining is essentially true in other important branches of industry.

In view of the many current rumors as to the fabulous wealth gained by Americans through lucrative "concessions," it may be enlightening to many in the United States to learn from Mr. Gibbon that "no citizen of the United States, during the Diaz régime, ever acquired, by grant or subsidy, a dollar's worth of oil territory, gold or silver or copper mines, or land." And further, "None of the mines owned or operated by foreigners was ever acquired as a concession or grant through the favoritism of Diaz, or any other head of the Mexican Government. They were, in nearly all instances, either purchased or leased from Mexican owners and were all acquired under the general laws governing the acquisition of mineral properties."

Mr. Gibbon brings against the Carranza régime one of the most severe indictments ever brought against any administration in modern times. He cites the unspeakable misery of a large mass of the people; poverty beyond the imagination of those who have not seen it; the "criminal waste of public funds"; the graft among the army paymasters and other officials; the robbery of the people and "an unbroken crescendo of accumulated woes." To this he adds the destruction and confiscation of property of both foreigners and nationals and the deliberate breaking of faith by Carranza. "The experience of the masses of the people under the government given the major portion of Mexico by the Carranza party furnishes a striking parallel to that of the Russians at the hands of the Bolsheviki."

It is an extreme charge but unfortunately a part of nearly every count in the indictment is true. But what Mr. Gibbon neglects to tell us is that an important part of the condition which he presents is due not to Carranza but would have occurred under any one of the seventy-five governments that he credits to Mexico in the last one hundred years. Mr. Gibbon would not like to be told that his method of presentation is a "striking parallel" to that followed by the Bolsheviki and other extreme radicals in attacking the present economic system. Such, unfortunately, is the case. The radical conjures up most of the ills of society that have been accumulating for the last few centuries, some of which existed three thousand years ago, and dramatically presents them as the results of modern capitalism. Mr. Gibbon, in defending capitalism in Mexico, attributes to the Carranza régime a large part of the sins and sufferings that have been accumulating for many generations. Part of his book is so well done, it is to be regretted that he has been so indiscriminating in dealing with the Carranza Government. His facts are in the main correct, but they are the facts of a physiography, a race, and a conquest of three hundred years' standing and not solely of the political conditions of the last six years.

To Americans, perhaps, the most interesting of the conclusions of Mr. Gibbon will be those concerning the policy of President Wilson in regard to Mexico. We now have books upon current Mexican problems written by representatives of each of the contending interests in that country. Three of the most striking are the one written by the well-known publicist of Diaz's time, Francisco Bulnes, the one written by the Mexican Ambassador to the United States under Madero, Manuel Calero, and the one written by Mr. Gibbon, a lawyer of Los Angeles. All three represent different points of view, but all three reach substantial agreement upon two points, viz., that the rights of Americans in Mexico have been inexcusably neglected by our own Government and that instead of assisting the Mexicans, we have but added to the misery of that unhappy people.

While the diagnosis of Mexico's ills and the remedy offered are not entirely new, Mr. Gibbon presents some aspects with a high degree of interest. He finds Mexico's chief difficulty to be one of race antagonism and a minority tyranny changing but never changed for three hundred years. "Mexico is inhabited by two distinct races: one, the descendants of the aborigines comprising probably eighty per cent. of her total population, who furnish practically all the common labor of the country . . . who as a class are uneducated and non-property holding. The other twenty per cent. of the population are the descendants of the Latin conquerors, who, beginning by monopolizing all the landed and other wealth of the country and possessing all its educated intelligence, have continued to hold that position of advantage which has made them the governing race and conferred upon them and made them responsible for the control of the uneducated and non-property holding eighty per cent."

Such a situation inevitably results in the degradation of the majority and the corruption of the alien minority. And against the fitness of the Latin-Mexican minority to rule the majority, he finds overwhelming evidence. Oppressive beyond description, they have monopolized education, property and political control; they have been the disturbing element for a century, for "with few exceptions, every revolution in Mexico has been led by some representative of the Latin population;" and lastly, they have degenerated in their public morality until their indulgence in speculation has become a national scandal. In justice to the present Government, however, the author should have added that the prevalence of graft, especially in the army, has been frankly acknowledged by some of the members of the Carranza Government and that the problem of removing this public thieving is one of the largest with which President Carranza has had to deal.

Mr. Gibbon's conclusions are reached after having considered all other possibilities of reform. Will revolution dethrone the corrupted class that has ground down the native majority for so many years? The evidence of history, he thinks, is overwhelmingly against this hypothesis. Mexican history up to Diaz was one of almost perpetual revolution. Seventy-five rulers headed the Government in fifty-five years, and in almost every case the Latin-Mexican came to the top. Each revolution represented not the overthrow of the alien minority by the native majority, but the overthrow of one section of the minority by another. Carranza's revolution was no exception, and the Latin-Mexican element still dominates.

Since, therefore, the cunning of the Latin-Mexican will bring him into power in every revolution, Mr. Gibbon sees only one solution and that is "the intervention in her affairs of some saving power such as England has afforded to Egypt or our nation to the Philippines and to Cuba, in a degree, under the authority of the Platt amendment."

Vulgarity Outside and In

THE BOUNDER: A VULGAR TALE. By Arthur Hodges. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

SAINT'S PROGRESS. By John Galsworthy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE author of "The Bounder" once, in "Pincus Hodd," pleased at least one jaded reader of pseudo-bohemian fiction with a merry and hearty little story in that now somewhat unhopeful field. Since then, Mr. Merrick's "While Paris Laughed" has done the trick more perfectly, but that is not Mr. Hodges's fault, and we who recalled "Pincus" turned the first few pages of "The Bounder" in smiling anticipation. It was to be a "vulgar tale," apparently in the sense that it dealt with vulgar people. And by vulgar people we were to understand the kind of free, striving, racketing young experimenters with life and art at whom dull respectability is doomed to frown. There has to be this abrupt contrast, we know, or the piquancy of Bohemia vanishes. Let respectability once perceive that "artists" are not necessarily vulgar and may very well be dull, and it will cease to support (as of course it does support) the conventionalized fiction of Montmartre and of our own proud Greenwich. . . . Mr. Hodges is too, too right with his subtitle: this is not merely a tale about persons and scenes bound to be held as vulgar by conventional or supercilious observers. It is a vulgar tale in essence, and, alas! a very dull one. No matter how free and easy the denizens of "Kilkenny" are in their speech and conduct, how faithfully and almost methodically they get drunk and make love, and are humorous for our benefit, we find it increasingly difficult to keep our eye on them, as the chapters go by. They do not seem to have rehearsed the piece; they give an impression of making up not only the lines but the plot, as they go along. Therefore, it is a dull performance. Perhaps the real trouble is that Mr. Hodges has not found it worth while (since he was only going to write a novel, which may be anything you like) to decide what he meant to do. The medley he achieves of Bohemian comedy, Southern melodrama, and sex-realism, is neither savory nor entertaining. The action maunders along interminably, and the characters are . . . dull. For the rest, a plural in the title would have been fairer to all concerned.

Between the patent vulgarity of a book like this and the inherent vulgarity of "Saint's Progress," or any other of Mr. Galsworthy's recent novels, there is an undoubted barrier. But it is mainly a barrier of style. The author of "The Dark Flower" and "Beyond" is clearly under his own spell; under the hypnotic charm of his graceful and fluid diction, and also under the enchantment of a misty humanitarianism, a largely emotional penchant for liberty and brotherhood and a world in which all injustice shall become magically impossible. And being thus spellbound, with many of his readers, he is, one may believe, unaware of the grosser magic that holds him and determines the character of his work, as apart from its form and atmosphere. To put it grossly, there is a "yellow streak" in this famous writer, a secret sex-obsession the more unwholesome in essence and influence because veiled beneath a manner of extreme refinement; a coarseness of fibre almost concealed by the fastidious hand of a skillful artist. "Camouflage" apart, there is not so much difference between the inherent vulgarity of Mr. R. W. Chambers, to which we alluded last week, and that of the author of "Saint's Progress."

Not to leave this as a vague allegation, we may glance at the detail of this story. The plot may be "passed" readily enough by current standards. It is based upon a common and moving situation of recent days—the young girl who gives herself in haste to her soldier-lover on the eve of his departure and who, after her lover's death in battle, becomes mother of a "war baby." We may accept the solution for her, in this instance, of later marriage with a much older man who "knows all" and thinks none the worse of her. What we think of such a plot, or feel about it, depends altogether on its handling. Does the story-teller interpret it, or does he merely use it for his (conscious or unconscious) purposes? Does he treat it finely or crudely? And the answer in this case is that, with all his air of connoisseurship, he treats it crudely. He starts from the crude idea, and decorates rather than develops it: the girl with inherited "temperament" approaching womanhood at the moment when young men are becoming scarce in England; her impulse to make sure of one young man while she may, even for an hour: and what happens thereafter. Noel Pierson is presented insistently as a girl of amazing charm, and perhaps we reward her creator's insistence by assent. It all turns on our ability to accept the right impression of her physical presence. Otherwise, having shaken our eyes clear of the verbal glamour spun about her, we have to recognize her as a wilful, emotional and distinctly "common" young egotist. She thinks coarsely and speaks coarsely—is coarse. As for the "saint," her father, the Reverend Edward Pierson, he is (stripped of that same glamour) among the woodenest parsons of fiction, despite that wild little heater we are commanded to observe burning under his clerical waistcoat. With insidious, and, for all one knows, unconscious irony, Mr. Galsworthy proceeds to make a fool of this supposably excellent man. Oh, yes, he is all very virtuous and so on, but that is all the effect of painful repression. He would probably have been a better man among men if he had not, with anguish, "starved" himself physically after the death of his wife, on account of his theory that one should only marry once. He is really dominated and stifled by sex, if only by its negation. And here is Noel's delicate summing up of him, towards the end of the tale. Pierson doesn't want her to marry James Fort because an older cousin of Noel's is, or has just ceased to be, Fort's mistress:

She took up her father's letter, and bent it meditatively against her chin. He wanted her to pass the time—not to live, not to enjoy! To pass the time. What else had he been doing himself, all these years, ever since she could remember, ever since her mother died, but just passing the time? Passing the time because he did not believe in this life; not living at all, just preparing for the life he did believe in. Denying everything that was exciting and nice, so that when he died he might pass pure and saintly to his other world. He could not believe Captain Fort a good man, because he had not passed the time, and resisted Leila; and Leila was gone! And now it was a sin for him to love someone else; he must pass the time again. "Daddy doesn't believe in life," she thought . . . "Daddy's a saint; but I don't want to be a saint, and pass the time. He doesn't mind making people unhappy, because the more they're repressed, the saintlier they'll be. . . ."

"Denying himself everything that was exciting and nice": these are the terms in which Mr. Galsworthy, novelist and moralist, represents the modern daughter of better-class England, whom he admires, as scorning her already more than middle-aged father for keeping his body to himself in a world of "enjoyment" and of women.

H. W. BOYNTON

The Whole Law of Income Tax

INCOME TAX PROCEDURE. By Robert H. Montgomery. New York: The Ronald Press.

THE chief interest of the various editions of Montgomery's books on the Federal income tax, aside from their authoritative character, is to be found in the fearless criticisms of the unjust features of our income tax procedure, originally in the law or read into it by the decisions of the officials of the Treasury Department. In many of the crude and doubtful decisions of 1916 and 1917, the officials of the Treasury Department, presumably acting in good faith, compelled corporations to follow accounting practices at once unsound and nothing short of illegal if applied in other branches of accounting. From the first, Montgomery has done valuable service in pointing this out with clearness and emphasis. It is therefore comforting to read in the preface of his latest edition that "the 1918 revenue bill is almost a good one." Those who have wrestled with these laws, complicated by successive Treasury decisions, will note with interest the change in the character of Montgomery's comments on the intelligence of the Treasury officials. For the first time he finds the Treasury officials amenable to reason and the spirit of the law. "Fortunately for the business interests of the country the Bureau of Internal Revenue has vastly improved its personnel and its rulings. Questions of doubt are considered on their merits, as they should be."

The book in its present form renders several valuable services. It offers, first, a practical guide, notably clear and complete, to the taxable person in determining what part of his income is taxable under the law.

A second object, the one apparently nearest to the author's heart and involving his most valuable contribution, is served by the criticism of the law and the Treasury rulings from the point of view of sound accounting. It is doubtful if anyone could have been found to do this better, a service which in itself entitles the book to recognition.

A third contribution of the author, brief out of all proportion to its importance, is his contention that fiscal administration is a two-party affair and that the Government alone can not hope to obtain good results until it considers the taxpayer as a partner in the administration. Too little has been made of this point in the United States, although it is well understood in some European countries. Experienced students of practical fiscal administration know that a large part of tax evasion is forced upon the taxpayer either by the injustice and partiality of the law itself, or by the stupid attitude of tax administrators. Dr. Montgomery has rendered the Government as well as the taxpayer a real service in pointing out repeatedly and forcefully that successful administration consists not in the attempt to squeeze out of the taxpayer the last cent that can be obtained, but in the attempt to deal with the taxpayer in a broad-minded and helpful way; in treating him as a gentleman; and in enlisting his support instead of bewildering and antagonizing him.

The value of the book, both for the practical purposes of ascertaining taxable income and for purposes of general reference, has been enhanced by the introduction of foot-notes. Much of the text of previous editions, while of interest to the student of taxation, was not necessary for the immediate purposes of the payer of income tax. The present form enables the taxpayer to obtain the needed guidance with a minimum of searching and yet retains in the foot-notes much valuable material that would otherwise have to be omitted.

War and Treaty-Making Power

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER AND WORLD AFFAIRS. By George Sutherland, Former United States Senator from Utah. New York: Columbia University Press.

THIS small volume, based upon lectures given in 1918 at Columbia University upon the Blumenthal Foundation, represents a type of publication which is of distinct value. It is a discussion in a clear and scholarly, and yet popular manner of questions of public law which are of great moment to the American people. The topics treated are those of the war and treaty-making powers under the United States Constitution, and the reviewer finds himself in substantial agreement with the conclusions which are reached.

With regard to "war powers" Senator Sutherland points out that, with the exception of those vested by the Constitution in the President as Commander-in-Chief, they reside in Congress: as Commander-in-Chief, the powers of the President are determined by the usages and laws of war; as Executive, they are enumerated and limited by the Constitution. The power which Congress has to declare war carries with it the right to authorize any action which can be reasonably deemed expedient for waging war effectively and successfully: hence the constitutionality of the great body of legislation by the Sixty-fifth Congress.

As regards the treaty-making power, Senator Sutherland discusses the participation of the Senate in its exercise, and the constitutional limits upon the matters that may be regulated. There is not here space even to summarize his argument, but it may be said that his conclusions are such as will be deemed satisfactory by the most liberal constitutional constructionist. In fact, Senator Sutherland's general thesis is that the time has come when we should measure the authority of the general Government not only by the powers which the Constitution affirmatively grants, but by those which it has failed to deny. To the statement so often made that the Constitution is an undemocratic instrument in that it places so many restraints upon legislative action, Senator Sutherland points out that these restraints are not upon the people but upon the Government. Viewed fundamentally, "It is the most democratic thing we possess, for it is the one thing above all other things that makes articulate and clear the claim that all political power comes from the people. . . . The limitations of the Constitution are not bonds which fetter the people; they are restraints imposed by the people themselves upon the government which they have created as an instrumentality through which they rule in order that their creature may never forget that it has a creator."

He is not sanguine as to the results to be obtained from the proposed League of Nations, and would prefer to see developed the projects already initiated by the two Hague Peace Conferences.

The Run of the Shelves

MR. CHARLES LATHROP PACK, organizer and president of the National War Garden Commission, deserves high praise for rapidly estimating the critical position of America with respect to the world's food supply and for the effective measures which he set afoot to meet an emergency of the utmost gravity. The story is told in his "War Garden Victorious" (J. B. Lippincott Company). The object was simple enough; to set idle lands and idle hands to work, and in America's bright lexicon to give added meaning to the word "can." But before this could be realized in the form of backyard gardens, school gardens, community gardens, demonstration gardens, factory gardens, soldiers' gardens, and community canneries, a deal of organizing had to be done and the coöperation of many sorts of people had to be effectively called forth. The success of the vast enterprise could not have been greater, it could only have been more striking, if the war had continued. Daylight saving, we are told, increased by many millions of dollars the value of the food produced in the United States. It is pathetic to read of the author's hopes for the continuance of the backyard garden, with its very material contribution towards the solving of problems of labor and of transportation, in the light—or rather in the darkness—of subsequent legislation by Congress. In an appendix are reprinted two of the books issued by the Commission, "War Gardens" and "Home Canning and Drying."

Voltaire is perhaps the greatest and certainly the sprightliest of modern letter-writers. S. G. Tallentyre has rendered acceptably, together with a running commentary, eighty-four letters of the ten thousand or more that appear in the collected correspondence. ("Voltaire in His Letters"; Putnams.) He is guilty, however, of an occasional lapse—for example, when he confuses La Motte Houdard with La Motte Fouqué, the author of "Undine." Some readers would have preferred the explanations of the more obscure allusions to appear in their appropriate places at the bottom of the page rather than bunched at the beginning of each letter. The fear of the foot-note is being pushed in certain recent volumes to a point that is almost morbid. In his attitude towards religion Mr. Tallentyre seems to suffer from some of the limitations of his author. The saying that he quotes with approval that though anathema to the church Voltaire had done more good than all the Fathers put together is already beginning to have a somewhat old-fashioned flavor. Mr. Tallentyre presents with special fullness the letters that enable us to follow the relations between Voltaire and Frederick the Great. He discovers points of likeness between Frederick and the present representative of the house of Hohenzollern and quotes with satisfaction a passage from his Life of Voltaire written fifteen years ago: "No man ever wore better than Frederick the fine coat called Culture. He fitted it so well that even a shrewd Voltaire thought it his skin, not his covering, until he sheng it on the ground and trampled on it!"

As an illustration of the merits of Mr. Tallentyre's translation and also of the inevitable loss in lightness and agility that Voltairian prose suffers in its passage into our clumsier idiom, one may take the well-known beginning of the letter to Rousseau in acknowledgment of the receipt of the Discourse on Inequality. "I have received, sir, your new book against the human species, and I thank you for it. You will please people by your manner of telling them the truth about themselves, but you will not alter them. The horrors of that human society—from which in our feebleness and ignorance we expect so many consolations—have never been painted in more striking colors: no one has ever been so witty as you are in trying to turn us into brutes: to read your book makes one long to go on all fours. Since, however, it is now some sixty years since I gave up the practice, I feel that it is unfortunately impossible for me to resume it: I leave this natural habit to those more fit for it than are you and I. Nor can I set sail to discover the aborigines of Canada, in the first place, because my ill-health ties me to the side of the greatest doctor in Europe, and I should not find the same professional assistance among the Missouris: and secondly, because war is going on in that country and the example of the civilized nations has made the barbarians almost as wicked as we are ourselves. I must confine myself to being a peaceful savage in the retreat I have chosen—close to your country where you yourself should be."

"Aristokia" is an amusing extravaganza by A. Washington Pezet (Century), playing around life as it may, but probably won't be towards the close of the century. After the great proletarian revolution, and the establishment, in 1925, of the Universal International Socialistic Democracy, the lot of ex-royalties and of all unreconstructed adherents of the capitalist tradition was for a time hard indeed. Justice, however, was eventually done them and a tract of land in what was formerly Germany was set apart for them in which they might continue the old world of dinner parties (instead of capsules), tips, alcohol, marriage and divorce, titles and resplendent uniforms, without interference from the drab proletarian world. All this splendor is maintained by opening Aristokia during three months in the year to the vulgarly wealthy proletarian tourist in search of an archæological or a moral holiday. Here many years after comes John Smith, knowing only the world of international democracy, and tastes strange drinks, and engages in strange adventure with Prince Willy, grandson of the defeated commander at Verdun, and with Gwendolyn. The satire, which often promises well, too often blows up into extravagance or collapses into humor. The humor is rather strikingly American; the author is by birth a Peruvian. We shall doubtless soon see many books on themes of this sort. Something really memorable might be forthcoming if the mass of them could be given condensation and point by an editorial board consisting, say, of Lucian, Rabelais, Cyrano de Bergerac and Jonathan Swift.

There is very little left of the conscientious objector when Major Walter Guest Kellogg gets through with him in his book of that title (Boni and Live-right). Before a penetrating and not unkindly good sense his heroics evaporate and he stands clearly revealed, whether he happens to be a half idiotic Mennonite stranded in the backwaters of a couple of centuries ago, a voluble negro a-grope in his own misty verbiage, or a glib idealist who takes lofty stand on some inner or outer perfection hidden from the eyes of ordinary mortals, as the narrow-minded, anti-social parasite he really is. Fortunately, there were not many of them. Something less than four thousand made good their claim to a conscience that had caused the atrophy of all their intellectual powers. And, all in all, they received better treatment than the intelligence and sympathy of most of the fellow countrymen whose protection they sought but to whom they would lend only a carefully qualified assistance would have been able or willing to accord them. France had neither time nor inclination to recognize the scruples dark and nice that might obsess some unfortunates among them. Much could be said for the French way of managing the thing. But that, for better or worse, could hardly be the Anglo-Saxon way. Canada, to be sure, exempted, from combatant service only, those whose conscientious objections were fortified by membership in a religious society which forbade participation in war, and, under an old agreement, its Mennonites and Doukhobors from service of any kind. England and the United States undertook to reckon with the pathology of the individual conscience; England through its local boards and America by means ultimately of a Board of Inquiry on conscientious objectors.

As chairman of the board Major Kellogg succeeded Major Richard C. Stoddard. The other members were Dean Stone, of the Columbia Law School, and Judge Julian W. Mack. It would be difficult to render the board too much praise for the spirit in which it approached its large—really too large—task. The legal mind, unembarrassed by precedents, has had few fairer opportunities to exercise a kindly acumen. Their recorded experience is of great value. Careful heed should be given the suggestion that objectors who established their sincerity and who refused non-combatant service (the Quakers as a class accepted this in the finest spirit) and who then refused farm or industrial furloughs under the direction and in the pay of the Government should be segregated in one or more convenient posts at a safe distance from all real soldiers. Their presence in military camps during the war was more than a nuisance, it was a menace. Finally, the possessor of a conscience which could bring itself to assume no part of the nation's war burdens should certainly be made to find his privileges in time of peace curtailed to the extent of deportation or, where such action is not appropriate, of complete political disfranchisement. There is a residuum of objectors which neither justice nor expediency would desire to force into any form of service. Such enjoyed a fair measure of comfort and complete personal safety during the national crisis whose existence they refused to recognize. Steps should be taken at once to give legal confirmation to their self-chosen severance from the body politic.

Some History that Might Have Happened

IN reading casually an old volume a short time ago, I was impressed by the new interest the war had given to so many past and half-forgotten events. The book I had in hand was one of the volumes of Young's "Around the World With General Grant," published in 1879. Grant's exchange of views with Bismarck, and his reception by the courts and peoples of Europe, elicited comparison with the recent travels of our President; but when I read a report of a conversation with the General about the situation at the close of the Civil War, the strangeness of the devious ways of history was forcibly brought to mind, and I began to wonder what the logic of it all was. Here we find ourselves, I thought, in 1919, suddenly plunged into the affairs of the world,—unexpectedly to many if not to most of us, unnecessarily some probably still think,—and quite in the face of our homely provincial ways and against our traditions and contrary to the "Farewell Address." What is the reason for this fate of ours? I asked. Are we just where we are because, as Sir Thomas Barclay, the distinguished English student of international relations tells us, of a natural and inevitable consequence of our Monroe Doctrine itself? Or, again, does history hang upon the toss of a coin, so to speak, or upon the decisions and caprice of a moment? Or, once more, is there to be seen in it a fate or a purpose that transcends chance and Monroe doctrines alike?

All this reflection follows from being reminded of a fact which most of us have probably forgotten, and many of us never knew, that just as the Civil War was closing and shortly thereafter General Grant strongly urged an immediate invasion of Mexico. Secretary Seward opposed the plan. President Johnson was probably in agreement with Grant. What did actually happen is a matter of recorded history. A strongly worded note went from our Department of State, and certain French troops that had occupied Mexico since about the beginning of the war were promptly withdrawn. The loss of this support promptly sealed the fate of the Austrian Prince Maximilian, whom Napoleon III had placed upon the throne of Mexico, the collapse of the Clerical and Royalist parties in Mexico followed, and European intrigue there came for the time to an end.

It is good for us to recall some of these events, for they show us how closely after all we are united to the Old World, and that world-politics is by no means dependent upon wireless and airplane. Then it was France, and not Germany, that was for the moment our menace. Napoleon III was ambitious for empire in Central America. Opportunely, too, leaders of the South, foreseeing separation from the North, were looking towards a union with Mexico; and the politicians of Mexico and the Confederacy were talking of a great empire, encircling the West Indian Seas, and at last to absorb the Caribbean Archipelago. Spain also looked for the restoration of her Western Empire; and she wished and expected to see a Bourbon prince placed upon the throne of Mexico. England was not without interest, and might have had reasons for wishing to see the territory of the United States limited in South and West.

Everyone knows that in December, 1861, a Spanish force landed at Vera Cruz, and occupied the city. A French force soon followed and then an English force. This was by agreement among the three nations. The immediate cause was the suspension by the Mexican Congress of interest payment on the national debt. Events moved swiftly in Mexico from that day, as they are likely to do in such unstable countries. We know that the Spanish and English forces withdrew; England, satisfied with the settlement of her claim, Spain, upon seeing that her dream of Western Empire was a forlorn hope. The French were left in control of Mexico. Austria and France were brought together by a new diversion and a family tie, so to speak, and our Republic had the added burden of watching new European diplomacy and guarding against Mexican intrigue.

It would be interesting to know what would have happened if, the South subdued, Grant had been free to impart to our policies the military view. Sheridan was sent to the Mexican border, Grant intending that he should cross and advance to Mexico City, the State Department on the other hand wishing to add emphasis to a diplomatic note. In Grant's view the situation was a military one. Napoleon in Mexico he believed to be a part of the Rebellion, and he believed that Napoleon's army was definitely opposed to ours, that there was never a more justifiable occasion for war and he was ready to act upon the evidence that Maximilian's Government had committed acts of hostility on the Rio Grande, and to assume that, if he were supported by Napoleon and the acts of the French and Mexican forces were not disavowed, war with both France and Mexico was in order.

Grant had, too, his own views about the wider results of such a situation. First of all, he thought all descendants and issues of Napoleon I to be evil influences in Europe, and looking back upon these events after twelve years, during which the Franco-Prussian War had been fought, it seemed to him that the whole course of European history might have been changed by an invasion of Mexico by the combined armies of North and South. Napoleon's Empire would have fallen five years sooner than it did, German and Austrian history would have been different. Incidentally the life of Maximilian would have been saved and the world spared a painful tragedy. France would have been a Republic, and the French people, with reliance upon their own true genius, would have abandoned their militarism. Above all, Grant's interest in the Mexican invasion was in its possibilities as a means of solidly uniting South and North, of turning the attention of the defeated South outward, and finding outlet for emotion and irreconcilable opposition and a new hope for thwarted careers. A great army could be recruited, he thought, Sheridan alone, with his corps, could march to Mexico City without a serious engagement, and, he hoped, many Southerners could be induced to remain as settlers.

All this might very easily have come to pass. From a military point of view it seems sound reasoning. It was precisely the argument of Bismarck, moreover when he looked for a means of uniting antagonistic German states. We should have come sooner to recognize our concern in European affairs. A crucial five years of European history would at least have been different. We should certainly have been united, North and South, on a different principle, and Europe would have had a new interest in the rise of a great Western empire and have found, perhaps, such a ground of mutual accord as Nicolai, for one, says would quickly be discovered among Western peoples, if the Far East should begin to move, in its deepest currents, towards the West.

G. E. PARTRIDGE

The French Stage During the War

AT first, when the European conflagration broke out, the French theatres closed their doors. Even the Comédie-Française, which had defied the siege of 1870-1871, was obliged to suspend while the greatest drama of history was being staged at the frontier. But after a fortnight of mortal anguish the battle of the Marne brought relief. Paris, saved temporarily, sought relaxation. Although only sixty miles from the conflict, Parisians proceeded to revive their least dispensable amusements—motion pictures, music halls, cabarets, and vaudevilles—and to reopen, also, the regular playhouses. Ere long, the capital wore again a semblance of gayety, and the drama flourished. "Never," declares Adolphe Brisson, "was our theatrical trade so prosperous as during those bloody years 1916 and 1917." Indeed, it was not until the spring of 1918 that the drama suffered another temporary check, this time from the long-range Berthas, which, for a little, drove theatrical troupes into the cellars or forced them to seek a livelihood in provincial cities like Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux.

In the field of serious drama producers relied for some time after the outbreak of hostilities upon pieces already famous, either classical or modern. Not until the third year of the conflict did any noteworthy new plays appear. For its reopening, on December 14, 1914, the Comédie-Française chose Corneille's "Horace" as best in keeping with the heroic mood displayed by France at her entrance into the war. This magnificent glorification of civic duty was applauded as never before. Even the murder of Camille by her brother—an episode usually regarded as inhuman—was accepted by the spectators without a murmur, thanks to the stern lessons of the time. The charming idyl of Ereckmann-Chatrrian, "L'Ami Fritz," was the next drama presented at Molière's playhouse, seeming as fresh as when first produced in 1876. It was appreciated as a splendid tribute to Alsace, the goal of French hopes. Especially appropriate was the warning, "Les peuples qui cessent de croître marchent à la décadence."

The remaining plays revived by the Comédie-Française, though not distinctively patriotic, were thoroughly national. Molière's natal day (January 15) was celebrated, in 1915, as during the siege of 1871, by a performance of "Tartuffe." In 1916, the troupe played "Georges Dandin," and, in 1917, "La Critique de l'École des Femmes," which, like the revival of Voltaire's "Zaïre," appeared to have been dictated by no special need of the moment. Of modern pieces, Augier's "Les Lionnes Pauvres" served appropriately as a rebuke to certain extravagant women for their offensive display of luxury. In France, as elsewhere, the war created many a Séraphine Pommeau. Donnay's "L'Autre Danger" possessed literary excellence and the merit dear to Frenchmen of developing the triangular theme. "La Course du Flambeau" deserved to be heard, not only as Hervieu's masterpiece, but as one of the greatest dramas of our time. So much for the Comédie-Française.

Of the well-known plays revived at other theatres, we may mention Lavedan's "Servir" and Zola's "L'Assommoir." "Servir" had first made its powerful appeal for military discipline and patriotic sacrifice in 1913, Colonel Fulin embodying what is noblest in the soldier: bravery, chivalry, and devotion to his native soil. The scene in which he reprimands and threatens his son, the pacifist lieutenant, breathes a martial fire that inflamed all hearers. "L'Assommoir," a striking specimen of Zola's dramatic "naturalism," evoked emotions dear to Frenchmen of the older generation, and proved timely in its condemnation of intemperance.

"Colette Baudoche," the first new piece presented at the Comédie-Française, is a dramatization by Pierre Frondaie of Maurice Barrès's novel of that name (1909). It bears the same relation to Lorraine as does "Les Oberlé" to Alsace. Like Bazin's play, it depicts the tenacious resistance and the superior civilization of the French in the "lost" province. Colette, brought up by her grandmother in the cult of France, rejects her Prussian suitor, a young professor engaged in the dissemination of Kultur. Humiliated and disappointed, he exclaims: "Oh! ces Français! On croit qu'on les a. On ne les a pas. Jamais leur conquête n'est achevée!"

The Comédie produced three other plays worthy of attention: "Les Noces d'Argent," by Paul Géraldy, "L'Élévation," by Henry Bernstein, and "La Triomphatrice," by Mlle. Marie Lenéru. The first, dealing with filial ingratitude, implies that as soon as children become fledged they desert the home, requiting parental affection with indifference. Like Hervieu in "La Course du Flambeau," the author concludes that affection moves only forward, from fathers to children, rather than backward from children to fathers. Géraldy's gloomy outlook upon life led one critic to call his piece "a landscape without sunlight." Written before 1914, it could not reflect subsequent events. But "L'Élévation" was intended to show the uplifting influence of the world war. In this it is not altogether successful, for the heroine, convinced of her "right to happiness," recognizes neither marital nor social du-

C=W Leadership

It has always been the C-W policy to lead.

In 1885 the executives of the present C-W Company and Chas. Curtis established the first plant devoted wholly to the manufacture of "electric" motors.

In 1888 Messrs. Crocker-Wheeler organized the C-W Company and produced the "Perfected Motor."

In 1905 the first plant to adopt the individual motor drive throughout was the Crocker-Wheeler Company.

Alb Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

ties. Only when her lover is about to succumb to wounds received in battle does she begin to realize vaguely the purifying force of the national trial. Unfortunately, we doubt both the durability of her eleventh-hour conversion and the wisdom of her husband's complacency.

In "La Triomphatrice," on the other hand, the husband, married to a famous bas bleu, is obliged to be tolerant. But the "triumph" of this woman of genius ends in disaster. Her fame, after absorbing the attention of disciples and admirers, not only alienates the affection of her daughter, but (what is infinitely more important) eclipses her lover, a celebrated confrère, and eventually elicits the hostility of critics. Deserted by all, disconsolate at the loss of her lover, the "triumphatrice" realizes the truth of Mme. de Staël's saying, that "la gloire est, pour une femme, le deuil éclatant du bonheur." "La Triomphatrice," though somewhat artificial, ranks on a level with "Les Affranchis," Mlle. Lenéru's first dramatic success.

Among new war pieces at other theatres, mention should be made of Henry Bataille's "L'Amazone," Jean Fonson's "La Kommandantur," and François Porché's "Les Butors et la Finette." Bataille's young heroine, having taken refuge from the invasion with relatives, becomes both their good and evil genius. Active and cheerful, despite her affliction, the little sorceress captivates everybody. In order to resist her charm and escape her caustic remarks about slackers, M. Bellanger, a husband without reproach, enlists, although he is past military age. But this beneficent influence the "Amazon" more than counterbalances by alienating his affection from his wife and daughter. When they learn that his testament, written at the front an hour before his death, is addressed to the intruder, their cup of bitterness overflows. Little wonder, therefore, that Mme. Bellanger's ghost, appearing to the "Amazon" after the war, should serve to break up her marriage and drive her into charitable work.

If Bataille's characters seem abnormal, those of Jean Fonson were, on the contrary, decried by the spectators at the Gymnase for too intense realism, much to the author's surprise, since his drama, "La Kommandantur," with its Belgian setting, had enjoyed a successful run in London. But the brutality of the German invasion, as here depicted, proved too shuddering a spectacle for the

TIFFANY & Co.

TIFFANY & Co.'S SILVERWARE

MADE IN THEIR OWN SHOPS IS NOT SOLD ELSEWHERE

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

French, who, unlike the English, had suffered the horrors of a similar devastation.

It is to the desire to avoid shocking realism that we owe François Porché's allegory, "Les Butors et la Finette," the best French drama of the war. Thanks to disguise, symbolism, and transposition, the play attains its purpose without exhibiting the repulsive terrors of actuality. La Finette, a personification of recent France, young, light-hearted, generous, a lover of the arts and sciences, becomes the victim of the Butors, who requite her hospitality by invasion and rapine. The Marshal, commander of the Butor armies, proposes harsh peace terms, but the faithful subjects of the Princess repel the brutal invader. Her marriage to a man of the people will insure to the country democratic government. Porché's allegory in vers libre thus appeals to popular sentiment. Rich in well-balanced contrasts, it excels as a portrait of the French populace. By blending symbolism and observation, lyricism and analysis, fantasy and truth, the dramatist has invented a form ranging from notes nearest prose to the fullest poetic strain. We can well understand why the audience at the Théâtre Antoine applauded the piece night after night, some spectators in their enthusiasm proclaiming it as the peer of "Cyrano."

WILLIAM H. SCHEIFLEY

The Canadian Trades and Labor Congress

ON the 20th of September next, in the city of Hamilton, Ontario, the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada will hold the thirty-fifth annual convention. This year that meeting will be of exceptional importance. The Congress has at last joined hands with the American Federation of Labor in a crusade against the One Big Union movement. Official steps on the part of organized labor in Canada have been taken, this week, to suppress the policy or influence of this "One Big Union," which is on the lines of the I. W. W.

The President of the Congress, Mr. Moore, has appointed a deputy to act for him in the West. The choice fell upon Mr. R. A. Rigg, former Vice-President of the Congress, and ex-member of the Manitoba legislature. Mr. Rigg lost no time. He was appointed on last Saturday, and on Monday he was in Winnipeg. His field of activities will extend from Winnipeg to the Pacific Coast. This action was taken with the object of having constituted union authority observed and for the restoration of confidence in legitimate trade unions.

In speaking to the writer the President of the Trades and Labor Congress made this clear explanation: "People have got into our organization who have ulterior motives and it is necessary, if confidence is to be restored in legitimate trade unions, that energetic measures should be instituted to see that constituted trades union authority be observed."

This week a man named Mike Hulyk was arrested at a place called Lac du Bonnet, near Winnipeg, as a registered alien who traveled without a permit. He is a fair sample of the scores of foreigners who have come into the country, with the avowed intention of advocating the overthrow of all constituted government—federal, provincial, or municipal.

Many of the International trade union executives are arranging to send Canadian representatives into the western provinces, with the intention of cleansing the movement of those who are advocating the policies of the O. B. U. The American Federation of Labor is now directly represented in Winnipeg by Mr. William Varley, ex-business agent of the Builders' Trades Union of Toronto.

This indicates the beginning of a struggle by the legitimate trades union movement as a whole to rid itself completely of the advocates of revolutionary action. The envoys of the I. W. W. have unceasingly misrepresented the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, and have sought to make it appear that organized labor in the Dominion was in sympathy with the "Red" propaganda that has caused so much trouble of late.

It is high time that such action should be taken. One of the great mysteries of the situation, during the heat of the recent Winnipeg disturbances, was the apparent inactivity, the seeming indifference, the positive silence of the most important body in Canada—the Trades and Labor Congress. It is well that action has been taken by the executive of that organization, otherwise it is difficult to see how its officers could face the convention of September next. This action, taken in a determined manner and firmly kept up, will go a long way to clear the atmosphere and to allay the unrest that has troubled the breast of society since the war ceased.

J. K. F.

Ottawa, Canada, July 8

Books Received

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Barker, Elsa. Last Letters from the Living Dead Man. Mitchell Kennerley. $1.50 net.

Crawford, W. J. Experiments in Psychological Science. E. P. Dutton. $2.00.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Benedict, Bertram. A History of the Great War. Vol. I. Bureau of National Literature.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

Culbertson, William Smith. Commercial Policy in War Time and After. Appleton. $2.50 net.

ESSAYS AND CRITICISM

Alpha of the Plough. Leaves in the Wind. E. P. Dutton. $2.50 net.

EDUCATION

Alexander, Hartley B. Letters to Teachers. Open Court Publishing Co.

Ford, J. D. M. Main Currents of Spanish Literature. Henry Holt. $2.00.

TO BE PUBLISHED JULY 23d!!

$1.75 everywhere, postage 10c extra

THE TAKER

By DANIEL CARSON GOODMAN, Author of "Hagar Revelly"

This new novel by Mr. Goodman is an even more masterful and absorbing picture of reality than his widely discussed "Hagar Revelly." He has shown us here the souls of a man and some women in such a way as to reproduce the very color of existence.

WHAT THE CRITICS SAY:

Goodman is an author of the first rank among those civilized writers interested in a serious development of our native literature.—Chicago Evening Post.

"He goes direct to life for his material and deals honestly and reverently with what he finds."—Ida M. Tarbell.

Mr. Goodman is a sincere, powerful man of letters. Now and again such as he will appear, be suppressed or ignored by the chumps, and praised by those who appreciate good work. After a hundred years we shall perhaps erect monuments to such as he on Boston Common.—John Macy, in The Boston Herald.

Mr. Goodman writes with a power that reminds us of Thomas Hardy.—Review of Reviews.

BONI & LIVERIGHT, 111 W. 40th Street, N. Y.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 11

New York, Saturday, July 26, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	221
Editorial Articles:
The Senate and Shantung	223
The Coal Crisis in Great Britain	224
The New Privileged Classes	225
The Flivver Mind	226
T. M. Osborne, Seaman 2	227
Wilson and the Senate. By Edward S. Corwin	228
Caveat Negotiator. By Ralston Hayden	229
The Trial of Townley and Gilbert	230
Correspondence	231
Book Reviews:
Dr. Hill's Views on the League	232
From Mons to Ypres	234
The Six-Hour Day	236
Living Greece	236
The Run of the Shelves	237
Parnell Redivivus. By William Archer	238
Amy Lowell's Collection of Modern Verse	240
On Literary Conviviality. By C. W. P.	240

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

YOU'RE damned if you do and you're damned if you don't—that is the situation into which the prohibition mania has plunged the country. Even some of the most relentless of the Anti-Saloon League champions in the House are balking at the enactment of search-and-seizure provisions which, not many years ago, would have aroused fierce resentment in every American breast, and which it is feared that even in their present estate the American people will not submit to. But whether the line be drawn at one point or another, the mischief in the main is done. It was done when the nation was put into the strait-jacket of the Eighteenth Amendment. You may ease it up more or less, but it will be there all the same; and it is an open question whether the country will be better off with a strait-jacket of the most thorough-going kind or with one that will gall less but may fail to do its work. As a choice of evils, we, for our part, prefer to have the invasion of personal liberty kept within as moderate limits as possible; but we can not deny that if the law stops short of the despotism of private life which the extremists advocate there will be consequences that are far from edifying. And one of them, the difference between the rich man's and the poor man's chance to get a drink, may take on an aspect more serious than many of us seem to imagine.

THE race trouble in Washington is a matter for national grief and humiliation not only because it has taken place at the Federal capital, and not only because the lawlessness was so largely the work of men wearing the uniform of the armed forces of the United States. While both these circumstances greatly aggravate the seriousness of what has happened, the mere fact that it took the shape of a real clash between whites and blacks, of riots in which the negro population as a whole was terrorized and struck back, gives it a seriousness of a kind not belonging to the ordinary lynching. The fiendish barbarities of most of the Southern lynchings of the past ten or twenty years has been such as no language can do justice to; but at least the individuals thus hunted and tortured either were, or were supposed to be, guilty of some crime. It has only been in exceptional cases that the mob, after satisfying its lust for vengeance, extended its persecution to the colored population of the place indiscriminately. This has been the one redeeming feature of race troubles in the South in general. In Washington we have not the barbarities of the lynching bee, but on the other hand we are face to face with what if not checked will in the long run be an incomparably graver evil. Upon the authorities, local and national, rests the duty of taking measures so prompt, so energetic, and so comprehensive, as to put an absolute stop to the trouble in its first beginnings.

UNTIL the other day we took no interest in Henry Ford's libel suit against the Chicago Tribune. There are some natures so inherently preposterous as to be morally immune from both caricature and libel. Mr. Ford seemed to us to belong to that class. And there are some newspapers from which abuse is negligible. The Chicago Tribune, with its record of pro-Germanism approaching disloyalty seemed to fall into that category. Accordingly the lawsuit appeared a pot and kettle dispute without general significance. We began to be interested when a recent cross-examination revealed certain characteristics of Mr. Ford's mind. He gave a very striking demonstration of a truth which the world is just beginning to grasp, that while the attainment of great wealth implies ability of some sort, the possession of millions is no guarantee that the owner commands either common sense or superior intelligence. We must extend to multimillionaires the charity that has in the past been reserved for artistic genius. The gift in either case seems a special one. Outside their specialty, no one need take them too seriously.

AMONG the unusual elements in the situation between the President and the Senate is to be counted Mr. Wilson's statement to the newspaper men that a two-thirds vote would be requisite for the insertion of any qualifying resolutions in the Senate's ratification. Whether this was an off-hand remark or the deliberate expression of the President's position it is impossible at present to say. There is no doubt, however, of the Senate's own view—quite aside from any partisan or other division among its members. The Senate has a long-standing rule on the subject, which declares that a majority vote is sufficient for the adoption of any proposed qualification. This rule, of course, will stand.

It is possible that the President may have made his statement quite deliberately, and yet not have meant to challenge the Senate's rule. What is going on all along the line is a measuring of strength between the two sides, and this question of two-thirds or majority may be looked upon as simply a phase of that game of matching strength. Looking forward to the final stage in the process, Mr. Wilson may believe that his side will be strong enough to say: "You have the power to inject your reservations by majority vote. But we regard them as fatal to the treaty, and we shall be bound to vote against an instrument that we know to be futile. Since you don't command a two-thirds vote, the treaty will be defeated; but it will be you, not we, that are responsible—and it is a responsibility that you will not dare to shoulder."

The adoption of such a position is manifestly out of the question except upon the assumption that public sentiment had been shown to be overwhelmingly opposed to the reservations. At present there is little reason to expect any such condition. But everything depends on the wisdom and moderation with which the Republican leaders may shape their programme. A proper scheme of reservations will not meet with pronounced dissent in the country at large. A plan good enough to hold together in its favor a majority of the Senate will also be good enough, in all probability, to place the odium of rejection of the treaty upon those directly responsible for the rejection. The reservations must be such that reasonable men will feel that they are not designed to endanger the treaty; if that is taken care of, everything else will take care of itself.

THE Nation has routed the defenders of Kolchak—horse, foot, and dragons. It prints an official dispatch of January 25, 1919, "for Colonel House from Bullard, Tokio," to which the Nation "is happy to give first publication," which states that Kolchak's "personality is of small significance," that he is "dependent on the support of reaction elements," that "several units have already revolted against the brutality of officers," and that Allied support of him "is a feature regrettable." The mere fact that this communication came from a person officially employed by the United States might, of course, not make it the last word on the subject. But the Nation has grounds more relative than this. With impressive brevity, it appends to the dispatch merely this simple comment:

Mr. Bullard was, next to Mr. Sisson, Mr. Creel's star reporter in Russia.

Only two removes from the great Creel, and almost as authoritative as Sisson! No wonder the Nation is happy.

THE attitude of some urban communities, and especially of New York, toward the traction problem is one of the anomalies of the moment. A community is generally proud of its steam railroad, or wishes it could be proud of it. But nobody loves a trolley car; the Subway Sun fails to warm the heart. Such indifference, studied in some quarters and quite thoughtless in most, must at no distant time be faced with the reckoning. A very simple arithmetic will bring in the answer to doubled costs and stationary income. We do not pretend to suggest the extent or precise form of the obviously necessary remedy. That, clearly, is matter for a commission with power to make adjustments appropriate to conditions. There is some promise in the fact that the Federal Electric Railways Commission is taking testimony.

It is to be hoped that some sort of settlement may be reached on broad grounds and general principles. The matter is too big to be allowed to go by default, while the public, effectively abetted by an ignorant and opinionated city government, looks on in indifference or in unreasoning and superficial hostility. It would be pleasant to retain in our life as a sort of curiosity one thing that hasn't gone up with all the rest. But it is too expensive a luxury. When the crash comes the disturbance of credit will, through insurance companies and savings banks, reach to the plainest citizen. The individual holders of securities will, of course, comfort themselves as they may. And the public will pay the bill in the form of greatly increased fares and the poor service that goes with the extravagant inefficiency of municipal ownership.

IT is interesting and almost amusing to find the Non-Partisan League posing as followers of Henry George, while the genuine single-taxers pat the young neophytes on the head as though they really expected them to grow into full mental stature in the course of time. Little fish will become big fish if God lets them grow—unless they are tadpoles. There was and is unimproved land in the Northwest. The railways had some, and non-resident speculators bought it. Then, too, some land is owned by that class of undesirable citizens known as retired farmers. No farmer should ever retire. Moreover, some bona-fide horny-handed settlers are unwilling or unable to improve their land as they should. What simpler way of dealing with all these "parasites" than to tax them on the unimproved value? Then those who can improve their land will do so, and those who can not will sell to better men. Thus non-resident holding will be done away. Tenancy will diminish and the unearned increment will belong to the people. Landless men may see much merit in this scheme, but will the farmers of the West carry it through to its logical conclusion? Will they agree to raise all local and State and Federal revenue by a tax on land values, until the whole economic rent—and thus the whole capital value of land—is taken away and all landholders in town and country become tenants of the people? Nothing short of this will satisfy the simon-pure single-taxers and the landless men for whom they speak. Perhaps the farmers already see the direction in which they are being led—perhaps not.

A SOMEWHAT encouraging straw in the housing situation is to be found in the rapid rate at which building operations have been resumed at Springfield, Mass., according to a detailed account given in the Springfield Repub- lican. Despite the bad outlook for a building revival during the early spring months, the half-year closed with a total of $2,159,000, which is more than double the amount of building done in the whole of the year 1918. It is expected that the year will close with a record of approximately 150 new one-family houses and 100 new two-family houses. The character of the development is worth noting:

A large part of the new dwelling house construction is going forward in sections of the city that are being developed by real estate men. Sections that only a few years ago were covered with scrub growth of oak and birch have been laid out and reclaimed by real estate men. Many of these sections which were in the making three or four years ago are now pretty residential sections.

This is characteristic of what goes on generally in the extension of building in our cities, and those who imagine that the great obstacle to such extension is to be found in speculative "holding of land out of use" are invited to consider whether it is holding out of use or putting into use that preponderates as the result of leaving the development of urban and suburban sites to the free play of supply and demand—speculation or no speculation.

WHATEVER may be the exact amount of the indemnity which Germany will have to pay, it is obvious that it can not be paid in gold, but must in the main be paid in goods. The world, therefore, must either trade with Germany or forego the indemnity. During the war the importation of beet-sugar, chemicals, dyes, cutlery, toys, and other goods made in Germany was prohibited, and in their fierce indignation at her atrocities many people in the Entente countries vowed that they would never use German-made goods again. The manufacturers encouraged them in this resolve, for they were enjoying high profits, which they hoped would continue until they had at least got the money back which they had expended on capital account. Now, however, the indemnity looms large, and people are becoming reconciled to the thought of trading with their former enemy. For many years to come imports of ordinary goods from Germany must greatly exceed exports of such goods to that country. Many manufacturers will not like this, but the Allied countries as a whole can not be impoverished by the addition to their national supply.

MR. MAX EASTMAN, in a spirited defense of the "proletarian revolution," describes "democracy," "liberty," "suffrage," "responsible government," "free speech," "the right of assembly," "the people," as "plausible ideologies and moralistic disguises of the rule of capital." Mr. Eastman, doubtless, can put searching questions to the capitalistic régime, but one question, searching or otherwise, may be put to Mr. Eastman. "Democracy" and the rest are disguises. Does a man borrow his disguises from his friends or his enemies? What is the disguise of atheism? Piety. What of knavery? Uprightness. What of lying? Candor. The relation between a disguise and its wearer is one of opposition. The German spy wears the English or American uniform. Let us assume, for argument's sake, that capital is fiendish. What follows? If the Devil can quote Scripture for his purpose, shall Mr. Eastman throw our Bibles into the fire? If all those good things in our inherited Magna Charta, which become evil things for Mr. Eastman by simply passing under the awnings of quotation marks, are disguises of the iniquity of capital, they are opposed to that iniquity. Why, then, does Mr. Eastman wish to overthrow a bill of rights which is hostile to that very order of things to which Mr. Eastman himself is implacably opposed? If capital can compass its vile ends only by hoodwinking the Constitution, why go to the expense and trouble of abolishing the Constitution which many people are still foolish enough to love, when the same end could be more cheaply met by simply opening its eyes? If one's father has been fooled by an intriguer, is parricide the only remedy?

"THE social revolution," said a university professor from the Middle West, "is not coming, merely; it has already arrived, as I can show from my own experience. The other day I was going out to a country town to deliver a commencement address, when to my dismay I found that the train was likely to be late in starting, as there were several trucks of baggage and the men were painfully slow in loading the stuff. I wanted to help, but I feared that my interference might be misunderstood. Besides I did not want to spoil my best—and only—black suit of clothes, nor to disturb the serenity of mind so essential to a successful lecture. So, as I waited there, inwardly fuming, I entered into conversation with another bystander—the locomotive engineer, a burly Irishman in blue overalls—and presently I told him of my trouble, whereupon he very kindly said he would see what he could do in the way of making up time between stations. Then arose a problem which puzzled me not a little: should I or should I not offer him a tip—about a dollar, I thought, would be appropriate, which, indeed, I could well afford rather than miss my honorarium. I was on the point of taking out my purse when the conversation became confidential and he told me that his wages—he did not say 'salary'—were $300 a month. My own income I did not reveal, but I decided to keep my dollar, as I did not wish to offend him, although he was once a baggage-man. Besides, if the truth must be told, he did not need it as much as I, for he wore overalls costing, possibly, two dollars a pair; whereas my black suit, which had seen its best days, could not be replaced for sixty dollars, and I had other expenses due to my social position. My address took place as announced, and I was pleased to receive a liberal honorarium—professional fee, you understand. As to the kind engineer, I wrote him a letter of thanks, as I could reward him in no other way."

WHILE the clamor for a new world still continues, it may seem reactionary, if not silly, to protest against the defacing of a fine bit of old New York. Yet New York is in a peculiar sense a possession of the whole country, especially since the visits, during the past two years, of thousands upon thousands of Americans who had never been here before. In the progress up Fifth Avenue of the numerous processions that started at Washington Square and of the several missions from abroad, how much genuine admiration must have been expressed for the four corners at Ninth Street! Here the Avenue is furnished with a noble introduction. At one corner is the historic mansion of Henry Brevoort, recently bought by Mr. George F. Baker; diagonally opposite is the Mark Twain house, of which the present owner might, if he had been less public minded, have disposed at a handsome profit to the seekers for gain. On the southwest corner is the Berkeley, a dignified family hotel of only six stories, and the remaining corner is occupied by the brave relic of a former day, the house of the late General Sickles, whose side yard and hedge and magnolia tree have for years added a touch of beauty.

It is this corner, together with the two adjoining properties to the north, which it is now the intention to dismantle in order that an apartment house of thirteen and a half stories may be erected. Many persons, in private conversation, have characterized this project as almost criminal, and we believe that some concerted action might still defeat it. The plans have been filed, but, as we understand, have not yet been approved by the building commission. Let it be recalled that even after an auction of building lots on the historic site of Fort Washington had actually been advertised, an awakened public sentiment, culminating in a fine act of private liberality, effected a rescue. In the case of the Sickles house, granting that it must be replaced if the property is to be made to yield a proper return, the public has a deep interest in the preservation of the general architectural effect produced by the four corners. The time for action is short, but not too short if a few right-minded citizens will organize an energetic movement at once.

The Senate and Shantung

*P*LUS ça change, plus c'est la même chose—the more the situation in the Senate changes the more it remains the same. The new element that has been injected into it since the last number of the Review went to press is the Shantung question. On the face of it this introduced considerations affecting the question of ratification quite different from those which had previously been the centre of controversy. Instead of the general merits of the League of Nations, a specific international issue involving the gravest possibilities suddenly took possession of the field. For a time it even seemed as though this issue might so overshadow that of the League Covenant as to become the real fighting ground between the President and his opponents in the Senate. But, while we have by no means heard the last of the Shantung question, it is already plain that it will play the part not of a separate and capital issue, but of a mere accompaniment of the general situation. In the various estimates of strength that continue to be made so industriously at Washington the count, real or imaginary, is made on the same basis as before; acceptance, or reservation, or amendment—these are the lines of division, and not any particular opinion concerning Japan and Shantung.

If the Senate were a debating society, or if the American people were being called upon to pass judgment on the abstract merits of a proposed settlement of the world's affairs, all this might be pronounced highly illogical. As a matter of fact, it is the most logical thing in the world. Although the division in the Senate has been almost entirely on party lines, it rests at bottom on perfectly rational differences of opinion. But these differences can not in the nature of the case have the free play of academic divergences of thought. The dominating fact of the situation is the imperious necessity of bringing the world's settlement to a close. On the Democratic side this has naturally had the effect of keeping the party in an almost unbroken mass unwaveringly with the President. On the Republican side it has practically paralyzed every attempt that has been made at radical opposition to the treaty. When the question of Shantung came up there was an outbreak of violent opposition and indignant censure, just as there was in regard to some of the features of the Covenant; but to all cool-headed observers it must have been evident from the start that when the realities of the situation were to be grappled with, these manifestations, whether sincere or not, would have but little connection with the Senate's final action. In the Shantung matter, as in the matter of the Covenant, the limits within which anything can be done are strictly circumscribed by the imperative necessity of promptly arriving at a settlement which will give the world the rest it so desperately needs.

There are a few extremists in the Senate who are, or who profess to be, ready to tear the treaty to pieces rather than permit Japan to have what it gives her in Kiaochow and Shantung, just as there are a few who are ready to tear it to pieces rather than assent to our entry into a League of Nations. But these men, who in their views are at the opposite pole from the international "idealists," are entirely at one with them in their gross ignoring of realities, past and present. Much as is obscure in regard to Japan's actions and intentions, there is one thing certain—that in the general clash of interests at Versailles what was granted to Japan was the least with which she would be content. That portentous consequences may possibly in the future result from the hold she has thus obtained upon China, it would be idle to dispute. But her demand is not made in pure wantonness; it is the equivalent that she claims for her part in winning the war, a claim that was in substance recognized by her European allies when her aid was felt to be essential. If we are quite sure that it is so flagrantly unjust, or so fraught with danger to ourselves, that we are ready to go to war with her rather than let it be granted, it is open to us plainly to assert that position; but the preposterousness of such a stand is too obvious to require any argument. It would be folly, and worse, in any circumstances; in the present state of the world it would be nothing less than criminal insanity. It may be well for the Senate to register its sense of the injustice done to China, and the desire of this country to bring about, through future negotiations, that restriction of her rights which in a general way Japan herself more or less distinctly promises; but it can not trifle with the possibility of smashing the Versailles settlement, making a mortal enemy of Japan, and throwing the world into chaos.

In all practical thinking upon this phase of the situation, as well as upon that involved in the League Covenant, the point of departure must be the substantial acceptance of the Versailles treaty. It is not a perfect instrument. But neither do its faults cry to Heaven, as some of its opponents imagine or pretend. It does not abolish the Constitution of the United States, it does not make us a slave of other nations. With the Monroe Doctrine clearly protected, the right to leave the League upon two years' notice safeguarded, and reasonable limitations attached to the obligations of Article X, the people of the United States can afford to give the League of Nations a fair chance to show what it can do. Not only will it be the duty of every one of us to help make the best of the League, but the same thing is true in regard to Japan and Shantung. Japan is not going to gobble up China in a day, nor will the influence of the United States, either in the League of Nations or in its relations to the individual countries concerned, suddenly become negligible. We are not of those who pretend that there is nothing more serious in Japan's pretensions regarding China than in those of Britain and France; Japan's ambitions are of a wholly different nature. But to magnify the possibilities of the future—to give them the character of a danger calling for immediate resistance, whatever the consequences—is to do precisely the kind of thing that Germany did when she made her fear of the "iron ring" a justification for plunging the world into the most terrible war of all history. To put the world on the way to recovery from the ruin of that war, and to give it all the chance we can for immunity from any repetition of the calamity, is the transcendent duty of the hour. Whatever can be done for the good of our nation, or of the world, compatibly with that duty, let us do. Whatever is not compatible with that duty we must unhesitatingly reject. And there is not the slightest question that any proposal that flies in the face of that supreme requirement will meet with the overwhelming condemnation of the American people.

The Coal Crisis in Great Britain

IT may seem absurd to say that the deliberations of the British Coal Commission, however important they may ultimately prove, have only a remote bearing on the critical emergency with which the industries of Great Britain are now confronted in consequence of the coal difficulty. Yet such is the conclusion to which one is almost driven upon consideration of the statement made a few weeks ago by the Coal Controller that the weekly output per miner is steadily falling, and that serious disaster threatens Great Britain from the decline of her most basic industry.

According to the Controller's estimate, the weekly output of coal per man in 1913 was 4.95 tons; during the first 20 weeks of 1919 it averaged 4.2 tons; and after July 16, when the 7-hour day begins, it will average about 3.78 tons—more than a whole ton less than the output per man in 1913. This means an annual reduction in output of more than 55,000,000 tons—nearly three-quarters of the surplus exported in 1913. The lack of coal for export has already prevented the import of pig-iron, as the ore ships can not get their former outward freight of coal. It also hampers the trade with Argentina and other countries from which Great Britain imports bulky raw materials and to which she sends a smaller tonnage of more valuable goods, together with a large amount of coal as ballast.

The question of the price of coal is even more serious. In order to meet the enhanced cost of production due to the concessions in wages and hours made to the miners, the Government lately announced that it would raise the price of coal six shillings a ton, this to take effect on July 16, and that it might be necessary to raise the price by nine shillings later on. This announcement came like a thunderbolt upon the British public, although they had every reason to expect it. Such an increase would almost kill the export trade in coal, already suffering from American competition, and it would strike at the root of all the other industries—the manufacture of steel and textiles, the railways, shipbuilding and shipping, gas works, electric plants, laundries, bakeries and whatnot—threatening so great an increase in the cost of production all along the line as to deprive Great Britain of a large part of her export trade, without which she can not support her population of 45,000,000 souls.

The announcement startled even the labor leaders, who had not fully realized the consequences of their demands. William Brace, President of the South Wales Miners' Federation, declaring that the miners loved their country and had no wish to ruin it, offered to cooperate with the Government in devising means for increasing the output, provided that the recommendations of the Coal Commission for the nationalization of the mines were carried out. The Government proposed a commission of inquiry into the causes of and remedies for the declining output, to report within three months, and agreed to postpone the six shilling increase until July 21, pending the decision of the Miners' Conference. The Conference insisted on nationalization as a prerequisite to any compromise, and the Government announced that the increase would take effect without further delay.

The present crisis is the outcome of long-standing trouble, which came to a head in January last, when the Miners' Federation of Great Britain asked for a 30 per cent. increase in wages, a reduction of the working day to six hours, and the nationalization of the mines. In this they were supported by the Triple Alliance or "Big Three," a formidable aggregation of miners, railwaymen, and transport workers, at the head of which is Robert Smillie, President of the Miners' Federation and the most outstanding figure among British labor leaders. The miners had the whip-hand, and the Government presently appointed a Commission consisting of representatives of the miners and mine owners, together with representatives of labor in general and employees in general, with the Hon. Mr. Justice Sankey as Chairman, to investigate and report. On March 20 the Commission made not one but three reports, that signed by the Chairman and the representatives of the employers in general being adopted by the Government. This gave the miners a seven-hour day beginning July 16, 1919, with a further reduction to six hours from July 13, 1921, provided the economic conditions of the industry should justify it. It allowed also an increase in wages of 2s. (48.7 cents) per day for adults and 1s. (24.3 cents) for workers under sixteen.

These conditions were fairly satisfactory to the miners, as it was understood that the Commission would continue its sessions and report on the question of nationalization at a later date. This final report was published on June 23, and about it the battle has raged until the present time. There were, in fact, four reports, as might have been expected from the composition of the Commission. The main report, signed by the Chairman and supported by the six labor and socialist representatives, recommended nationalization of the mines within three years, and immediate acquisition of coal royalties by the State, with proper compensation to the owners. The report of the six representatives of labor—Mr. Robert Smillie, Mr. Herbert Smith, and Mr. Frank Hodges, of the Miners' Federation, with Sir Leo Chiozza Money, Mr. R. H. Tawney and Mr. Sidney Webb—expressed substantial agreement with the main report, but demanded nationalization of royalties without compensation. Five of the representatives of employers—Sir Adam Munro, Mr. R. W. Cooper, Mr. Evan Williams, Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, and Sir Allan Smith—declared against nationalization in any form, but favored state ownership of the coal itself. The fourth report, signed by Sir Arthur Duckham only, opposed nationalization, but put forth a rather promising scheme for the amalgamation of colliery interests and better coöperation between employers and workers.

It is evident that the Commission, after all its investigation and discussion, had been avoiding the most pressing issue at stake; and, while wrangling about the distribution of the joint product of the mines, had almost forgotten that there might be little product to distribute. The miners might, of course, absorb the sixpence per ton which is paid in royalties, but they would not get rich on that. They might take the entire profits of the collieries—averaging about one shilling per ton during the five years before the war—but that would be to destroy the tap-root of private enterprise, from the decay of which they would be the greatest sufferers. They might—and this is what they wanted to do—force the Government to nationalize the mines; but there is good reason to think that, if this were done, the resulting inefficiency would eat up the sixpence of royalties and the shilling of profits, and force the Government, in addition, to subsidize the mines as they are now subsidizing the railways and bread, making up the deficit, as Sir Eric Geddes puts it, from the bottomless purse of the taxpayer. But that way lies national bankruptcy.

There is little hope for the British coal trade along any of these lines, and the sooner this is generally understood, the better for all concerned. The problem of distribution is not the most urgent question at the present moment, although most people think it is. The British miner has done pretty well in having his annual wages raised from $400 to about $825 during the war, even though the cost of living may have gone up somewhat more than that. Most wage-earners and salaried people have not fared so well, and if the miners are to escape their share of the war burden other wage-earners must bear more. True, the miners, with the Triple Alliance at their back, have the British public by the throat; but the time may come—and soon—when the strangle-hold will be relaxed, because the millions of the underpaid and unemployed, as well as some of the miners, will presently realize that it is better to have half a loaf than no bread.

As to the urgent need for more coal, and how to satisfy it, that is a problem for the miners and mine owners to work out, with what help they may receive from the Government. The Government is doubtless right in suggesting an investigation of the causes of the reduction of output, although it is a pity that this was not done before. It is said that the collieries are not properly organized, that there is wasteful management, nepotism, soldiering, lack of labor-saving machinery, as well as lack of good feeling between management and men. Perhaps the trouble has gone so far as to make a revolution inevitable—which is what some labor leaders desire. If so, there will be the devil to pay, and he is a hard master.

The New Privileged Classes

THE mental picture generally associated with social privilege has been about like this: One imagined portly people overfeeding expensively on a roof-garden, or speeding impassively in an impressive limousine, or lolling luxuriously about the silvery decks of a great steam yacht. As a matter of fact, we must learn to look for privilege elsewhere. The plutocrat of yesterday is coming to be about the least privileged person imaginable. He pays over from forty to sixty per cent. of his income to the Government and is still "Hooverizing" from habit, he uses his limousine to placate his restless domestics, his steam yacht has been patrolling for Uncle Sam at a charter figure of one dollar annually, and the damages which Uncle Sam prudently allots for roughest usage will just about give his whilom immaculate yacht the aspect of a fairly kept ocean tramp. If this be privilege, make the most of it.

No, we must seek privilege in new quarters. All Irishmen are privileged, all incendiaries who do not employ physical fire, all parlor socialists, in short agitators of every stamp. To their evident faults government is charitably blind, to their virtues of an extraordinary kindness. The other day the Russian democrats wished to hold a public meeting in New York. The authorities refused permission, on the ground that the police could not insure protection against the Bolsheviks. From the point of view of privilege, the case is instructive. It means that any sufficiently lawless and violent faction in New York can deny the right of public assembly to its political rivals. A little later the alleged President of the Irish Republic held his meeting uproariously. It was attended by many officeholders. The Irish flag was paraded beside our national ensigns. The audience indulged in gross and voluble disrespect of our Chief Magistrate. Professor Valera had just returned from a New England tour on which he was formally received by mayors and legislatures. Now one may believe the independence of Ireland desirable and due, without approving the indiscretion of our dictating to the British Government on the subject. Every public official who shared in these demonstrations was from the national point of view indulging in pernicious political activity, embarrassing the United States, and setting his racial sympathies before his duty as an American citizen. But the activities which were lately frowned on in the case of the militant German-Americans are generally condoned in the case of the militant Sinn Feiners. Only a few papers have had the courage to rebuke those whose American patriotism is plainly secondary to their hatred of the Saxon. Surely among the privileged classes the inimitable Irish are taking a foremost place.

The Flivver Mind

By a stretch of now obsolete privilege, a millionaire once remarked "the public be damned" and became proverbially odious thereby. To-day it is merely a tolerated vivacity to hint that the military authority of the United States and its national policy may be damned. This was shown clearly in the case of young Robert Minor. This enterprising young journalist sat at the feet of the Russian Bolsheviks, brought their greetings to the German Spartacists, and with the latter arranged to stir up the American army of occupation against their military duty of holding the Rhine. He concocted a manifesto in which he reminded American soldiers, among other things, that they were being drilled so that they should not think, and were being kept on the Rhine to oppress the workers of the world and to serve "the big bankers of Wall Street and of Paris and London and Berlin." While Mr. Minor was thus having the time of his life, he himself and his handbills were cleverly apprehended by the military authorities, and court-martial charges were drawn of a sort that virtually insured conviction and imprisonment for inciting the troops to mutiny. As luck would have it, however, Mr. Minor was not merely a member of the new privileged classes, but also a Texan. Proper representation to the omnipotent and inscrutable Colonel House secured the revocation of the court-martial charges by some power higher than the army. Mr. Minor is free to continue the sport of making American Spartacists, and the army stands rebuked for failing to recognize the prerogative of a typical representative of the new privilege.

We have perhaps sufficiently indicated the highroad to the new privilege. Getting rich is no longer of much use. It puts one in a suspect and proscribed class. Minding one's own business is even less advisable. It makes one uninteresting to the powers that be, and in case of trouble secures a regular and harsh application of the laws. Nobody loves or fears either a fat or a quiet man. Being what used to be thought a patriotic American is even less expedient. Responsibilities still adhere to the rôle, but no privileges of any kind. It shows a spirit too backward-looking and unenterprising. To enter the new privileged classes, one thing seems needful—a profound and vociferous contempt for American interests and institutions as they are, and withal a stalwart revolutionary spirit and an unwearied blattancy. Privilege has passed from those who are merely rich in dollars to such as are rich in the spirit of revolt.

IT is impossible not to feel sorry for Mr. Henry Ford. That he has brought his troubles on himself ought not to extract all human compassion from the laugh he has raised. He is in great part the victim of circumstances. As a nation we are too much given to encouraging ultra crepidam excursions on the part of our successful men. The man whose native ability in a particular field brings him into the public eye is under peculiarly dangerous temptation. He finds himself suddenly in the exploited class of the very rich, without knowing how to defend himself in the position. He does not feel the humility in the face of good fortune which the sudden inheritance of wealth might engender. He is cut off from the normal outlets of enjoyment which habituated possession of wealth would have furnished him. He lives in a million-dollar house, but he is not very comfortable in it. Art, music, and literature afford him neither relaxation nor stimulus. For sports he has neither time nor inclination. For the disposal of his wealth to the general good he is wholly dependent on the possible wisdom of others. Even the simple social relations which he is qualified to enjoy are probably pretty well spoiled for him by the encumbrance of riches.

Some of these things he may learn to use, but the road may well be a hard one. It will be the more difficult in proportion as he carries over into new fields the spirit and the methods that have made him successful in his own. There he has been a cloud-compeller, a moulder of men, tyrannical over circumstance; in short, a success. Having once in his life rushed in with a success denied to angels, he feels no proper distrust of his own powers to keep him from rushing in again and yet again under a special license of Providence. The prey of every designing person, of every sort of intriguing suggestion, his overweening self-confidence marks him as the hero of an inevitable tragi-comedy. Bid him run for the Senate, for the Senate he runs. Suggest to him that war is a terrible thing—very well, we will stop the war. Persuade him that someone has written him down an anarchist—he starts a libel suit the only possible result of which, regardless of legal decision, is to write him down an ass.

It is not Mr. Ford's large ignorances that make him ridiculous. A clever lawyer can, if he sets out, make a fool of almost anybody on the witness stand. In matters of this kind all the advantage lies with the attacking party. The victim soon becomes sullen, frivolous, or fatigued to the point of admitting anything that promises soon to get it all over with. We know very few people who could at a moment's notice discourse informingly on the causes of the War of 1812. Most of us have flivver minds, and they are quite good enough for the day's business, and indeed a credit to the possessor, since many people have no minds at all. For the flivver is versatile as well as wonderfully efficient. It will saw wood and haul a plough, besides an apparently unlimited number of the owner's uncles, cousins, and aunts. It may even, with a self-starter, oversized tires, and shock-absorbers, present an impressively stylish appearance. But it is still a flivver, and there are lots of things in this world of sin and sorrow that a flivver ought not to try to get straight. The flivver mind, even though endowed with wealth, surrounded by people fertile in ideas for the ingenious spending of it, its considerable vacuities stuffed with good intentions, ought also to be willing to recognize its limitations.

The trouble lies not with Mr. Ford's ignorance, painful as the exhibition of it may be to himself and to the world. It lies with the things he has been pathetically brought to believe that he knows. There again he does not deserve unqualified blame. He merely repeats as best he can what he supposes, not without reason, to be the views of all really superior minds. He will be an ignorant idealist if he must, but an idealist he will be. The lure of intellectual display is stronger and subtler than the attraction of mere material ostentation. And material ostentation does not command the attention it once did. But when a dazzling intellectual display means only a magnification of one's own native kindly and generous, if muddled, feelings, the lure is irresistible.

"History is bunk. I live in the present." Have we not in New York a school where some of our ablest intellectuals are dedicated to the scientific establishment of this proposition?

"I was against preparedness." Were not all our humanitarians in like case?

"War is murder." Would any conscientious objector, whether he happened to be caught in the toils of the draft or not, presume to doubt it?

"The war was engineered by the newspapers and the bankers for profit." The Nation would not put it so crudely.

"The Germans drank beer and the French drank wine. That made them irritable and started the war." The country is now ruled by a group of people who would regard such a theory as quite irrefutable.

"I would hoist the flag of humanity." There are plenty who would pull down the stars and stripes for him, if he didn't care to do it himself.

"If the war just concluded does not bring universal peace, I am in favor of another great war without delay to clean up the situation." All our ex-pacifists are looking forward quite excitedly to this war.

If not the very words, these are the things which Mr. Ford allowed himself to be persuaded it was his duty to preach to his countrymen. We may blame him for being gullible. Most of us will not wish to blame him too much. Like Mr. Ford we are very easy-going. In action, the American people often, like Mr. Ford, exhibit traits that argue something like an infantile mind—a mind that dwells in a world almost unreal, where things most unattainable come for the asking and achievement seems to wait only for the outstretched hand. In this view, the gulling of Mr. Ford, the exploitation of his wealth and his good-natured ignorance, becomes a moral fable of such tremendous import, conveys a warning so clear and to the point, that his own pitifully diminished head sinks quite out of sight.

T. M. Osborne, Seaman 2

LIEUT.-COMMANDER Thomas Mott Osborne, alias "Tom Brown" of Auburn Penitentiary, is again alias something or other and wearing the undress whites of a seaman in the crew's quarters of the North Dakota. Mr. Osborne thus hopes to obtain a vivid and correct knowledge of the life and especially of the grievances of the enlisted men with a view, presumably, to extending to the navy generally the humane policy he has initiated in Portsmouth Naval Prison. Mr. Osborne's adventure has the high sanction of the Secretary of the Navy. The occasion of this temporary demotion is said to have been the remark of a seaman of the North Atlantic Fleet who insisted upon a general court martial because he felt sure of better treatment as a prisoner at Portsmouth than he could get on any ship.

We have a real admiration for Mr. Osborne, who has the gift of putting abundant heart into his work for prisoners. We believe that every serious report of brutality in the army or navy should be thoroughly investigated. The admirable legal protection which all enlisted men have under regulations can be made worthless through the negligence of a commanding officer or the high-handedness of the petty officers immediately in charge of the men. Our Navy tradition is such that mistreatment of the enlisted force is most exceptional. For all that, vigilance is the price of the seaman's liberty. We are glad Secretary Daniels followed up what frankly seems to us an unpromising lead.

Whether Mr. Osborne will get any substantial benefit for the Navy out of his month of travesty, we very much doubt. There is an inherent defect in all these histrionic researches. A zealous economist, the late Prof. Walter Wyckoff, swung pick and wielded shovel for wages in order to understand the life of the common laborer. At the end of some months of such investigation, he was honest enough to avow that what he had learned was how a scholar felt when he was playing a laborer's part. What Mr. Osborne is likely to learn is merely how a warm-hearted millionaire feels when he is pretending he belongs in the fo'c'sle. Moreover, though Mr. Osborne is serving incog, he has also been well advertised and is doubtless known. That creates a situation which, ticklish anywhere, is trebly so on shipboard. What would we not give to hear the tales that are being poured into Seaman Osborne's sympathetic ear—horrors to stagger a Marryat, a Herman Melville, a Dana; complications of discipline that never were on sea or land, the entire bright repertory of the sea lawyer under advantages the sea lawyer has never before enjoyed. Mr. Osborne is likely to have thrills for a lifetime, but we much doubt if his month as a sailor will be very informative. He is after all an outsider in the Navy, though a valued one, and the Navy, from Admiral to Mess Attendant 4, is a close corporation which needs a lot of knowing. Even the seaman who preferred Portsmouth to a superdreadnought may not have spoken from bitter depths. He may have been just an Irishman delicately "kidding the Lieutenant-Commander along."

The adventure has a more serious side. It isn't the habit of naval officers to slip into enlisted men's uniforms for purposes of even the most high-minded spying. In particular, a naval officer who should do this on a brother officer's ship would be likely to be sent to Coventry. Only the gravest emergency could justify such a procedure. The layman may be inclined to make light of such issues of etiquette as finespun. But it is precisely these traditions of scrupulously honorable conduct that make the American Navy what it is. It is the weakness of Secretary Daniels, who generally has developed greatly while in office, that his open-hearted enthusiasm for enlisted men renders him somewhat blind to the more delicate considerations that make the efficient and respected officer. But imagine a fine young Cuban War officer, such as Lieutenant Richard Wainwright, in disguise aboard Captain "Bob" Evans's "Texas" to see if there were anything amiss below decks.

Such expedients are not even useful in any broad sense. If the Navy has reason to suspect something is going wrong on a ship, it has merely to detail to the vessel a competent petty officer from the Intelligence Department, and in a week whatever there is in the story will be made perfectly clear. It isn't necessary for officers to put off their proper uniform and assume that of their men in order to find whether a Chief Bo's'n's Mate is manhandling his mates or not. Every experienced division officer knows to the smallest detail the needs and the grievances of the men in his division. No one who has occupied such a position is much inclined to credit discoveries in his division, even by the most eminent casual aboard ship. No very bad business can go on except through the utter incompetence of the division officers, who are as a class carefully selected, highly efficient, and usually in a genuinely paternal relation to their men.

We can unreservedly commend Lieutenant-Commander Osborne's enterprise only from the point of view of advertising. Unquestionably his adventures as "Tom Brown" of Auburn Prison were incomparable advance publicity for the useful work Warden Osborne was to do in cleaning up Sing Sing. We doubt if it had any other value. A competent investigator, acting in his own person, could, we believe, have got the essential information on easier terms. When the New Jersey State Prisons were recently overhauled, nobody pretended to be a convict. If it is advertising of a reform crusade that Mr. Osborne has in mind, he must, like all advertisers, be judged simply by results. If he resumes his proper uniform with any important new tale to unfold or reform to effect, his service as a seaman will give picturesque and force to his plea. For the public takes a childish delight in disguise for benevolent intent, whether in or out of the Arabian Nights. If Mr. Osborne, on the contrary, comes back to the quarter-deck empty handed, he will have made himself pretty ridiculous, as having, with however good intent, needlessly offended against the customs of naval service the world round.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra. Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Wilson and the Senate

THE issue between the President and the Senate over the ratification of the Covenant is developing a struggle for power between parties and between two branches of the national Government that is of really historic dimensions. It is true that thus far both sides to the controversy have deprecated the charge of "partisanism" as explanatory of their respective attitudes, but there is no good reason why they should do so; and still less is there reason for the Senatorial opponents of the League to fight shy of the other charge which has been leveled against them, that they are waging war upon the President's programme in order to vindicate "the dignity and prerogatives of the Senate." The maintenance of the Constitutional prerogatives and dignity of an important branch of the Government is itself a matter of moment; and that must be an exigent issue indeed which is capable of relegating it to a secondary or incidental rôle.

In a striking passage of his "Promise of American Life," Mr. Herbert Croly passes estimate upon the outcome of the protracted struggle which took place in Jackson's time between the President and the Senate. It resulted, he says—I quote from recollection—in a victory for the President "because the people decided for him," "as they must always do" when the occupant of the Presidential chair is a man "no worse than Andrew Jackson" and his antagonist a man "no better than Henry Clay." Is this interesting verdict applicable to the contest which to-day impends? That is to say, Woodrow Wilson being no worse than he is and Henry Cabot Lodge being no better than he is, which way ought popular sympathy to incline in a struggle for power between the institutions represented by these two men?

There is no quarreling with Mr. Croly's complacency over Jackson's triumph, for had not the Presidency been aggrandized at the moment when John Marshall was sinking into his grave and the powers of Congress were being brought more and more under the surveillance of a jealous particularism, of which the Senate itself was the very citadel, the cause of the Union would have had in 1861 no rallying-point. But the situation has altered since then, and to-day the question is not the preservation of the Union, it is the preservation of constitutional government in face of an almost world-wide tendency towards one-man power. Confronted with such a situation, the Senate may be very well warranted in feeling that it ought to insist somewhat upon "its dignity and prerogatives."

In his lectures on "Constitutional Government in the United States," which were published in the spring of 1908, Mr. Wilson discovers three seats of authority in the national Government, to wit, the Presidency, the Senate, and the Speakership of the House of Representatives. Since then the Speakership has been put in commission in great part, so that to-day, if the President is to be effectively checked, it is the Senate which must do the business. Nor has any writer presented the claims of the Senate to popular confidence more appealingly than Mr. Wilson himself, in the volume just cited. The Senate, he declares, "represents the country, as distinct from the accumulated populations of the country, much more fully and much more truly than the House of Representatives does." It is a place, too, "of individual voices," and "the suppression of a single voice would radically change its constitutional character." (There is no thought here, it will be noted, of stigmatizing the "wilfulness" of "little groups.") Again, the men who make up the Senate are "men much above the average in ability and in personal force," and if they are not always wise counsellors, still their "experience of affairs is much mellowed than the President's can be," for "the continuity of the Government lies in the keeping of the Senate more than in the keeping of the executive, even in respect of matters which are of the especial prerogative of the presidential office."

Turning then to the subject of the relations of the President and the Senate in the control of appointments to office and treaty-making, Mr. Wilson writes:

There can be little doubt in the mind of any one who has carefully studied the plans and opinions of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 that the relations of the President and Senate were intended to be very much more intimate and confidential than they have been; that it was expected that the Senate would give the President its advice and consent in respect of appointments and treaties in the spirit of an Executive Council associated with him upon terms of confidential coöperation rather than in the spirit of an independent branch of the Government, jealous lest he should in the least particular attempt to govern its judgment or infringe upon its prerogatives.

Unfortunately this idea has not in general prevailed, and the relations between the two branches have fallen too often under the control of a spirit of distrust, mitigated to some extent by a sort of "customary modus vivendi, as of rival powers. The Senate is expected in most instances to accept the President's appointments to office, and the President is expected to be very tolerant of the Senate's rejection of treaties, proposing but by no means disposing even in this chief field of his power." However, there have been "one or two Presidents of unusual sagacity" who have recurred to something like the earlier practice, as any President is free to do:

He may himself be less stiff and offish, may himself act in the true spirit of the Constitution and establish intimate relations with the Senate on his own initiative, not carrying his plans to completion and then laying them in final form before the Senate to be accepted or rejected, but keeping himself in confidential communication with the leaders of the Senate while his plans are in course—in order that there may be veritable counsel and a real accommodation of views instead of a final challenge and contrast. The policy which has made rivals of the President and Senate has shown itself in the President as often as in the Senate, and if the Constitution did indeed intend that the Senate should in such matters be an Executive Council it is not only the privilege of the President to treat it as such, it is also his best policy and his plain duty.

Could a more telling indictment be penned of President Wilson's entire course in connection with the League of Nations Covenant? Here is a proposal of vital interest to every section of the country, a proposal not needing to be elaborated in secret, certainly not after the first draft of it was published some months ago, a proposal furthermore for the final perfection of which the utmost allowance of time is even yet available, since it is now the announced intention of the Allies to act for some months to come in carrying out the Peace Treaty through the Council of Five. Yet not only has the President never consulted with the Senate as a body about this proposal, nor with any of its leaders except in the most cursory fashion, but he has expended the greatest ingenuity in an endeavor to deprive the Senate of all freedom of action with reference to the proposal when this shall finally come before it. Writers on our political system with a bias in favor of executive authority are prone to criticize the legislative "rider," a device whereby a measure of minor importance is put safely past the danger of veto on the back of a more important or more urgent measure. It is safe to say, however, that concoctors of "riders" now have a new record in audacity set them. And in this connection it is pertinent to recall the announcement which was first given out from Paris regarding the proposed guaranty treaty with France. The President, we were told, had not positively committed himself to the arrangement but had promised to refer it to the Senate, presumably for advice. Yet, as compared with the Covenant, the guaranty treaty would mark a relatively slight departure from our national traditions. Little wonder that the President has subsequently abandoned his scruples about the lesser compact—the discrepancy in procedure would have been too glaring. Yet even as matters stand, the Senate is to be allowed a free hand with the guaranty treaty.

There are certain other facts which cast additional light upon the Constitutional significance of the impending struggle over the Covenant that may be set down more or less at random. On the debit side of the ledger for the President appear such facts as the Ishii agreement, which was never referred to the Senate; also the understanding between the United States and Great Britain, which was testified to by General March the other day before the Senate Military Committee, that both these Powers shall maintain a military establishment four times larger than before the war (we know now, perhaps, why President Wilson appealed to the country last autumn for a Democratic Congress); again, such facts as the numerous instances during the present Administration of wars waged without Congressional sanction, indeed, without Congressional knowledge; and the still more numerous instances of diplomatic appointments without reference to the Senate. Meantime, the demand for "open diplomacy," at least for democratic control of diplomacy, has been rising higher and higher throughout the world, while by the Seventeenth Amendment the Senate has been rendered a democratic body as never before.

Finally, it requires no extraordinary insight to perceive that if the League of Nations Covenant is ratified, the opportunity—indeed, the necessity—for independent Presidential action in the diplomatic field will be much augmented. This is not of itself a conclusive argument against ratifying the Covenant were it otherwise satisfactory, but it is a very powerful argument against the Senate's consenting to any unnecessary abdication of its participation in the shaping of our diplomatic policies.

EDWARD S. CORWIN

Caveat Negotiator

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.—Art. II, Sec. 2, Par. 2.

FOR the past century the relations between the President and the Senate in treaty-making have been vastly different from those which the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they drafted the treaty clause of that instrument, and from those which Washington attempted to set up. Our earliest international agreements were made in accordance with the theory that the obligation of the President to seek the advice and consent of the Senate extended to the entire process of treaty-making. Consequently before initiating a negotiation Washington at first formally secured Senatorial sanction not only of the general principles, but even of the detailed provisions of the proposed treaty. The Senate then very clearly felt that it was bound to accept the resulting agreement without amendment, provided that it conformed to the plan previously agreed upon. This feeling was based upon a spirit of fair play with the President, and upon an acknowledgment of the then generally recognized principle of international law that a government was virtually pledged to ratify what its agent had signed provided that the latter had acted within his powers. The President sought the concurrence of the Senate by personal consultation in the Senate chamber, by written communications presented and explained by the Secretary of War, or of State, or by messages delivered by his private secretary. The Senate acted by formal resolution, and in a number of instances gave its approval with qualifications by which it modified the proposed treaties as planned by the executive.

But procedure based chiefly upon theory can not long withstand the impact of practical politics, and the treaty-making process was soon modified by events. The terms in which the advice and consent of the Senate were given to the initiation and conduct of negotiations became decreasingly detailed; its scrutiny of signed treaties increasingly independent and critical. In 1793 an Indian treaty was negotiated independently of Senatorial advice. It was rejected. A year later, after consultation with his cabinet, Washington decided to conclude another such agreement without previously laying his plans before the Senate. He feared that should he do so his proposals would become known to the British Minister and the success of the negotiation be prejudiced. In this instance the Senate consented to ratification. It was in connection with the Jay treaty, however, that the established relations between the President and the Senate were subjected to the greatest political pressure. And in making it Washington frankly abandoned his earlier practice and substituted for formal consultation with the Senate a working agreement with the five Federalists who were the backbone of the administration party in that body. Because it seemed extremely unlikely that the Senate could be brought to agree upon any detailed plan which the President and his advisers might submit, it was recognized that if the legislative branch of the treaty-making power was to serve as a "council of advice" in the existing crisis it must be through the instrumentality of a small number of its members in whom both the executive and a majority of their colleagues had great confidence. In later years this became the normal procedure, with a standing committee on foreign relations composed of both majority and minority members acting the rôle first played by the five Federalist friends.

The permanent use of the method chosen in 1795 meant relinquishment by the Senate of its right and its duty to exert a direct and effective control over treaties in the making. At the same time, however, the new procedure relieved it from the obligation to assent to the ratification of those signed in accordance with terms previously agreed upon by it and the President. On the face of it the President was to have a free hand in deciding what treaties it was desirable to make, and in writing into them whatever of his policies he could lead the other parties thereto to accept; while the Senate retained a like freedom to accept, to amend, or to reject the results of his efforts. Obvious considerations, however, have impelled most Presidents to ascertain just what the other half of the treaty-making power would or would not approve before entering upon and during the course of a negotiation. The development of a recognized method of gaining this information was the next step in the evolution of our treaty-making process. Twenty years elapsed before it was achieved. During the interim it became customary for the Senate to approve by implication the general objects of a proposed treaty in confirming the nomination of the agents who were to negotiate it. This had been done in the case of the Jay treaty, and the precedent was followed down to and including the Treaty of Ghent.

Meanwhile, however, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations had come into existence. This body is the oldest standing committee of the Senate and the most interesting American political organ whose history is as yet unwritten. Ultimately it became the connecting link between the President and the Senate when performing their joint functions. Through it successive Presidents and Secretaries of State regularly ascertained the opinion of the Senate upon both the general and the particular objects to be sought by proposed negotiations. It enabled the Senate to influence the making of the treaty from the outset by exercising the three rights which Bagehot ascribed to English kings: "the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn." And like sensible and sagacious monarchs it needed no other powers. Nevertheless, the new procedure deprived the Senate of direct control over treaties during the stage of negotiation. Consequently its obligation to exercise its coordinate Constitutional powers completely and fearlessly at the time of ratification was proportionately increased. This obligation it has met in many familiar instances by the rejection or amendment of agreements which it could not sanction as they stood. In passing it is worthy of note that this means of liaison between the two branches of the treaty-making power was personal, informal, and secret. The record of its use is to be found only in chance letters and memoranda in the files of the State Department, and in the memoirs and the correspondence of the individuals directly concerned—sources unavailable until long after the events which they elucidate.

How does the Wilsonian picture fit into this historical background? Very evidently the President decided to collaborate with our allies in the conclusion of a general treaty of peace, to make the United States a signatory to a league of nations, and, later, to enter into a military alliance with France, without having consulted with either the Senate or its Committee on Foreign Relations. Nor did he give the statesmen who are now called upon to consent to the ratification of these treaties an opportunity to influence their making either by participating in the selection of the negotiators thereof, or by including one or more of their number in the American commission. At only one point during the course of the negotiations did he attempt to maintain contact with the Senate through the recognized medium of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In fact, he has failed to use any of the methods by which his predecessors from Washington down have enabled the Senate to perform, to greater or lesser degree, its Constitutional functions during the formative stages of treaty-making.

But although he has thus failed to elucidate the customary means of consulting with the Senate, does it necessarily follow that Mr. Wilson has actually negotiated these treaties without the guidance of its advice? To ask the question is to answer it. Senators have indeed "been daily cognizant of what was going on" at Paris. And what one among them all has been too humble, or too proud, to raise his voice in suggestion, encouragement, or warning? Has any President ever received so complete and frank an exposition of the sentiment of his Senatorial colleagues upon every essential provision of a treaty before the document was signed and sealed? The methods of Mr. Wilson are not those of his predecessors. They are not of the past, but very distinctly of the present. They are consonant with "open covenants, openly arrived at," and with the political theories which lie behind the phrase.

It should be recognized, then, that a new principle has been introduced into the relations between the President and the Senate in the negotiation of treaties. What is the resulting effect upon the situation of the two parties with reference to the ratification of the pacts which Mr. Wilson signed at Paris? Certainly if any conclusion can be drawn from the history of American treaty-making it is that the new procedure leaves the Senate absolutely free to accept, to amend, or to reject these treaties upon their merits. If the President's methods allowed him a singular freedom in following or ignoring the Senate's advice, his course has left to that body an equal independence in considering his treaties. Further, it may fairly be said that as Mr. Wilson has seen fit to substitute for long-established processes a new mode of ascertaining what his colleagues on the hill would or would not assent to, the responsibility for correctly gauging their sentiment rests squarely upon him. It is clearly a case of caveat negotiator.

Nevertheless, Senators are faced with a fait accompli. They, and the people of the United States, are told that very serious results will follow any attempt to modify the agreements made at Paris. There are those who declare that the magnitude of such evils is the measure of the Senate's duty to make the best of the treaties as they stand and promptly to give its advice and consent to their ratification. The opposing position is that this very difficulty of amendment laid upon Mr. Wilson a corresponding obligation to conclude only such agreements as the Senate would permit him to ratify. A consideration of the clear language of the Constitution and the practice of one hundred and thirty years of actual government can hardly leave a doubt that the latter view must prevail. Unquestionably there is a powerful presumption in favor of the acceptance of these treaties as they have been signed. But if the Senate is to maintain its place in our Constitutional system it must act with the courage of its convictions should it finally decide that amendment is necessary to protect the vital interests of the nation.

RALSTON HAYDEN

The Trial of Townley and Gilbert

THE trial of Mr. A. C. Townley, President of the National Non-Partisan League, and Mr. Joseph Gilbert, former organizer of the League, before the Circuit Court at Jackson, Minnesota, for "conspiracy to teach disloyalty during the war," came to an end on July 12, when the defendants were declared guilty by a jury of farmers. A stay of sentence until September 15 was granted by Judge E. C. Dean to permit the preparation of court records on a motion for a new trial.

Naturally the friends of the defendant allege that the whole proceeding was a "frame-up" by the big-business opponents of the League, but the court did not take that view of the case. They complain of the long delay in bringing on the trial, but the indictment was brought immediately after the offenses were committed, and the delay was caused by the appeal of the defense to the Supreme Court, which held up the trial for more than a year. Counsel for the defense wished to bring in positive evidence of the defendants' loyalty, but the court held that their business was to prove that they had not been disloyal. Finally, after the lawyers had been dismissed, on account of this decision, Mr. Townley arose in his shirt-sleeves and asked leave to speak in his own defense, but this request was refused by Judge Dean on the ground that he had been sufficiently represented by four able attorneys. These points will be brought before the Supreme Court of the State, and it will be interesting to see how they will be decided.

Among other evidence presented by the prosecution were statements of witnesses as to speeches made by the defendants, quotations from a pamphlet published by the League, and the testimony of F. A. Teigen, a former League organizer, that Mr. Townley told him in 1917, "We are against the war, but can't afford to advertise it."

The following quotation from the defendants' speeches have certainly a flavor of disloyalty, if nothing else:

We were stampeded into the war by newspaper rot, simply to pull England's chestnuts out of the fire. If this is such a great democracy why should we not vote on conscription? You may say this is sedition. If it is, make the most of it. I understand they are going to send a lot of coffins to France, but I hope they are not going to use them for our boys. (Mr. Gilbert at Kenyon, Minn., August 18, 1917.)

Jackson county officials wrapped themselves in the stars and stripes and spelled their patriotism with a P. A. Y.—the farmer boy of Minnesota and North Dakota should be left on the farm. They are better off on the farm than they are in the trenches 5,000 miles away. You farmers have worked harder than ever before. You have had to subscribe to the Liberty Loan, Y. M. C. A., and the Red Cross, and on top of all of that now they take your boys away. (Mr. Gilbert at Lakefield, January 23, 1918.)

You have already raised billions and billions of tons of food for your boys across the water and you are going to buy millions of tons back from the food gamblers. . . . I do not believe it is right for us to go to war and put the nation some billions of dollars in debt. Then when the war is over to ask these boys to come back and pay off the war debt. The rich man's boy is not going to go. He, the rich man, is making the rules of the game. . . . Hundreds and millions of the boys will be sacrificed; many will lose arms, legs, sight and hearing. They will come back to their mothers and sweethearts and the Government will give back what is left but no more. (Mr. Townley at Glencoe, June 21, 1917.)

Correspondence

Legislative Draftsmen

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In his interesting communication to the Review of June 28, Mr. L. F. Loree makes the following suggestion:

Bills which committees [of Congress] propose to report should be by them referred to a legislative draftsman with a view to practicability of enforcement, effect, clarity of language, and limitations of the Constitution.

A Legislative Drafting Service has already been created in Congress by Section 1303 of the Revenue Bill of 1918, which provides for a legislative draftsman for the House and one for the Senate, whose duty it shall be to draft bills for the chairmen of committees. This service was created by the spontaneous act of the Committee on Ways and Means, which recognized, as does Mr. Loree, the importance of this service.

The present draftsman for Congress is Mr. Middleton Beaman, formerly a member of the staff of the Legislative Drafting Fund of Columbia University, and the draftsman for the Senate is Major Thomas I. Parkinson, formerly of the staff of the Judge Advocate General, and previously Professor of Legislation in Columbia University.

It is of great importance to the future of legislative drafting in the country that the Republican party, as urged by Mr. Loree, should seize the opportunity to strengthen this service.

J. P. CHAMBERLAIN

New York, July 15

Japan's Need of Shantung

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your general assumption that the present situation concerning Shantung is abominable may perhaps warrant the laying before your readers of another opinion, based on observation during travel a few years ago and nowise colored by predilection for either China or Japan—both indifferently foreign to the observer.

Except politically, China has never been a nation in the modern sense of the word. It is only a region, hardly more uniform in character and language than Europe, but united for two or three thousand years as Europe was actually united under the Cæsars or theoretically under the Holy Roman Empire. Japan, on the other hand, is not only politically but in blood and in language the most populous and the most sensitively patriotic nation that ever lived. Chinese patriotism is a philosophic abstraction; Japanese patriotism is a personal passion.

Under modern conditions, the independence of Japan demands, for safety, that no considerable centre of military or naval force be established on the continental shore of the sea behind the Japanese archipelago. Any such centre would be a standing danger of attack on Japan from the rear.

When circumstances connected with the Boxer troubles gave Germany a footing in Shantung, Germany proceeded to make Tsingtao, previously negligible, a fortress of exceptional military and naval strength, and so to connect it by railway with interior China as virtually to base it on the whole available resources of the Chinese dominions. This proceeding was completely beyond the control of Japan, consequently menaced as never before.

When the world war broke out, Japan took advantage of it to seize this threatening base of attack on herself, as useful for her protection as the Panama Canal is for that of the United States, or the Suez Canal for that of British India. Unless she continues to control it—particularly so long as the multiplex political nationality of China remains in a state of recurrently revolutionary chaos—she will be in constant danger of attack from the rear by indefinitely considerable forces directed against the most homogeneous and passionately patriotic of recorded nations.

July 20

Admiral Stockton on Admiral Goodrich

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the interesting article in the Review of July 19 by Admiral Goodrich upon the Freedom of the Seas some remarks upon the status of international law seem worthy of a notice.

The writer states that "Germany reduced its (international law) whole structure to ashes."

Most students of this subject are not ready to coincide with such perhaps hasty statements. Germany in her course during the world war has been guilty of many violations besides that of the rules of war as agreed upon in international law. She has and did violate the rules of honor, of good morals, of ordinary veracity, and of common decency and humanity. Nevertheless, those rules still exist, and as criminals do not by their actions abolish criminal law but only call for a stricter enforcement of the law, so provision should be made for a more definite enforcement of the international law rather than a cry of abandonment.

No nation approaching civilization disclaims the rules of international law. In our country it has been stated by the highest authority that its acknowledgment and practice is essential to a proper entry into the family of nations, and doubtless such an acknowledgment should be required from Germany before her entry into the proposed League or Society of Nations, which in its preamble claims as a basis the understandings of international law. Upon the entry of the United States into the war an excellent code of the laws of maritime war was promulgated for the use of the Navy, and such a codification will in due time, without doubt, result from the assemblage of nations and its consequent conferences.

After all, the existence of a vice does not destroy the virtue, and rules founded upon facts, usages, and unwritten laws duly reduced to writing should be an established matter in the near future.

International law, like all law, municipal and constitutional law included, is in a state of moderate evolution, but like the pendulum with respect to the hands of a clock, though the pendulum moves forward and back, the hands go steadily forward.

C. H. STOCKTON

*Santa Cruz Park,
Haines Falls, N. Y., July 19*

Government vs. Private Control of Railways

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The experience of the Government of the United States in its control of the operation of the railways, and the rapidly increasing deficits which have accompanied this control, have naturally given rise to considerable discussion over the relative advantages of governmental operation and private operation. On this question the experience of France will throw a good deal of light. Although recent figures covering the operation of French railways are not available, and would not be significant if they were, some of those contained in the last published report of the Minister of Public Works, for the year ended December 31, 1913, may prove of interest, as illustrating a condition that is evidently prevalent in the United States at the present time. The writer, having been in France since the latter part of 1917, is not familiar with actual physical conditions surrounding the operation of the American railways, but is under the impression that despite the heroic measures taken to economize, such as elimination of duplication of service, the Government, with much higher rates, has utterly failed to make the railways pay their charges, despite the fact that the gross earnings compare very satisfactorily with those of any period under private operation.

The French railway system consists in the main of six systems, which comprise 24,550 of a total of 32,300 miles of railroad. Practically all of the mileage not included in these six principal systems is made up of narrow gauge branch lines of short length. The six systems are those of the Eastern, Northern, Southern, Paris-Orleans and Paris-Lyons-Mediterranean Railway companies, and the lines operated by the Government, which latter have included, since 1909, the lines formerly owned by the Western Railway Company.

The lines operated by the Government comprise a system of 5,620 miles of road. The French railways system gives to each of the six principal companies a distinct field, in which they are virtually free from competition. That occupied by the lines of the "État," as the governmentally operated system is called, lies to the west and southwest of Paris, the lines of the system extending from that city to all of the principal Atlantic seaports of France. Geographically it is a territory relatively free from natural obstacles, and one in which operating costs should be relatively low, but such is far from being the case.

For purposes of comparison in the following tables the lines of the old "État" system and those acquired from the Western Railway Company in 1909, are segregated, so that the result of governmental operation, as applied to the latter lines, may be apparent. For purposes of comparison the figures for the Paris-Orleans system are also given, those lines serving, in a general way, a territory similar to that of the system operated by the Government.

(All figures are reduced to dollars and miles at the rate of one dollar to five francs and five-eighths of a mile to a kilometer.)

Results per mile in 1905:

Lines operated	Gross Earnings	Operating Expenses	Net Earnings
by Government	$5,920	$4,250	$1,670
Western Railway Company	10,850	6,080	4,770
Paris-Orleans Railway Co.	10,680	4,960	5,720

In 1908, the last year in which the lines of the Western Railway Company were operated by a private corporation, the following were the results:

Lines operated	Gross Earnings	Operating Expenses	Net Earnings
by Government	$6,370	$5,120	$1,250
Western Railway Company	11,700	7,970	3,730
Paris-Orleans Railway Co.	11,600	6,240	5,400

In 1913, when the lines formerly belonging to the Western Railway Company were operated by the Government, in conjunction with its other lines, although the accounts were segregated, results were as follows:

Lines operated	Gross Earnings	Operating Expenses	Net Earnings
by Government	$7,650	$6,590	$1,060

Lines formerly of Western Railway Company $13,400 $11,400 $2,000
Paris-Orleans
Railway Co. . . . 12,800 7,550 5,250
The percentages of receipts expended in operation were as follows:

	1905	1908	1912	1913
Old lines operated by Government	74.2	80.7	91.4	86.2
Lines formerly of Western Ry. Co.	56.4	67.8	89.4	85.2
Paris-Orleans Ry. Co.	46.7	54.1	56.1	58.9
Eastern Ry. Co.	54.4	58.9	60.3	61.7
Northern Ry. Co.	53.1	57.8	61.3	61.5
Southern Ry. Co.	47.0	51.8	54.2	55.7
Paris-Lyons-Mediterranean Ry. Co.	49.4	53.0	56.5	57.0

While the entire story is told in the last table, all possibilities of quibble are removed by introducing figures showing gross earnings per mile, which clearly indicate that the disparity is not one of traffic density. That the source of higher operating costs is unquestionably governmental control and all that that implies is shown in the rapid increase in the percentage of operating expenses to receipts of the lines of the old Western Railway Company after they were taken over by the Government.

FABIAN F. LEVY

Paris, June 25

Other Peoples' Windows

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

As one of your "oldest subscribers" I hail the appearance each week of the Review, bringing joy to our home in the New England hills. But I registered a mental protest when in one of the recent issues I read "Fed up with the French." I remembered how in the past I had been cheated by the customs house officials and overcharged by the ticket-sellers and hotel keepers in Germany—but never in France—and how the London cabby had looked through his trap door to see whether I wore English or American shoes—and had doubled the fare accordingly. I remembered, too, an incident of my last trip on the Bar Harbor express. I had had a conversation with a young New Englander, recently discharged, who expressed great bitterness because he had had to pay a large price for a knife in France and had, he thought, been overcharged for eggs. It happened that we got off at the same station, and I inquired his name and learned that his father was one of the selectmen of the little lake village where I spend my summers. Then I recalled that the selectmen had assessed my cottage twice as much as that of the more valuable property of the farmer next to me; that this same boy's aunt charged us above the current rate for eggs and was so careful to pick out all the big ones for the Boston market that at times I have wondered whether she had not changed her hens for pigeons; that this boy's cousin, who plays golf on our hillside links, had a short time since "borrowed" a dozen golf balls from my locker; that the village clergyman, who is a distant relative of this boy's, after selling me my property on the lake, arranged with a friend to claim that the title was faulty and that the lake front had belonged to him and not to the clergyman, and the two had tried for six months to blackmail me out of an additional sum of money for the land: all these things because I am to these people a New York millionaire, though in reality a college professor on an inadequate salary. And these are not the only evidences that the wooden nutmeg type still survives in New England; my friends and neighbors have had similar experiences.

It seems to me that it might be as well for us to forget for a while the mote in the eye of the French peasant, and consider the ways of our own peasantry, and for very shame cease to criticize.

VERITAS

Book Reviews

Dr. Hill's Views on the League

PRESENT PROBLEMS IN FOREIGN POLICY. By David Jayne Hill. New York: D. Appleton and Company.

THE fashion in political writing changes. This may be due to clever leadership on the part of the writers or it may be responsive to the taste and wishes of the public. At any rate, during the vitally important period of the great war, political thinking has, to a certain extent, been dominated by a group of young men who call themselves "liberals" and who have rather startled the public with certain novel conceptions of international relationships. Their method is to start with certain general assumptions and, these being accepted without due scrutiny, to proceed with clever dialectic to build up a whole fabric. This fabric is then adorned with moral precepts and idealistic conceptions, and forms an excellent cover for pacifism and defeatism.

One turns with a feeling of relief to the clear, direct political writing of Dr. Hill, and as one reads his analysis of the political problems connected with the war and the terms upon which it has been ended, it is as if a stream of pure fresh air had swept into the fetid atmosphere. He is concerned first of all with facts as facts, and not with finding facts to fit theory; and, in the second place, he views world relations from the standpoint of a vigorous Americanism and not of a dilettante internationalism.

His present volume has to do with the League of Nations proposal in its various aspects. He recognizes at the outset the desirability of some plan that shall bring about such improvement in the relations between nations as to obviate international conflicts. But he places his hopes upon the natural and normal development of an entente rather than upon an artificial organization. He is optimistic as to the possibility of a continuous advance in international law and in international ethical standards, and believes that these may well be promoted by conference and mutual adjustment. But the history of previous attempts at the artificial organization of leagues or super-governments does not lead him to place any confidence in their practicability as a means of averting war. He traces this history in an illuminating manner.

In general, all of these plans have failed to take into account certain inequalities of culture and rivalries of economic interests which could not possibly be harmonized by the proposed organization. The whole structure of international peace and justice rests upon the character of the peoples who form the society of nations. The perfection of this understanding is a matter of growth and gradual adjustment. It cannot be accomplished by a stroke of the pen. In fact, to impose such an artificial organization upon a mass of discordant states, utterly diverse in relative development, would be to increase rather than lessen the probability of war.

As an American, Dr. Hill takes issue with the theory that the interests of humanity should prevail in the formation of so general an organization as a League of Nations rather than the interests of the people of the United States. He has no patience with the "trustee theory, the guardianship theory." The statesmen of every other nation that might enter such a League would be bound to consider the alleged benefits and disadvantages of joining, and in the case of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, care has been taken to secure all their special interests in advance. America, on the other hand, obtains nothing but liabilities, and, since she represents perhaps the most advanced member of the proposed League, she would greatly weaken her power for good by being associated on a parity with numerous petty and more or less backward and unstable states.

A popular fallacy that has had an important influence upon the negotiations at Paris, in so far as they concerned the League of Nations, has been the idea that peace was to be made between peoples and not between governments. This theory, which assumes that if peoples, instead of their representatives, had the settling of international affairs, there would be no war, did not originate primarily in the confused doctrinaire thinking of certain Americans, but found such a sponsor in England as Mr. Austin Harrison. The absurdity becomes evident when one considers that the delegates at Paris of the various governments represented their peoples, and if an appeal were to be made over their heads on the ground that the respective peoples would act differently, it would simply mean that the way to achieve a satisfactory and permanent peace would be to bring about a violent revolution in each of these countries so as to overthrow and displace the negotiators. Surely America has no desire to bring such a message to Europe nor is America prepared to give up any part of her sovereignty or independence of action in order to become a member of an organization whose average standard must of necessity be lower than her own.

Herein lies also another logical ambiguity. The proposed League professes to be composed only of free nations. What nations are to be classed as "free"? Certainly no nation that holds in subjection any people not permitted to enjoy self-government. Are we to assume the validity of the doctrine of complete self-determination and at the same time require a partial renunciation of national sovereignty? On the one hand, some nations are regarded as too independent, too powerful, and too aspiring to be considered safe for the rest of the world, unless they are willing to have imposed upon them certain restraints; while, on the other hand, some nations are too much oppressed, too feeble, and too submissive to assert successfully just national rights, and must therefore have secured to them a degree of sovereignty which is not in reality theirs.

Juristically, independent and responsible states, whether large or small, have equal abstract rights to existence, self-preservation, self-defense, and self-determination; but culturally, economically, and potentially they are, and must remain, unequal. Besides this, these states are not only unequal in the political sense, but their problem of independence is sadly complicated by the world's economic developments. It is not reasonable to suppose that the League of Nations would prove an efficient organ to compel individual nations to make economic sacrifices for the benefit of others, or to establish a central control of resources so as to dispense benefits which the recipients have not shared in creating. Such a League would prove a bondage that would be resented and would not be endured. It is all very well to talk about "service of humanity" and the changed order in the world, but human nature and national sentiment are not susceptible of such drastic alteration.

Dr. Hill's experience as Ambassador to Germany has enabled him to analyze with great clearness what he terms Germany's "pose for peace." The efforts made by the German leaders to escape the penalties of their crimes, when confronted by the certainty of military defeat, were greatly aided by American theorizing. When we tried to draw a distinction between the German Government and the German people and further indicated distinctly that the way for them to obtain favorable consideration from us was to do away with the monarchy and form a republic, the leaders of German policy quickly took advantage of our doctrinaire conception. Not only did they at once form a cabinet which they stated had been formed by conference and in agreement with a great majority of the Reichstag, and represent that the Chancellor spoke in the name of the German people, but, as if in evidence of their change of heart, they asserted their devotion to President Wilson's Fourteen Points. It was as if the people of Germany were preparing to say at the peace table: "We demand peace because we are an innocent and defenseless people. First of all we are a 'people' and how can you punish a whole people? You are trying to make the 'world safe for democracy.' We are now a democracy. See, we have dismissed the Kaiser! We shall have no more of him. Have mercy upon us, Kamaraden! We accept all your glorious democratic principles. Now, undoubtedly, you are ready, since you would make the world safe for democracy, to make our democracy an asylum of safety for us."

Thus does Dr. Hill, from the wealth of his experience in Germany, portray Germany's pose for peace. There is no change of heart. Millions of Germans have not suddenly become Social Democrats, least of all the millions of troops and the hundreds of thousands of officers. As a matter of fact, there is no note of penitence or contrition in Germany's attitude. It is simply that every effort is being made to get off lightly and escape as far as possible the penalty of non-success in the endeavor to dominate the world.

A frequent topic of discussion in America is whether the injection into the Peace Conference of the project of a League of Nations has or has not obstructed and delayed peace. In considering this, Dr. Hill makes the cogent observation that the delegates to the Peace Conference seem to have been concerned more with the prevention of future wars than with the satisfactory ending of the present one, and that this attitude of mind is responsible for the postponement of many of the pressing problems, with the result that all Eastern Europe is aflame and in an utterly unstable condition, while beautiful projects are being drawn up for the millennium to come. It is not only the time taken up by the discussion of the League of Nations that has delayed the conclusion of peace, it is rather the attempt to inject into the settlement of every immediate practical problem general theories which could not be harmonized in practice. For this he feels that President Wilson not only was largely responsible, but that in so doing was not justified by the backing of the American people. Certainly the President professed to be the spokesman of the American people, but upon what authority?

Instead of promoting peace, the efforts of the President of the United States to impose his own views and to array the populations of other countries against their own governments have seriously impeded and obstructed the only peace in which the world is really interested at this time, and for the need of which whole nations are dying of hunger and are kept in an abnormal and dangerous state of mind. In the meantime, the Entente is weakening through discouragement and the enemy is reorganizing, if not for resistance, at least to display a revolutionary attitude towards conditions of peace that at one time could have been easily imposed. According to Dr. Hill, the President's mind seems always to dwell in a region of abstractions. The concrete does not appeal to him. His policy has been, and is, world reconstruction first and peace afterward. This policy has obstructed and prevented the action by the Entente Allies that should have been taken, and would have been taken but for his personal interference.

In another chapter, entitled "The D eb acle of Dogmatism," Dr. Hill develops more fully the theory underlying the Conference that all possible future wars must be prevented now, and that unless this can be done immediately the present war can not be ended, this being the theory that is implied in the statement that the League of Nations must of necessity be a part of any treaty of peace. In the words of Dr. Hill, this theory dates from the attempt to prepare a compromise peace or to create a future situation with which all the belligerents would be satisfied. It rests upon the assumption that, while governments are often bad, all peoples are good; and that if the governments could be overthrown and the peoples could have their way, there would never be any more war. This theory he holds to be not only incapable of proof, but utterly erroneous. If it were true, we should be able, in a short time, to secure universal peace by a general plebiscite. The truth is that all nations want peace, but they want it in their own way; and, as their own ways differ, they are not likely to consent to perpetual peace until there is created a common interest so great that, to secure it, they are willing to forego all less urgent aspirations. Such a community of interest, while an excellent ideal, is something unattainable at the present time; yet it is more likely to be approximated by the practical adjustment of their immediate differences than by an artificial organization that takes no account of these differences. With reference to the President, Dr. Hill notes that only four years ago he voiced his conviction that America should live her own life, and stated that the reason why we must keep free from entangling alliances was because America had set her face in a certain direction and no other country was going the same way. Then we became associated with the great Powers in Europe, had a common cause and fought valiantly with them against a common enemy. We won a victory, and what was demanded was a peace of victory. But, according to Dr. Hill, the President had set his mind on a peace of reconstruction. America's life was no longer to him the highest purpose. He wanted to be the creator of a new world. From that moment, the President no longer represented America. He was the victim of his own obsession, the reconstructed world. He did not even care for America's consent.

While Dr. Hill's treatment of the issues involved in the League of Nations is clear, logical, and convincing, it by no means covers the whole field. Rather he restricts himself to those phases of the question which touch particularly the interests and the sovereignty of America. As such, it is not only a valuable contribution to American political literature but an inspiring appeal to loyalty and patriotism.

From Mons to Ypres

NINETEEN FOURTEEN. By Field-Marshal Viscount French of Ypres. With a Preface by Marshal Foch; with Portrait and Maps. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

THIS is not a military history but a personal narrative. "My main object," writes the author, "is to explain as clearly as possible to my countrymen the line of thought which was in my own mind, the objects I set out to attain, and the reasons why I directed the troops as I did." As a picture of the mind of a great commander at a critical moment of the world's history, the book is of lasting importance. It is grave and measured in style, rarely rising to eloquence. It is amazingly frank, revealing almost too unsparingly the social prejudices of a British cavalryman, distrust of the French commanders, as of his own generals, doggedly admitting fault and limitation of judgment and as stolidly claiming all due credit. The narrative is not always quite in good taste, but it evinces a massive good faith. Let us follow it in brief.

On August 15, 1914, Field-Marshal French had his two corps, amounting with auxiliaries to 100,000 men, ready to deploy on the Mons line. His general expectation was of a war of movement and man uvre. Like everybody else, he counted largely on Russia. His particular expectation was to attack as left wing of the Allied armies in the north and eventually to effect a juncture with the Belgian army in a great offensive. On August 15, President Poincar e joked hopefully about a joint French-English victory at Waterloo. The next day Marshal Joffre exposed the plan of the offensive more fully. Nobody knew the strength of the German wedge in Belgium.

On August 18 Field-Marshal French called his corps commanders and their staffs together and ordered an advance on the Mons-Dinant line, at the left of General Lanrezac's Fifth French Army. Two French Cavalry divisions were to protect the exposed flank. They were never supplied. August 21 was set for the advance. Meanwhile came news of overwhelming German force. Early on the 22nd Field-Marshal French, while seeking General Lanrezac, found the Fifth Army in full retreat. Without notification of any kind, it drew back ten miles, leaving the British positions on the Mons-Cond e line dangerously exposed on both flanks. General Lanrezac not only omitted to explain his retreat and failure to communicate, but made the preposterous proposal that the British should attack. Field-Marshal French refused so suicidal a move, but agreed to hold the Mons line for twenty-four hours. In the meantime his new commander of the Second Corps, Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien, had shown symptoms of irresolution, though on the whole he fought a good action until relieved by the intrepid First Corps under Sir Douglas Haig.

The British commanders' conference on the 23rd of August must have been a black one. Confidence in the French Fifth Army and its commander had naturally gone, the glories of clearing Belgium had already given place to the unremitting punishment of the long retreat. Field-Marshal French's confidence in the leadership of half his little army, the Second Corps, had been shaken. His general orders bade him to seek a "minimum of losses and wastage" and forbade him to engage in any hazardous forward movement without the permission of the War Office. Thus the famous retreat from Mons began, not as a part of Allied grand strategy, but on the personal initiative of the British High Commander, considering his orders and the local military situation. Two untoward incidents complicated the British withdrawal. On August 26, General Smith-Dorrien, judging that the Second Corps was to tired to move, contrary to orders undertook the general engagement of Le Cateau. It cost the little British army some 14,000 casualties and nearly 80 guns. From this moment, Field-Marshal French declined to commit himself to a major action until he should be reinforced in men and matériel. After the French Fifth Army gloriously thrust back three German army corps at Guise, Joffre pleaded with the British High Commander to stand and attack on the line Soissons-Compiègne. The President of France and the British Government urged the move. Lord Kitchener came over to Paris to put it through. Kitchener inconsiderately came in a field-marshal's uniform and with the air of a commander-in-chief, compromising Field-Marshal French's position. There was a moment of personal difficulty, but the great-hearted soldier saw General French's point and quietly returned to London. That to have fought on the Aisne was to court disaster for the entire Allied armies is the author's profound conviction. It seems, indeed, that nobody realized the punishment the English had taken at Le Cateau, least of all the War Office. It was, as a mater of fact, the political which insisted the retreat should be halted. Joffre and Kitchener readily accepted French's view.

The British decision not to stand short of the Marne and reinforcement conditioned the strategy of the most famous of battles. The plan was not long-laid, but one of occasion. To make this clear is a chief merit of this book. General Joffre's genius, which is most generously praised, was shown in making all the minor moves along lines which should produce ultimate model dispositions. It is plain that in disposing the British on a north and south line facing east, with Manoury's new Sixth French Army ready to extend the left northward, Joffre had primarily in view, not the great counter-offensive, but the defense of Paris. But the move automatically made a trap into which any German advance was likely to be fatal. Kluck entered the pocket between the British and the Fifth French Army, now under Franchet d'Esperey, only because the Germans were strangely ignorant of the existence of the new Sixth Army, while they regarded the British as soundly thrashed. Apparently the Great General Staff absolutely felt there was no Allied force to the north and west that needed to be taken into account. Kluck was supposed to strike an exposed French left, whereas he was placing two hundred thousand rifles on his own exposed flank. It was unfortunate that French and Manoury got no prompt intelligence of Foch's success in the centre. As it was, the blow of the Allied left fell a day too late to produce disaster. More correctly speaking, Foch's magnificent assault was not timed strategically, but forced upon him by occasion, and from the point of view of grand strategy it came too soon.

None of these considerations detract a whit from the glory of the victors of the Marne. We merely substitute for the legend of a long-planned and all-encompassing strategy the more thrilling reality of successive emergencies correctly met, of minor moves so delicately coordinated that they united almost without a general plan into a vast and correct disposition from which victory was almost certain to be wrung. It appears that Joffre, about September 3, partly through the gross miscalculation of his foe in moving eastward and more through his own gradual guidance of the retreat and provision for the defense of Paris, suddenly saw the opportunity for the blow which he actually ordered September 4. What in reality decided the day, though here we seem to have Field-Marshal French against us, was less the enveloping movement at the Allied left than Foch's desperate thrust at La Fère Champenoise. When Field-Marshal French speaks of his attacks on the Petit Morin as "practically decisive of the great result," he either claims far too much or, as is rather to be believed, expresses himself infelicitously. So far as the local result at the Allied left is concerned, his statement will stand untested.

We have covered the chief points of novelty in this notable book. Everybody knows the essential features of the race to the sea and of the defense of Ypres. We learn merely of Field-Marshal French's extraordinary prevision of the ordeal he was to undergo. From the moment when on the great retreat he had to abandon his base at Havre, leaving Boulogne, Calais, and Dieppe thinly guarded by two divisions of French territorials, French had seen where the threat to England lay. Twice Germany had ignored her true objective in the vainglorious hope of Paris and a new Sedan. He felt sure the right move would be made, if tardily. He besieged the War Office and the French High Command to move the British Army to its old position at the left. The battle of Ypres developed as part of the great turning movement in the north, in which Field-Marshal French had the rare good fortune to have General Foch as associate. The battle lasted nearly six weeks, from October 15 to November 21. It culminated in the defense of the Kemmel position by the Cavalry division under Allenby, and in the prodigious defence of the Ypres salient by Haig's tried First Corps. On October 31 and November 1 Field-Marshal French saw the battle for the stakes of England's existence all but lost. The Kemmel ridge had been nearly cleared by the assailants and the thin line pierced. Foch met the critical situation with his watchword "attaque!" and sent a few French battalions who helped restore the line. At the most desperate moment a battalion of London Scottish territorials went in at Kemmel and held for two days while they suffered 34 per cent. of casualties. It was a magnificent baptism of fire for England's volunteer army, and the earnest of the victory to come. To the Territorials and to all the military preparations of their founder, Lord Haldane, Field-Marshal French pays the most just and enthusiastic tribute.

After Ypres, the trench warfare became stabilized. The British in the field had to fight against quite incredible blindness in the War Office. Munitions were doled out grudgingly, the indispensable high explosive shells hardly at all. The minor tactics of trench warfare were worked out on the spot without aid from London. Hand grenades and trench mortars were improvised, and the trenches began to assume the aspect which they were to wear for four years. Towards the end of the year 1914, Field-Marshal French, without a week's ammunition reserve, was ordered to turn over twenty per cent. of his reserve for the Gallipoli army. In despair he took the unmilitary but wholly justifiable course of appealing to the public through the Times correspondent, Colonel Repington. The result was the Coalition Ministry with Lloyd George as Minister of Munitions, and the beginning of brighter days.

From this record one chiefly learns that a sufficient mental preparation for a great war is an impossibility. In the light of the Manchurian campaigns, it seems incredible that neither the Germans nor the Allies realized the new limitations set to war of movement. Field-Marshal French believes that, had the lesson been read in time, the Mons-Dinant line could have been held indefinitely. The Germans, with their far superior preparation, practically beat themselves in the early months of the war through the choice of false and impossible objectives, and through gross underestimation of the worth of their foes. All that any leader can do is to establish correct dispositions and give a reasonable direction to the attack. The rest is a fine and audacious profiting by opportunity as it arises. In this the British and French were superior to the Germans, and had their reward. Perhaps even more impressive is the lesson of the weakness of any allied army without unity of command. That, in spite of this handicap, the French and British outmanœuvred the Germans in the early months and for nearly four years fought on equal terms in the trenches is one of the baffling paradoxes of military history. It almost justifies a theological explanation—that the gods, meaning to destroy the Germans, had made them mad. But such inductions the reader may better make for himself in Field-Marshal French's terse, resolute, and soldierly narrative.

The Six-Hour Day

THE SIX-HOUR DAY AND OTHER INDUSTRIAL QUESTIONS. By Lord Leverhulme. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

IT is almost startling to find a successful manufacturer like Lord Leverhulme—better known as Sir William Lever of Port Sunlight—seriously defending the proposition that a six-hour day would be good for the employer as well as the happy laborer, provided that sufficient machinery were used and that the working day could be divided into two shifts of six hours each. The argument has the appearance of a simple sum in arithmetic of which the answer emerges as soon as the problem is stated. Let your expenditure for overhead in a 48-hour week be equal to your expenditure for wages—say $1,000 a week for each—and let 1,000 items be the output of the shop or factory. Then, of course, the cost is $2.00. If, however, you have a 72-hour week with two shifts of laborers, each working 6 hours a day at the same wages as before, the output will be 50 per cent. greater, or 1,500 items, and the cost also will increase by 50 per cent.; for, while you pay $2,000 for wages, your overhead is still $1,000, or very little more, and the total expense ($3,000) divided by the number of items (1,500) still gives $2.00 as the cost per item of output. Similarly, if the expenditure for overhead were greater than the expenditure for wages—say $2,000 for the one and $1,000 for the other—the 72-hour week would give a lower cost of production than the 48-hour week, as can easily be seen. Furthermore, if the laborers, being free from fatigue, did as much in six hours as in eight—as Lord Leverhulme says they could—the output would be increased by more than 50 per cent. and the cost per item would be less, or wages more, or both. But whether the laborers do more work per hour or not, the employer gains through increased production and quicker turnover.

Lord Leverhulme's calculations might be stated in the form of a general proposition, thus: When the expenditure for overhead equals or exceeds the expenditure for wages, it will pay the employer to establish a 72-hour week, working two shifts of laborers six hours a day each, and paying the laborers at least as much as they received under the 48-hour week. Indeed, he could afford to pay a higher wage than before and still make a gain for himself, as the element of fatigue would be greatly reduced and everything would go harmoniously and at a rapid pace.

It would be possible to cavil at Lord Leverhulme's rough calculation, or at his assumption that overhead would be constant; but in the main his contention is correct that, under the given conditions, two shifts of six hours each would yield at least as good results as a single shift of eight hours. Professor S. O. Chapman in "Work and Wages," published in 1914, makes the same point in favor of the 8-hour as compared with the 10-hour day, although he makes some assumptions and qualifications which Lord Leverhulme does not mention—that the depreciation charge varies as the hours worked, that the rate of interest is constant, that the equipment remains as before, and that, as economists love to say, all other things are equal.

Lord Leverhulme does not pose as a philanthropist, but as a clear-headed man of business who owes his success to hard work and clever seamanship. Finding that the trend of the times is towards shorter hours, he skilfully sets his sail to the prevailing wind; and, rather than make an 8-hour trip with a single crew, he makes a 12-hour trip with two successive crews, because he does not wish his expensive ship and cargo to remain idle. Indeed, Lord Leverhulme would keep his capital going continuously if that could be arranged by means of four 6-hour shifts. Of course, it would be impossible to squeeze four full 6-hour shifts into 24 hours, but Lord Leverhulme does not discuss such details as this. Nor does he give more than passing mention to the suggestion that a 16-hour day of two 8-hour shifts has some advantages over his 12-hour day. He assumes that under practically all circumstances the laborers will do as much in six hours as in eight, which is not a fact.

While employers like Lord Leverhulme are trying to make up by the activity of capital what they are likely to lose by the inactivity of labor, the laborers themselves have a point of view which is somewhat different. In most lines of business, whether much or little machinery is used, healthy men and women can work more than six hours without serious fatigue; and, if suitable remuneration is offered, they will gladly do so, especially in these times of rising cost and standards of living. What our railway men wanted, in the fall of 1915, and what the Adamson law allowed, was not a straight 8-hour day, but an 8-hour basic day with more than proportional payment for overtime—a totally different conception. If the connection which at bottom subsists between work and pay could be clearly seen, and if the effect invariably followed the cause, it is safe to say that most laborers would repudiate the 6-hour day, or spend part of their leisure in some form of remunerative work. Perhaps Lord Leverhulme can maintain the system for some time in his model town of Port Sunlight, because of the peculiar conditions of the soap-manufacturing business; but that it will become the prevailing wage system in British manufacturing in the near future is by no means likely.

Lord Leverhulme reminds one of the late Lord Brassey, but he is far from being as good an economist. He is a self-made man who likes to talk about the steps which have led to his really notable success, and like our Mr. Ford, he naively imagines that all employers should do what he has shown can be done. He is not always careful in the use of statistics, and some of his speeches have a Sunday-school flavor; but his views must be treated with respect as those of an experienced business man who can show, in the garden-city of Port Sunlight, the 6-hour day and an ingenious system of labor co-partnership in actual and successful operation.

Living Greece

GREECE BEFORE THE CONFERENCE. By "Polybius," with a preface by T. P. O'Connor, M.P., and an Ethnological Map. London: Methuen and Company.

THIS clear and fair-minded account of the complex of questions in the Near East has especial reference to Greece. But it should also claim the attention of everyone, not already possessed of equally trustworthy information, who wishes to arrive at a correct estimate of the Balkan and Turkish assets and liabilities, which the "receivers" at Versailles must now disentangle.

The author, for some reason best known to himself, chooses to remain incognito. As guarantee, however, of his right to speak, his readers are entitled to know that he has had long experience as a correspondent of the great London dailies as well as connections with our American press, while at the same time engaged in active life as a Greek citizen. Though born of an American mother and educated at American and European universities his foreign parallax has merely served to correct the errors of a too near-sighted patriotism.

For those who can remember the days of Gladstone the enthusiastic preface by the well-known journalist-statesman will lend endorsement to the anonymous author. It is a pardonable echo from the past when Mr. O'Connor writes: "One thing is by this time settled in the mind of all Europe, that, so far as Europe is concerned, there is no policy for the Turks but the old Gladstone policy of driving them out of Europe, bag and baggage." This thesis is developed in a reasoned and far more convincing way, in Chapter III, by the author himself. But he does not there confine himself to the question of Turkey in Europe. Reinforcing his arguments by well-analyzed statistics, faithfully exhibiting Turkish predominance where it exists, he makes suggestions, doubtless inspired by Mr. Venizelos himself, for a proper and workable readjustment of the interlocking Greek, Mohammedan, and Armenian populations in Asia Minor as well as in Thrace and Constantinople. Especial attention may be called to the author's insistence, both here and elsewhere—(e.g. in regard to Macedonia and Epirus)—that the principle of self-determination, indisputably a desideratum, must be laid down in no procrustean manner that ignores the facts most essential to justice. In addition to the four factors of language, race, religion, and national sentiment, which often cross each other unexpectedly, we must, in some instances, reckon with wholesale deportations of inhabitants which would turn an immediate plebiscite into a mockery.

The body of the book, Chapters II-V, discusses the contacts of Greece with Turkey, Bulgaria, Italy, and Albania, which involve readjustments on the Asia Minor coast, in Thrace, Macedonia, the Dodecanese and North Epirus. At all these points the complications defy a résumé, except in the Dodecanese where the problem is extremely simple. The determination of the underlying facts, however, is of such vital importance for the peace and prosperity of the Near East primarily, and, indirectly, of the whole of Europe, that they constitute a lien on the conscience of the court of decision.

As to Bulgaria, the Prussia of the Balkans, no one whose heart has bled with Serbia, no one who believes in human liberty, no one who has followed with agony the needless tragedy of the Dardanelles could brook the suggestion that this cruel and treacherous nation should emerge from the war with additional loot. The author states his case against her dispassionately but relentlessly. The matter of the North Epirus boundary is complex and delicate. The author is convincing and devoid of unmannerly bitterness towards Italy. Like Venizelos, he strives for a friendly relation with the non-imperialistic patriots of Italy, now that the sinister double-dealing of Constantine with imperialism, both north and south of the Piave, has been removed.

The Dodecanese—the Twelve Islands of the Southern Sporades—is wholly Greek by sentiment, religion, race, and language. When it was seized by the Italians there were a few thousand Turks on the Island of Rhodes only. It has been held as a pawn in the diplomatic game since the secret treaty of 1915.

There is no other reason to urge against its union with Greece. The author's detailed statement amounts to a Q. E. D.

The net claim at the end of the book is this: "All that the Greeks ask is the unification, not of all the lands that have been Greek in the past, nor of all those where strong Greek populations live today, for that would be impossible, but of those more compact sections of the Greek family which can conveniently be bound up into one state, without prejudice to the due rights of neighboring races."

All this should be read in the light of the first chapter, a dignified statement of what Greece has contributed to the cause of the Allies in actual warfare and a reminder, which seems to be necessary for some ill-informed foreigners, that the little nation, in order to take sides with Serbia and the other allies, was first compelled to free herself by the supreme effort of an internal revolution from the power of a pro-German cabal headed by her own king, a traitor to her democratic constitution. Surely this should be counted to her as a special form of righteousness.

The excellent ethnological pocket-map makes the detailed reading of the book thoroughly intelligible.

The Run of the Shelves

THE Century Company has been informed by a representative of the Department of Justice that action will be brought to prevent the further distribution and printing of Thomas F. Millard's "Democracy and the Eastern Question," because of confidential matters it contains. What these matters are we have no means of knowing. The book was informally reviewed in these columns (July 12) by Prof. W. W. Willoughby, whose residence during the last four years in the Far East and close study of its problems from a peculiarly advantageous position excellently qualified him to point out the striking importance of Mr. Millard's work. Professor Willoughby's paper has already created considerable interest among those who appreciate the gravity attending our relations in the Orient, especially with respect to Shantung.

How many writers of sapient editorials, when they quote the line, "Let dogs delight to bark and bite," or, "How doth the little busy bee," know that they are borrowing from a volume of juvenile verse which a pious dissenting clergyman composed for the children of his benefactress just two hundred years ago? Wilbur Macey Stone has done a work at once useful and entertaining in publishing an essay on the poet and his book, with a bibliography ("The Divine and Moral Songs of Isaac Watts," privately printed for The Triptych). He has been able to trace some two hundred and fifty editions of the "Songs" in Great Britain and above three hundred in America, five hundred and fifty in all—this against some three hundred and fifty recorded editions of the "New England Primer." Out of the many copies Mr. Stone has himself handled he has gathered a good deal of amusing information in the way of inscriptions, alterations of the text for theological reasons, imitations, etc. Perhaps the most important item is the fact that the last word of the last line of the most famous stanza should read "For 'tis their natures too," instead of to as it is commonly written. One ought to know that the preposition used elliptically for the infinitive ("to" for "to growl and fight") would scarcely have been within the range of the careful poet's English.

The "Men Who Make Our Novels" (Moffat, Yard and Company) is a more interesting book than might be surmised from its occupation of the third place in a brazenly popular series of which the "Women Who Make Our Novels" and "Our Poets of Today" were the primary installments. Mr. George Gordon, who acts as author or editor, finds space in two hundred and sixty-two pages for forty-seven novelists, and the elasticity of standards which rise to include Mr. Howells and broaden to admit Mr. Chambers is hardly subject to question. Mr. Gordon is not primarily writing criticism; he is satisfying that curiosity about persons to which, in a distressingly large class of readers, the curiosity about books figures mostly as pretext. The novelists, where they can be coaxed to talk, supply the materials themselves, and thus, of the two great defilements of gossip, the first, malice, is wholly done away with, and the second, lying, is presumably reduced. Where the communication is large and frank, the result is interesting even to the class which approaches journalism of this sort with the condescension which adds a seasoning to pleasure. When the reserve of the novelists is unyielding, Mr. Gordon describes them by other mouths, or, at a pinch, supplies the blank with critical pungencies which he has found in others or sought in himself. His pungency is rarely ill-natured, and his delight in his position as outrider or postilion to the coach of modernism is unstinted. There is much whip-cracking for the pure joy of speed, and much lip-smacking over the quality of the refreshment supplied by the trenchers and tankards on the route. The book is harum-scarum, and quite breaks down in the good-natured attempt to render a small practical service by listing and dating each novelist's works. Mr. Gordon treats Mr. Howells with that veneration which numbers patronage among its ingredients. He complains that the dean of American letters has been slow in pressing his own claims upon a public responsive merely to advertisement. Exposure to this sort of reproach must help to console Mr. Howells for the obscurity to which he has been sentenced by his fame. He may add this obscurity to his other honors. Where should the cloud dwell but on the peak?

Mr. Gordon's book contains a paragraph from Mr. Theodore Dreiser which is worth reprinting.

I am quite sure that it never occurred to many of us that there was something really improving in a plain, straightforward understanding of life. For myself I accept now no creeds. I do not know what truth is, what beauty is, what love is, what hope is. I do not believe any one absolutely and I do not doubt any one absolutely. I think people are both evil and well-intentioned.

The compact and finished self-contradiction in this passage is beyond praise. How can a plain, straightforward understanding be valuable to a man who does not know what truth is? How can a plain, straightforward understanding be improving to a man who does not know what hope is? Truth surely is the ground of understanding, and hope is the incitement to advance. "People are both evil and well-intentioned," concludes Mr. Dreiser. Many of them are, but the illness of their deeds and the soundness of their intentions imply in the percipient the apprehension of good and evil. Surely Mr. Dreiser, in whom the perception of truth, beauty, hope, and love has been improved away by a plain, straightforward understanding must be humiliated by his failure to achieve that insensibility to good and evil which, in contempt of Genesis, has its source in the eating of the fruit of the modern Tree of Knowledge. He will hasten to rid himself of the last rudiments of perception which stand between him and that total blindness to which his successive enlightenments are infallibly conducting him. But when this Nirvana has been attained, what point will remain in books which derive their present meaning from the co-existence of good and evil in human nature?

The Daily News of Greensboro, N. C., published, on July 2, a special edition in which the erection of an O. Henry hotel by citizens of Greensboro is amply and fittingly commemorated. Much good sense, stout perseverance, and affectionate pride appear to have found expression in the handsome structure in which Manager Wade H. Lowry will lease to customers one hundred and eighty-seven rooms (with bath) at a minimum rate of two dollars on the European plan. A hotel seems a fitting memorial to O. Henry. He is an author whom one could read in lobbies and quote in elevators. His spirit might chafe in a mausoleum, but the tingle of bells, the rattle of expresses, the crispness of telegrams, the alacrity of dining-rooms, would restore it to peace. The life he saw and drew was like a hotel—geometric, teeming, dazzling, noisy, and compact. Even our sober retrospects must wonder at the man; in every sense O. Henry was prodigious. He had both invention and knowledge, both feeling and intelligence, both substance and art. No faith ever carried a greater weight of seeming cynicism, or carried it more triumphantly, and the very pomp and plenitude of his sophistications may have pointed to an ultimate simplicity. His New York was a stirring, and would have been a great, New York, if he had not always seemed to view it from the seatboard of a moving fire-engine. He was more than mere conjuror or electrician; his penetration at times was admirable. It is pleasant to be told by Dr. Archibald Henderson, in an interesting article in the commemorative edition, that American soldiers literally tore up a volume of his works in their eagerness to consume it, and that in the six months prior to February 1, 1919, Messrs. Doubleday and Page sold 150,000 volumes from his pen.

Drama

Parnell Redivivus

IT is doubtless a pure coincidence, but with peace comes by far the most interesting play we have seen since 1914. It is called "The Lost Leader," and its author, Mr. Lennox Robinson, was at one time manager of the famous Abbey Theatre in Dublin. At that theatre the play was first produced, in February of last year. It has now come to the Court Theatre, where it is acted by a mainly British cast; but the Irish peasant characters have fortunately been imported from their native heath.

"The Lost Leader" is Parnell. When it was understood that a play dealing with that tragic figure was about to be produced, some people jumped at the conclusion that it must have been inspired by the success of Mr. John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln," and would prove to be a series of tableaux from the career of the Uncrowned King. Not only do dates, however, negative that theory—the whole character of the two pieces is entirely different. Mr. Drinkwater's is, in essence, a chronicle-play; Mr. Robinson's is an imaginative creation quite independent of history, though of course with a political background.

When a man of great mark dies under circumstances which are, or can be made out to be, in the least mysterious, the myth-making instinct is always apt to seize the opportunity and set up a rumor that he is not dead, but will come again, in the fullness of time, to work out his mission, whatever it may have been. Right down to the armistice, thousands of people knew on the very best authority that Lord Kitchener was alive, and a prisoner in Berlin. The Czar Nicholas, if I am not mistaken, has already been resurrected, and it would not be in the least surprising if some pretender, personating him, were one day to play a serious part in Russian politics. Parnell, it may be remembered, died quite unexpectedly, shortly after the divorce case which ruined his career. It used to be whispered in Ireland that no one had ever actually seen him dead—and on that whisper Mr. Robinson has built his play.

The date is October, 1917. We are at a small fishing hotel in the village of Poulmore, kept by a capable and not uncultivated woman, Mary Lenihan, with whom lives her aged uncle, Lucius. One evening, in the smoking-room, a psychoanalyst physician from London, Powell-Harper by name, and his friend, Frank Ormsby, foregather with a bustling young reporter, Augustus Smith, who has come over to work up the political situation. As Dr. Harper is always willing to talk shop, they fall to discussing hypnotism, and Smith, who is a bad sleeper, asks what the doctor would do to put him to sleep. They scarcely notice that old Lucius Lenihan is in the room. Mary, his niece, has mentioned that his sleep is constantly disturbed by dreams; and we see him prick up his ears eagerly when the doctor says to Smith,

In your case, just by suggestion, I would begin by suggesting to you sleep, a deep, dreamless sleep, a sleep like black velvet, a sleep as deep and as dark and as calm as Poulmore Lake when, on a still autumn evening, the mountain throws across it a deep purple shadow.

He then holds up a bright coin, and bidding Smith look hard at it, continues his incantation until his subject does actually drop off to sleep for a moment. But Lucius Lenihan, having intently followed the whole process, has succumbed to the influence, and when the others look around, they find him with his head fallen forward on the table, profoundly hypnotized. Powell-Harper determines to seize the opportunity of freeing the old man from his bad dreams, and the following scene ensues:

Harper. Mr. Lenihan! [Lucius stirs slightly.] Mr. Lenihan! sit up, I have something to say to you. [Lucius struggles to sit up.] Sit up straight. You can, perfectly well—straight. [Lucius sits up straight.] You sleep badly, don't you? [Lucius bows his head.] Answer me, you are able to speak.

Lucius. [In a very low voice.] Yes.

Harper. Speak louder, please.

Lucius. [Loudly.] Yes.

Harper. That's better. To-night you are going to sleep soundly.

Lucius. [Uneasily.] I can't, I can't.
Harper. You mean your dreams will keep you from sound sleep?

Lucius. Yes, the dreams of twenty years ago. They come back, they come back.

Harper. Quite so. But now I am going to take them away.

Lucius. Right away?

Harper. Yes. [He takes the cigar box, empties it of the half-dozen cigars it contains, and holds it up.] Look, I am going to take your bad dreams and shut them up in this box, and tie a big stone to it and drop it in the lake and there they will lie.

Lucius. For ever?

Harper. For ever. There they go. One two, three, four.

Lucius. I have more than that.

Harper. I have room for more . . . We'll name the bad dreams as we put them in. Here's the first. What is it called?

Lucius. A coffin.

Harper. Good. [He places a cigar in the box.] There goes the coffin. Now the next.

Lucius. A woman.

Harper. [Dropping in a cigar.] There she is, in the coffin.

Lucius. [Excitedly.] No, no, she's not. I'm in the coffin.

Harper. My mistake. I beg your pardon. A coffin and a woman. Now the third?

Lucius. My false friends.

Harper. [Dropping a cigar in.] They're gone. The fourth?

Lucius. My name. [There is a little stir of surprise.]

Harper. Your name?

Ormsby. For God's sake stop this, Jim. I don't like it, it's not fair. He doesn't know what he's saying.

Smith. But it's dashed exciting. . . .

Ormsby. It's none of our business.

Harper. [Dropping in a cigar.] There goes your name—Lucius Lenihan.

Lucius. No, no, that's not it, that's not my name.

Harper. You're right. Beg pardon, I can't read the name. But as you're ashamed of it, we'll drop it in and say no more about it.

Lucius. [Vehemently.] I was never ashamed of it. My name, sir, is Charles Stewart Parnell.

I can not tell how this may affect the reader, but it certainly gave the spectator one of those subtle thrills that are among the triumphs of the theatre. The old man is put off to sleep again, and when he is awakened he knows nothing of what has passed. This is how the episode ends:

Lucius. [Rising a little shakily.] Was I asleep, gentlemen?

Harper. I believe you did nod off for a minute.—As I was saying, the first day I only got half a dozen, the next day I hired a boat from old Peter, and we fished the upper lake. You've fished it, haven't you, Frank?

Ormsby. I—oh—ah—yes, yes.

[They are watching Lucius, who has crossed to the door.]

Harper. [Softly.] Mr. Parnell! [The standing figure seems to grow slightly more rigid.] Mr. Parnell! [The figure seems to grow taller, seems to be holding itself in and back.] What about turning in, Frank?

Ormsby. Yes, let's.

[Lucius turns, he is holding himself up, he is taller, his eye is flashing, he looks rather formidable. He makes a step towards the group at the fire, and they instinctively shrink back a little.]

Lucius. Sir—[He pauses, he appears to change his mind, and stalks from the room.]

In the second act, next day, it appears that the irrepressible Smith has telegraphed to London the news of the alleged re-appearance of Parnell, and tokens of growing excitement come pouring into the village, in the shape of telegrams and demands for rooms at the hotel. Mary Lenihan is in despair. She believes Lucius to be really her uncle. She knows that he imagines himself to be Parnell, but, on her late father's authority, she takes this to be a monomania. And to the end—such is the author's delicate art—we do not know which theory is the true one. Both work out quite plausibly. It may be that Mary's father, in 1891, gave house-room to a younger brother, just released from an asylum, and still with a bee in his bonnet; or it may be that he was himself a passionate admirer of Parnell and was prime mover in the plot whereby a friendless Russian immigrant was buried in the coffin which was supposed to contain the remains of the great Tribune.

In our hearts, however, under the glamour of the scene, we have not the least doubt that Lucius is the real Parnell. He himself has no doubt that the time has come for him to cast off his masquerade and stand forth to save Ireland. He has his plan:

I knew that there must be a way out, there must be a solution of the problem; and fishing one day, between two casts of my fly, I found it. It was so simple, it could be told in twenty words. I let my rod drop, and I sat down on the bank, laughing at the simplicity of it. It only needed to be told to Ireland by a man with personality, a man who was loved and feared, and the problem was solved for ever. . . . I hadn't courage to take the plunge, I hadn't faith enough in myself, I—I—And then a voice out of the darkness—like the voice of the Almighty God himself—someone called me by my name. And then I had no longer any doubts. It seemed to me to be a sign from heaven itself.

The rather decrepit old man is now erect and powerful, confident and commanding. Some excellent comedy is got out of the bewilderment and confusion into which the local representatives of the different political factions are thrown by so strange a resurrection. Is he the real Parnell? And if he is, ought one to hail him as a deliverer? or to take steps to bury him again as soon as possible? There is only one man in the immediate neighborhood who knew Parnell—and he is now blind. Brought into the presence of the Claimant, the old ballad-singer touches his features, and then falls at his feet declaring him the veritable hero of his worship. But a blind man's evidence is scarcely sufficient, and it will be evening before men can arrive from Dublin who knew intimately the Uncrowned King. Lucius commands everyone to meet him at the Standing Stones on Knockpatrick, a neighboring hill, shortly before the Dublin train is due.

The last act has been criticized as an anti-climax—in my opinion most unjustly. It consists for the most part of a palaver between Lucius and the representatives of the different parties, but it is instinct with character and drama. "You're not Parnell," cries Long John Flavin, the local usurer, "Parnell never spoke like that!" And Lucius replies:

Of course he didn't. Do you expect me to speak as I did twenty-five years ago, to forget nothing, to learn nothing? Do you expect Ireland to change and me to stand still? Bah, the world's crumbling to pieces under your feet and none of you seem to feel it. There'll be a new heaven and a new earth, and you're blinder to it than Tomas Houlihan.

How the debate ends I do not propose to reveal, for the play will certainly be seen in America, and it would be a pity to discount the final scene. Suffice it to say that Lucius is dead—his healing word unspoken—before the men from Dublin arrive, and that, when a lantern is held to his dead face so that one of the newcomers may see it, the man says, "It's like his features, it might be—but it's years since I saw him—I don't know."

Apart from the works of J. M. Synge—which of course are hors concours—"The Lost Leader" is decidedly the best thing the Irish movement has given us. It has produced many delightful sketches of manners and character, local satires, and bucolic farces; but this is a solid piece of dramatic architecture. The part of Lucius is played with invaluable authority by Mr. Norman McKinnell, the only drawback being his slight Scotch accent. But a Scotch Parnell is less unthinkable than the Irish Abraham Lincoln who is still drawing crowds to Hammersmith.

There has been only one other recent production of any note: "A Temporary Gentleman," by Mr. H. F. Maltby. It is a sort of pendant to Mr. Harold Terry's pleasant comedy, "General Post." Mr. Terry's play dealt with one of the social problems incident to the rising wave of the war, Mr. Maltby's deals with one of the problems which the falling wave brings with it. What is to become of the young men of very modest social standing—clerks and the like—who have served as officers in an army of aristocratic traditions, and now return to civil life with new ideas, habits, claims. It is simply not in human nature that they should be content, in the new order of things, to go back to the mechanical, underpaid, dreary drudgery of the past. Mr. Maltby treats the whole situation with a good deal of insight and a great deal of humor, and himself plays excellently the part of a smug and self-satisfied profiteer.

WILLIAM ARCHER

London, July 4

Amy Lowell's Collection of Modern Verse

MESSRS. Doubleday, Page and Company give notice of a "Bookshelf," comprising fifty-four volumes of representative modern verse, selected by Miss Amy Lowell, and offered for sale, in collected form, at the New York bookstores of the firm. The choice of Miss Lowell as chooser is sagacious, and the inclusion in her list of four volumes written by herself is altogether right and proper. Books in the "old idiom" are allowed a minority representation; one anthology and three books of criticism are included. The series is to furnish an "authoritative guide" to people interested in new verse who have heard "the clamor of the fight from far." (The metaphor is interesting as symptomatic of the outbreak of poetry in our time in the commercial notices of publishers; to-day not only the vines, but the elms that support the vines, bear grapes.) If there is any weakness in the interesting plan of Messrs. Doubleday and Page, it lies possibly in the vagueness of the constituency to which they appeal. Undoubtedly they can find persons who need to be guided to the primary text-books in modern verse. Presumably they can find persons who are willing to read fifty-four volumes of modern poetry, though the Review would shrink from participation in the search. But where is the reader to be found who belongs in both these classes? One hardly spreads a bookshelf before persons who are obliged to inquire the road to the library. Depths of ignorance commonly go with shallow curiosities. Miss Lowell's list will certainly interest critics, but the man whom Messrs. Doubleday and Page have in mind would be better served by counsel to read the Monroe-Henderson anthology through in connection with Miss Lowell's "Tendencies in Modern American Poetry."

In partial compliance with a suggestion of the publishers, the Review will give here and now a brief summary of the chief steps in the radical movement of contemporary verse.

In 1855 Walt Whitman published "Leaves of Grass." He handled many topics and used many words which were strange to the poetry of his day, and he wrote in a rhymeless and metreless verse of which the rhythms were indefinite and variable. The verse was thought to be new and free. Its freedom was unquestionable; its novelty had to be judged in the light of the fact that poetry which looked like prose and prose which sounded like poetry were not unknown, or even very unusual, in English and other literatures. More must be known of prose rhythm and more of free-verse rhythm before the amount of originality in the latter can be fixed with any permanence.

Whitman, then, was a double innovator: an innovator on the side of matter and diction, and an innovator on the side of technique. Both of these novelties had sequels. The sequel in England, which may or may not have been a result, was an expansion in matter and diction on lines not markedly Whitmanesque. In 1874 W. E. Henley published his "Hospital Sketches." Kipling's electrical "Barrack-Room Ballads" and "Seven Seas" came out in 1892 and 1896. Thomas Hardy's grim verse had its beginning in "Wessex Poems" in 1898. In 1913 came the shock of John Masefield's "Everlasting Mercy," a poem riotous in diction and setting, though its teaching was meekness itself. Meanwhile, the plays and tales of Mr. W. W. Gibson had put into the plainest language the cruelest facts in the lives of humble men and women.

Innovation in England, then, applied itself mainly to subject and vocabulary—in France it laid hold of versification. Between 1890 and 1893, a group of young French poets, very unlike Whitman, but very tired of the old French verse-forms, fell in with Whitman's liberated rhythms. M. Vielé-Griffin published translations of the American poet in his review, Les Entretiens politiques et littéraires. M. Henri de Régnier, between 1890 and 1900, put elasticity and versatility into French rhythms, without robbing them of their ancient stay of rhyme. M. Paul Fort, fertile in "Ballades" between 1894 and 1898, made the boundary between verse and prose waver and oscillate in the freakish diversity of his experiments.

These undertakings in France found an eager and adroit pupil in Miss Amy Lowell, an American poetess, whose "Sword-Blades and Poppy-Seed," dating from 1914, was followed in 1916 by "Men, Women and Ghosts." Free verse, as Miss Lowell wrote it, may be defined as a rhymeless form in which the verses (or lines) obey no single or common law. But while her coadjutors, mostly English, perfected the fine and fragile technique of the form, Miss Lowell herself was turning to another form known as "polyphonic prose." Polyphonic prose, though sprinkled with rhyme and assonance, is prose to the eye, and its basis is a richly rhythmized and strongly segmented sentence, the members of which show a balance that is both exquisite and monotonous. Miss Lowell is experimenter and expositor quite as much as poet. She placed militant prefaces, like vedettes, in front of her books of verse, and, viewing them, very properly, as non-combatants, supplied them with bodyguards in the shape of two critical treatises, "Six French Poets" (1915) and "Tendencies in Modern American Poetry" (1916).

America had thus reclaimed from France the metrical impulse which France in the early nineties had borrowed from Whitman. She was also to reclaim from England—or perhaps merely to revive in herself—the impulse towards liberality of subject in which she had anticipated or prompted the mother country. The very curious thing is that these things happened at almost the same time; the formal revolt and the material revolt were practically simultaneous. "Sword-Blades and Poppy-Seed" was issued in 1914. In 1914 and in 1915 appeared "North of Boston" by Robert Frost and "Spoon River Anthology" by Edgar Lee Masters. Neither of these books lacked novelty in form, but the significance of both lay in their material, in the appropriation by poetry of realistic intensities which had hitherto been relinquished to prose on the ground that they were homely or sordid. They were very different books in other ways: Mr. Frost gave poignancy to inner heart-breaks; Mr. Masters imparted grimness to melodrama on a civic scale. But together they formed the complement to Miss Lowell's work; America had fathered both tendencies; like parted brothers they rejoined each other at their common birthplace.

The result of these coincidences must have surprised everybody. The public took fire; books of poetry were bought, were read, were sought by publishers; poets wrote under new stimuli for a widened audience, and an amazed nation called itself to account, in criticism and debate, for its unexampled interest in poetry. Into the worth or duration of this movement it is not the purpose of this meagre and imperfect summary to inquire. We have carried Messrs. Doubleday and Page's reader as far on his journey as we could, and we now abandon him, with a friendliness not untouched with compassion, to his fifty-four volumes.

On Literary Conviviality

IF Wordsworth had written a cycle of drinking songs, though the supposition taxes the imagination, he might have set down complete data as to the times, places, and circumstances of their composition. Writers of Bacchic verse have lacked the Wordsworthian habit of annotating their poems. Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Fletcher, Dekker, and many of their contemporaries seem to have lived greatly in the spirit of their excellent convivial lyrics. Robert Burns, who could write the most sympathetic drinking songs, was regrettably more given

The Continued Dominance of Crocker-Wheeler

Unbudging adherence to the highest manufacturing principles!

This was the ideal laid down 34 years ago by the men who established the pioneer electric motor industry.

Origination and hard and fast principles of engineering have marked C-W progress and today the high reputation of C-W production proves how devotedly the fundamental principles have been upheld.

W. B. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

to example than to lyrical precept. It could easily have been Goldsmith himself, rather than Tony Lumpkin, who so confidently declared,

When Methodist preachers come down
A-preaching that drinking is sinful,
I'll wager the rascals a crown
They'll always preach best with a skinful.

And yet, barring a few biographical traditions and some occasional bits of local color, such as the Mermaid Tavern or the inspiration of "Willie brewed a peck o'maut," we are left unenlightened as to the immediate circumstances attending the production of this class of poems.

Will the drinking song automatically disappear from our literature at the same time that the drink itself is voted out of our reach? Will convivial lyrics, which date back to earliest history, become as obsolete as the songs of the troubadours? Or will this large body of literature remain, preserved, so to speak, in the memory of its own alcohol?

Even purely vicarious toppers find enjoyment in this sort of verse. To its rhythmic sprightliness, its irresistible metrical enthusiasm the physical pulse quickens as to a hornpipe or a jazz melody. At the same time, there is a gradual relaxation of customary formal restraints, ranging all the way from a grateful acceptance of the present mood to a feeling of reckless abandon, finding such climactic expression as "We-won't-go-home-until-morning"; or the profane inquiry at the end of "Hail, hail, the gang's all here"; or, to cite a more classical example, Thomas Dekker's lines,

Empty the cask, score up, we care not;
Fill all the pots again, drink on and spare not.

These devil-may-care climaxes, how-

TIFFANY & Co.

LEATHER DRESSING CASES AND BAGS WITH SILVER FITTINGS

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

ever, should not be taken too literally. They are a necessary but largely conventional part of the typical drinking song, and they are best enjoyed, as Lamb said of comic acting, when their rendition is accompanied by tacit awareness of the exaggeration. On the principle—for we must choose our analogies with care—that only a sober bartender can be trusted to mix drinks artistically, only a person in reasonable possession of his faculties could expect to write an acceptable Bacchic poem.

If this is sound, and the appeal of a drinking song is largely independent of the associations of its subject matter, then a practical demonstration should be possible. Suppose that a perfectly sober writer, mindful only of the literary exhilaration which comes from reading bibulous verse, should attempt to write a lyric of this kind. To show the importance of form as compared with subject matter, suppose his theme to be a beverage not legally classified as alcoholic, but only carbonized for the occasion. To be sure he could not be expected to use the form of a typical drinking song in writing a homiletical anti-drinking poem. The old song, "Touch not the cup," has sufficiently demonstrated the futility artistically speaking of that approach to the subject. No, this poem must be a bona fide drinking song, with its positive attitude and its due proportion of metrical joy. And to emphasize the part which may be played by convention, suppose the writer has no great enthusiasm for the beverage described but is only assuming a cordial attitude for the sake of writing sympathetically.

All the conditions enumerated are fulfilled in the drinking song quoted below.

A TEMPERANCE DRINKING SONG

There's never been a dearth of drinking lays.

From ancient Anacreon down to date,
Poets have sung enthusiastic praise
Of liquors—vinted, malt, and distillate.
Of milder potions some have made their boast,

But there is one that's never had its turn;
So take your cup, and let this be our toast:
The lacteal by-product of the churn.

Oh, the drink I celebrate's a hearty one;
It will leave a fellow feeling fine as silk.
For convivial liquidation

Of a social obligation,
There is nothing in creation
Like a glass of buttermilk!

This cheerful cup of liquid cheese and whey,
This blend of richness and lip-smacking tang,
Will quench our thirst a dozen times a day
Without a single alcoholic pang.
In private or in public, just the same,
No screens to hide us from the passer-by,
We'll seize our bumpers, innocent of blame,
And drink—until the cow is voted dry!

Oh, the drink I celebrate's a trusty one;
It defies the tattling gossips and their ilk.
There's no need of litigation
To defend your reputation
If your regular potation
Is a glass of butter milk.

C. W. P.

Every Reader of "The Review" should read these articles in the August number of

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

Philip Gibbs—writes of his recent impressions of America—an illuminating article by a keen observer.

Arthur Bullard—who recently returned from Russia gives a vivid picture of topsy-turvy conditions in the land of the Bolshevik.

Harry A. Franck—who until recently was an officer in our army and later made a trip through Germany on foot throws new light on the psychology of the conquered Boche.

Buckner Speed—a distinguished engineer puts his finger on the difficulties which aviation has yet to solve.

These are only a few of the many striking features of the August Harper's—a magazine for forward-looking men and women. The fiction in this number is of unusual distinction. One hundred and sixty pages of worth-while reading.

ON EVERY NEWS-STAND

SITE for a SCHOOL or for a Private Country Place

With a Group of Substantial Buildings

In one of the most beautiful and healthful locations in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, in the Lenox and Stockbridge neighborhood, an estate of about 570 acres is offered for sale at a very reasonable price. About 250 acres are under cultivation and the rest is timber land and pasturage.

There are fourteen buildings on the property, substantially built at a cost far exceeding the present price of the entire property.

If the purchaser desired to sell the timber, (recently estimated at a high value by the State Forester,) a very considerable reduction in the net price of the property could be effected.

It is suggested that anyone who is interested would profit by addressing the undersigned at an early date.

Herbert E. Moore, Lee, Mass.

USEFUL ADDITIONS TO A BUSINESS MAN'S LIBRARY

BUSINESS STATISTICS, Edited by M. T. COPELAND. Price $3.75

"* * * cannot be too highly commended as a source book in the methods of compiling and adapting concrete figures to business problems."—Publishers' Weekly.

AN APPROACH TO BUSINESS PROBLEMS, By ARCH W. SHAW. Price $2.00

"For the novice in business it is a veritable mine of information and suggestion."—Boston Herald.

SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT, Edited by C. B. THOMPSON. Price $4.00

"In many ways the book is a powerful indictment of existing business methods."—Economic Journal.

7 Randall Hall,
Cambridge, Mass.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

280 Madison Ave.,
New York

THE REVIEW

243

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Vol. 1, No. 12

New York, Saturday, August 2, 1919

FIFTEEN CENTS

Contents

Brief Comment	243
Editorial Articles:
Bring It to a Head!	245
The Seamen's Strike	246
The Austrian Terms	247
Housing and Prices	247
Disorganizing the Army	248
A Great Physician	249
Sticking Labels on Frenchmen. By Stoddard Dewey	250
China's Reaction to the Shantung Settlement. By Kuang-Ti May	251
The American Commission in Syria. By Ameen Rihani	252
Correspondence	253
Book Reviews:
Economics and British Common Sense	256
National Readjustments	257
A Novelists' Novelist and His Clients	258
Three Books About Poetry	259
The Run of the Shelves	260
It All Depends. By Gustavus Myers	261

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

IT would be folly to deny the gravity of the race rioting at Chicago. Such a clash between whites and blacks in the second city of the country would be matter for sober thought at any time, and gives occasion for peculiar anxiety now, when the minds of men are unsettled and multitudes are infected with the virus of revolutionism. But we see no reason whatever for regarding the disorders at Washington and Chicago—even if they should be followed by similar outbreaks elsewhere—as the beginning of a “race war,” or even the signal for an entirely new régime in the relations between whites and blacks in this country. The South ought to learn a lesson from them, for it has certainly fallen far short of its duty toward the negroes; and in the North, too, there is plenty to be done in the way of improvement. But we have to recognize to-day, as we have had to recognize these fifty years, that there is no short-cut solution of the race problem. Give the negro a fair chance for education and employment; put an end to the unspeakable atrocity of lynching; let him be sure of impartial justice in the courts. All this can be done, and must be done if we are to have decent relations between the races; the rest must be left to the slow work of time. There have been several previous occasions—East St. Louis and Atlanta need only be mentioned—when race troubles have looked quite as formidable as they do to-day, but proved to be only passing explosions. And although the present outbreaks suggest sinister possibilities on account of the Bolshevik element that enters into them in a greater or less degree, it would be foolish to jump to the conclusion that they will actually take on the dimensions of an extensive race struggle.

“DOG eat dog” is the phrase that comes to mind nowadays in following the various quirks and turns of German revelations. The Erzberger bombshell of last week was one of the most curious of these developments. One felt like applauding a move that seemed to have for its object the fixing of guilt for the prolongation of the war upon German arrogance in the face of conciliatory approaches by the Allies, but while there are a great many things yet to be cleared up, the presumption is overwhelming that no really new knowledge of this kind can be forthcoming. Germany's case is bad enough without any artificial heightening of her guilt. The devil may be as black as he was painted, but it is pretty certain that he is no blacker. Those outside of Germany who remember the events of the time were little stirred by the Erzberger story, which bore internal evidence of being a falsely colored version of the well-known facts connected with the papal intercession of 1917. And now comes M. Ribot, who was French Premier and Foreign Minister at the time, and flatly declares that Erzberger's statement is “a distortion of the truth”—that the proposals for overtures to Germany originated with Pope Benedict and were declined by both France and Great Britain with “the politest acknowledgment to the Pope, but nothing more.” That the German military clique would have received any overtures in a truculent spirit, if the overtures had been made, is possibly what Erzberger's documentary evidence really shows. But that hardly required proof; and in any case the demonstration of this hypothetical wickedness is too much like the antiquarian's exhibit of Balaam's sword to command any great interest.

APOLOGISTS for the transfer of the German rights in Shantung to Japan have advanced the plea that German influence is still too deeply rooted in that region to be eradicated by so weak a power as China. The case is said to need a strong hand, and to call for a temporary occupation. This contention involves a matter of fact which has not been made clear. If the facts are such, the whole case could be settled by an explicit expression of intention from Japan accompanied by a promise to withdraw when the mission shall have been fulfilled. Short of a Japanese Platt amendment, the situation remains inherently threatening and most prejudicial to the claims of the Covenant. What makes the case worse is the recent brutal repression of the disturbances in Korea. Japan has not shone as a self-appointed mandatory. She does not come with such clean hands that the Senate is bound perfunctorily to accept her apparent spoliation of China. Proper diplomatic assurances from Japan would clear the air and are emphatically in order.

THE British are having trying times, and it is hard for outsiders to understand why they do not settle down to work and enjoy the fruits of victory. But internal troubles, especially the miners' grievances, are causing more anxiety than the terrific German drive of last year in Picardy and Flanders. It was thought that the miners would be satisfied with the seven-hour day and the increased pay allowed them by the Interim Sankey Report, as it was understood that piece rates would be adjusted to the new conditions, so that, although the output would be reduced by about ten per cent., the miners would get for seven hours the wages which they had previously received for eight hours, and two shillings a day besides. But the Coal Controller, it seems, made some mistake in his calculations, and the Yorkshire miners with some from other counties—about 250,000 in all—went on strike until the difficulty should be settled. They feared that they were going to be defrauded of their rightful due; but in general they were in a bad frame of mind—disgusted with the Government and the bureaucracy, suspicious of the mine owners, stubborn in their demand for nationalization, angry about the increase in the price of coal, the high cost of living, intervention in Russia, and smarting under the lash of public criticism. They must have been in an ugly mood or they would not have deserted the pumps, leaving the mines, their own source of livelihood, in danger of being ruined.

The Government took immediate steps to prevent this disaster by sending blue-jackets to man the pumps and soldiers to protect the bluejackets, and then Mr. David Lloyd George, with his mighty men—Hon. Andrew Bonar Law, Sir Eric Geddes and Sir Auckland Geddes—made haste to hold conferences with the leaders of the miners, for already manufacturers were shutting down their plants for lack of coal, exports had ceased and the danger of extensive trouble was imminent. The difficulty was settled in the usual way, by concessions to the miners, and one more crisis in British industry was over. But it is evident that further trouble is brewing, for the miners are determined to force the issue of nationalization, which Parliament does not want, and their leaders, who have urged them on, are unable to keep them in hand. The politicians, too, are beginning to wish that they had been more chary of their promises. Workers in other industries, together with the unemployed, are beginning to see that the miners have gone too far with their policy of rule or ruin, and there is growing indignation against them. The other members of the Triple Alliance—the railway men and the transport workers—suffer when coal is dear and when the miners go on strike, so there is a possibility of their wavering in their loyalty, for the solidarity of labor is by no means complete. Sooner or later it may be necessary for the Government, backed by public opinion, to come to grips with the miners, and when they do there will be a terrible struggle, the outcome of which no man can foresee. Once more the keystone of the British industrial arch seems to be weakening, and there is danger that the whole structure may collapse. It is surely time for our English cousins to pull themselves together, and to say to one another, in the fine words of Shakespeare: "Nought shall make us rue, if England to itself do stand but true."

CLEMENCEAU has received two votes of confidence, with increasing majorities, within a week. It is plain that the snap vote against the Minister of Provisions had no general bearings, and the Tiger's position seems quite safe for the few weeks or months he is going to want it. His vindication, though fully expected, is welcome as showing that despite superficial revolutionary talk, everything is really taking a normal parliamentary course in France. Alarmists who see in Europe nothing but organized revolt would do well to note the collapse of the general political strikes set for England, France, and Italy on the 20th and 21st. These were to be demonstrations that would shake the existing political order. On the day set for the symbolic uprising, there were sporadic strikes, but nothing of consequence. The Social Revolution was indefinitely postponed. All of which goes to prove that labor unions, parliaments, and men generally are more sensible than their constant talk and occasional actions would seem to indicate.

IT is not premature to give to commercial aviation the best consideration the country is capable of. With the air mail-service attaining to the dignity of a strike, it is plain that, in however limited a way, the fields of air are susceptible of still further profitable cultivation. If so, America can scarcely afford to lag behind. It does not do to assume that primacy in what may prove to be an important form of human achievement must inevitably gravitate to us, without effort on our part. Nor will it do to importune the Government to do something about it. The Government might do much more than it is doing if it maintained some of its plants and flying fields, if it made available its store of Curtiss training planes to the many hardy young men who are eager to continue, or to learn, the business of flying. It might do much to bring up a race of flyers useful for the enlargement as well as the preservation of the blessings of peace. But if commercial flying is to amount to anything, it must come as the result of courageous and unwearying private enterprise. Already, we understand, private enterprise in England is prepared to spend $60,000,000 in the development of flying. America starts with a handicap in the matter of motor patents and of plane patents. But the door is not closed to us yet, though that may happen soon. The suggestion of a speaker at a recent meeting of the Aeronautical Society that planes of similar performance to our DeHavilands be employed for trans-oceanic flights in a system of eight-hundred-mile relays, a plane dropping its thousand-pound cargo on a mother ship cruising about a fixed point, then refueling and returning to its base, leaving its cargo to be carried over the next stage by another plane, may not be the ultimate solution. But it is well worth looking into. There is promise of ample business in the form of matter usually sent by cable, of drawings, signatures, and other urgent mail matter, to make it pay. And as a challenge to Yankee enterprise in a field of great possibilities, if not too precise promise, it is something that can not wisely be ignored.

SPEAKING of the possibility of legislating people into virtue, Mr. Bryan a while ago cited the example of dueling. People went on fighting duels, he seemed to say, until some high-minded folk passed a law against it, and then they stopped. The facts are quite otherwise. In England and America, when dueling flourished, there was always plenty of law against it, and plenty of ably expressed opposition by thoughtful people. The trouble was that the law was too severe to be enforced. What ended dueling was not legislation at all, but a gradual change in the manners of the small class that engaged in it. There was plenty of law against dueling in Germany, where it existed under about the same sort of protest that football evokes here, as a form of indoor athletics. There is plenty of law against dueling in Latin countries, where it still survives as a more or less harmless way of ending an uncomfortable discussion. After all, instead of nursing a grievance against your even-Christian, it is perhaps more conducive to mental health to fire a pistol into the air somewhere in his neighborhood, and then shake hands and make up. It is only a gesture, perhaps; it is easily ridiculed, as when Sainte-Beuve insisted on fighting under an umbrella, or an American selected for weapons baseballs at fifteen paces; but it may serve wonderfully to purge the passions. It is something other than laws, something behind them of which they are the convenient and effective expression, that in the long run keeps society from doing things that are harmful to it. And, it is sometimes worth while to be reminded, life does not consist in not doing things, but in doing things—wisely.

THE REVIEW

A weekly journal of political and general discussion

Published by

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY CORPORATION
140 Nassau Street, New York

FABIAN FRANKLIN, President
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, Treasurer

RODMAN GILDER, Business Manager

Subscription price, five dollars a year in advance. Fifteen cents a copy. Foreign postage, one dollar extra; Canadian postage, fifty cents extra.

Copyright, 1919, in the United States of America

Editors

FABIAN FRANKLIN
HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER

Bring It to a Head!

THERE is nothing strikingly novel in Mr. Hughes's letter to Senator Hale. Yet we are inclined to find in it a really hopeful significance. For the real thing that is going on in Washington is far less a process of examination and discussion than a process of alignment of forces; and Senator Hale's inquiry, taken in conjunction with Mr. Hughes's reply to it, indicates, to our mind, more of an approach to a reasonable alignment than anything else that has thus far come to the front. The essence of Senator Hale's letter is contained in this passage:

Rather than take the Covenant as it now stands I am very certain that considerably more than one-third of the Senate would refuse to ratify the treaty altogether.

As far as I am personally concerned I do not want to see this happen and I do want to see some plan devised whereby the United States may safely enter the League of Nations.

And the crux of Mr. Hughes's reply is to be found in what he says about the strategy of the situation in the Senate:

If the Senate should adopt reservations by a majority vote, I assume that these will be made part of the proposed resolution of assent to the treaty, and the question will then be whether the Senate will give its assent, with these reservations, by the requisite two-thirds vote. If the proposed reservations are reasonable, the responsibility for the defeat of the treaty, if it is defeated, will lie with those who refuse the vote essential to the assent.

Upon this task—the task of formulating a set of reasonable reservations, reservations which would safeguard vital American concerns, which would be in substance as little disturbing to the Covenant as is compatible with this requirement, and in form interpretative and not amendatory—the Republican leaders should from this time forth firmly centre their efforts. For such a set of reservations there is every reason to believe that a majority vote can be obtained; and when this has once become evident the end of the long drawn-out struggle over the treaty ought to be in sight.

To the attainment of this object Mr. Hughes makes a valuable contribution in the form that he has proposed for the reservations. As regards the Monroe Doctrine and the control of what the United States regards as purely domestic questions the form does not greatly differ from what has been proposed by Mr. Root and others; in the matter of notice of withdrawal from the League, however, as well as in the matter of Article X, one observes a very definite exercise of lawyer-like skill in reducing to a minimum the possibility of objection from other signatory Powers. As to the right of withdrawal, Mr. Hughes's proposed resolution declares that the withdrawal of any Power shall take effect at the time specified in the notice, "notwithstanding any claim, charge or finding" of non-fulfilment of obligations; but it adds that "such withdrawal shall not release the Power from any debt or liability theretofore incurred"—thus embodying what may well be regarded as a substantial compliance with the provisions of the Covenant as it now stands. In the case of Article X, the broad statement of the first sentence goes, we believe, beyond the intent of Mr. Hughes, and should be modified; what follows is the essential thing—the declaration that the United States assumes no obligation to take any action in pursuance of the recommendation of the Council of the League unless such recommendation be approved by Congress. It has been confidently asserted, both by advocates and by opponents of the unreserved acceptance of the Covenant, that this is all that Article X means anyhow; and it has been asserted with equal confidence, both by advocates and by opponents, that the recommendation of the Council would carry with it an obligation that we could not disregard without a violation of our national honor. Mr. Hughes's proposal, therefore, is purely interpretative; and yet it completely removes the chief obstacle to the acceptance of Article X.

It is high time for the Republican floundering in this great matter to come to an end. It has been a most unedifying spectacle—not as an exhibition of excessive partisanship, as is so often charged, but of lack of intelligent leadership. Indeed, the floundering is rather a sign of non-partisanship than of partisanship. It is far easier to get together upon a scheme of partisan warfare than to come to an agreement as to a large public question upon its merits. The great variety of opinion and position manifested among Republican Senators is proof that at least a considerable proportion of them are acting according to their individual views of the subject. What has been lacking is an appreciation of the necessity, if anything is to be accomplished, of agreement upon some line of action which, while not satisfying every individual, would embody the essentials upon which all except a few extremists could agree. However, in fairness to the Republicans it is only just to say that the unity among the Democrats is to be ascribed not to whole-hearted enthusiasm in behalf of the League, but to that support of the President in his position which is natural and inevitable in the circumstances. In and out of Congress there is probably a majority who feel that the League holds out the possibility of a great and beneficent future—who accept it as the best thing in sight, as something entitled to a fair chance, as an opening which we can not afford to turn down. But the number of those who hail it with joy as the sure harbinger of an era of peace and good will is so small as to be almost negligible. In these circumstances, it is but natural that any sacrifice of national tradition or policy which it demands should be viewed with a jealousy which would otherwise be out of place; and we may be sure that this feeling exists among Democrats as well as among Republicans.

What the President is going to do to bring about a solution of the problem is still far from clear. Thus far he has done nothing to change the situation that has existed these many months. Apparently he adheres to the purpose of making a great appeal to the people to stand by him against all opposition or criticism. What his chances are of bringing this attempt to a triumphant conclusion, he is perhaps better able to judge than any one else; yet in such enterprises he has been by no means uniformly successful. One instance of signal failure was that of his appeal on the eve of the Congressional elections of last year; but, properly viewed, the series of speeches he made at the outset of his peace-making mission in Europe is an instance no less impressive. In neither case did the sentiment to which he appealed suffice for his purpose. In the tour which he now contemplates his experience may be quite different. But he certainly runs a great risk. He may succeed in developing a state of public sentiment to which the opposition in the Senate will be compelled to bow; but if he fails the opposition will undoubtedly be strengthened, and made in many ways more dangerous. Would it not be the part of wisdom for him rather to watch his chance for a great stroke of conciliation and legitimate compromise? Indeed, is not such a chance open to him now? Would it not be a great stroke for him to accept Mr. Hughes's proposals, or something very like them? This it seems clear would take the ground from under the feet of the opposition. It may be that the psychological moment has not yet arrived for such a step; but in this direction we are convinced is to be found the way out of a situation which every succeeding week of its continuance will make more and more injurious to the prospects of our country and of the world. It is not only Congress, but also the President, that has not risen to the height of the occasion. Had he from the start set the note of a united endeavor in which Americans without distinction of party were called upon to bear an equal share, the whole development of affairs would have been very different. But it is not too late even now. By a single stroke of boldness and magnanimity, Mr. Wilson still has it in his power to assure not only the success of the treaty but the establishment of a feeling that that success was not a mere personal or party victory but an achievement of American patriotism and good sense.

The Seamen's Strike

THE seamen's strike, which seriously interfered with shipping all along the Atlantic and Gulf coast for about three weeks, was a matter of direct concern not only to the American Steamship Company, chief spokesman for the private owners, but to the United States Government itself, which, through the Shipping Board, is the largest single owner, and will presently have more ocean-going ships than all the private owners put together. Mr. Edward N. Hurley, Chairman of the Board, put the case very clearly before the National Marine League on March 27, when he said:

The United States Government now owns 555 ocean-going steel cargo ships, aggregating 3,385,475 deadweight tons. In addition it has under contract 1,336 similar vessels of 9,275,006 deadweight tons. If our present programme be carried out there will be under the American flag next year 16,732,700 deadweight tons of ocean-going steel cargo and passenger ships. This fleet will be the equivalent of almost half of the merchant tonnage which plies the seas today under the flag of all nations combined. The Government will own about 70 per cent. of it.

In view of these facts, it is evident that there is now going on a tremendous expansion of our ocean-going marine, to say nothing of the multitude of smaller vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, on the great lakes and other waterways. Whether by accident or design, the International Seamen's Union of America chose the strategic moment for presenting its demands, not only because the new ships must be manned, but because of Europe's urgent need for foodstuffs, cotton, coal, and other necessities of life. Then, too, there is in the interior a great scarcity of farm labor for the harvesting of our enormous crops, so that many seamen might have taken a vacation in the harvest fields, while their less enterprising shipmates drew strike pay for picket duty along the waterside of the coast cities.

As usual, there are several points of view from which the strikers' demands may be regarded, none of which gives absolute knowledge of the question—for it is many-sided. They asked for an all-round increase in wages of $15 a month, for an 8-hour day in port and the corresponding three-watch system at sea, for preference to union seamen, and for better accommodations on shipboard. Some of their demands were considered vital, while others were thrown in for good measure, as the unions knew quite well that they could not get everything at once.

The trouble began on July 10, with a strike of firemen, oilers, and water-tenders, presently extending to the regular seamen until many ships were tied up all along the coast from Portland to Galveston. The private owners were not inclined to concede much, but the Shipping Board replied to the strikers' demands by telegram on July 13, fixing the wage of boatswains at $90 a month, able seamen $85, ordinary seamen $60, and boys for training purposes $40. A flat increase of $15 a month was granted to stewards and chief cooks, and a flat increase of $10 for all other positions, including firemen, oilers, and water-tenders, who were the first to strike. Concessions were also granted to deck officers and engineers, but these are not members of the Seamen's Union. The Board agreed to the 8-hour day in port, but would not allow the three-watch system at sea, because that would increase the size of crews at a time of great shortage of sailors. The Board declared its intention to establish joint grievance committees in important ports to interpret rules and arrangements, but nothing was said about reference to unionists, except that other pending questions were to be subject to negotiation.

The American Steamship Company, on behalf of the private owners, accepted the decision of the Board under protest. The seamen, on the other hand, although fairly well satisfied with the wages allowed, determined to stand out for their original demands, especially the three-watch system and preference to unionists, and the strike continued for five weeks longer, after which the Shipping Board and the private owners made some further concessions and a settlement was effected on July 26. By the final terms boatswains are to receive $95, able seamen $85, ordinary seamen $65, boys $40; while the crew of the engine-room, the fireroom, and the steward's department are allowed proportionately more than the seamen. The three-watch system was allowed to wheelmen and lookout only, but preference to union seamen was not granted. The officers of the Union consider the strike a great success, and they have every reason for that opinion.

What the Seamen's Union wanted most of all was preference to unionists, but that is what they were unable to get. It was not a demand for the closed shop exactly, since non-union seamen might be employed when union men were not available; it was rather a preliminary measure designed to build up the membership of the Union, to increase its power, and to prepare the way for further demands at a later date.

True, the Seamen's Union had some such preference during the war, which it regards as a precedent that should obtain in time of peace. This, however, is a dangerous argument for the Union to use, for it proves too much. The preference in question was granted in consideration of special and dangerous war service; then it was demanded as a right without the offer of any equivalent whatever. Other precedents might be cited, but they all show that preference to unionists is a franchise or special privilege which generally is, and always should be, granted on the basis of a quid pro quo. Thus, under the late lamented Protocol in the New York garment trade, preference was allowed the Garment Workers because they agreed to submit disputes to arbitration. Similarly, in New Zealand the Arbitration Court commonly allows preference, but only to unions registered under the Arbitration Act and never to those which reserve the right to strike.

Recent events in Great Britain have called attention more than ever before to the importance of transportation as the keystone of the industrial arch, without which the whole fabric would collapse. The unions, especially the more radical of them, have made practical application of the circumstance, while the employers and the Government have allowed matters to drift until they are now confronted with the powerful and truculent Triple Alliance of miners, railwaymen, and transport workers, whose strangle-hold on British industry it seems almost impossible to release. The Triple Alliance could, if it wished, bring about a social revolution, or, at the least, a disastrous civil war. The situation there clearly shows the danger that may come to a whole country from the concentration of power in the hands of a group of special interests, without any guarantee that it will not be used for unsocial ends.

The I. W. W. of this country, confessedly revolutionary, well understand the relation of transportation to all the other industries of the country; and realizing that a general strike of the orthodox type is impracticable, they plan to reach the same end through a general strike of transport workers. In setting forth the merits of their scheme, James Scott, Acting-Secretary of the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union of the I. W. W., says:

Remember, fellow workers, that transportation is the keystone of the present industrial system, and that when transportation stops, industry stops.

Our Seamen's Union, of course, is not revolutionary, and such leaders as Andrew Furuseth have no sympathy whatever with the I. W. W.; but they would be something more than human if, finding themselves in a position of great power, they were not tempted to misuse it when occasion offered. Besides, these relatively conservative leaders might at any time be displaced by others far more radical, and if the Shipping Board and the private owners—both trustees for the country at large—were to encourage the creation of such a power within the state without taking from it the right to strike, they would be selling the country's birthright for a mess of pottage.

All this, of course, takes no account of the interests of non-union seamen, nor of the private owners and the Shipping Board, all of whom may have rights that should be considered. Indeed, both the Shipping Board and the private owners may find it hard to make both ends meet when the enormous fleet now building is put in commission, and when Great Britain and other countries resume their long interrupted traffic. The Seamen's Act of 1915, commonly known as the La Follette Act, but really the work of Mr. Furuseth and the Seamen's Union, has unquestionably increased the cost of operating American ships as compared with those of other countries, and it is still a question whether we shall be able to do our own ocean carrying without government subsidies or government ownership, both of which depend, in the last resort, upon the good will of the taxpayer.

The Austrian Terms

UNQUESTIONABLY the most sensational result of the war is the reduction of Austria from one of the greatest of Empires to one of the smallest of republics. Three-quarters of the Reich has been shorn off for distribution to Poland, Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Italy, and Rumania. Hungary is to be treated separately, with the prospect of being first conquered in a supplementary campaign. What remains of Austria is some 32,000 square miles, about the area of Portugal, with a population of 7,000,000, approximately that of Belgium before the war. Of the new states carved out of old Austria, the sole inheritor of the name is the most homogeneous, being almost exclusively German. Of the entire population nearly a third, 2,000,000, live, or lived, in Vienna. The land is largely mountainous and neither fertile nor rich in mineral resources. It can barely support its own people and surely can hardly maintain a world city like Vienna on the old basis.

The Republic of Austria is to bear the war damages and indemnities due in Italy and the Balkans, though presumably Hungary will eventually be made to share in the reparations. The sum is not fixed, but there are assurances that it will be justly apportioned according to Austria's ability to pay, while the payments will be completed within thirty years. Reparations of a particularly exemplary sort are to be exacted promptly in the shape of livestock to resupply the Italian and Balkan regions lately overrun by the Austrian armies.

All national debt existing before the war is to be assumed by the new states with Austria, the proportions to be adjusted by the League in conference with the parties concerned. The very thorny matter of the war debt is virtually let alone. All the new states are cleared of liability of any sort, nor can they as nations or individuals put Austria in strait to pay the war bonds. She remains answerable for the war debt held outside of the former Empire. But this must be a negligible amount. The clause will have to be safeguarded, for it invites to fraudulent transfer of the war bonds to foreigners. The treaty provisions for the war debt virtually force repudiation, which is possibly the only way out of the tangle. In the matter of shipping destroyed during the war, Austria, like Germany, pays ton for ton. Such are the main provisions of the treaty. The very interesting arrangements for artistic indemnity and search of title as regards the Austrian art treasures we shall probably treat later in a separate article.

On the whole, the terms, while severe, are just and practical. They may be mitigated somewhat when the settlement with Hungary is made. They leave the Republic of Austria in a most anomalous condition. She holds one of the most splendid capitals in the world with very slight resources for its upkeep. The Republic is about in the position of a very poor young man who has fallen heir to an inalienable palace. Deprived of the great industrial districts of Galicia and Silesia, as of the fertile steppes of Hungary, Austria has for the moment, with sorely impaired capital, an almost embarrassing residuum of social prestige. She will naturally try to make up in trade and finance for what she now lacks in territory and natural resources. One would be glad to see her find compensations in the realities for her old factitious renown.

From the new Slavic states she has little to expect, at least until time shall have healed old grudges. They are likely to give their former tyrant few preferences of any sort. With Hungary, who, if not loving German Austria more, at least loves the Slavs less, the Republic of Austria is likely to resume close social and commercial relations. The way of rehabilitation distinctly lies in forming a new and perhaps unwritten Ausgleich. Despite the racial enmity, which is rather superficial, there is a real affinity between the German Austrian and the Hungarian temperament, the Germans having been to their benefit partially Magyarized. The real bond should work more potently now that the unnatural political union is annulled. Rumania is on the whole likely to seek her trade and personal relations rather with Austria and Hungary, states considerably influenced by Latin civilization, than with the new Slavic nations or Russia. It is very important for all Southeastern Europe that the European tradition represented by Austria should be maintained and strengthened. She will find her real future rather in winning back the sympathy of her former subjects than in the obvious course of turning to a German alliance.

For the present the League will prevent any such alliance between Austria and Germany. In the long run it may have to be permitted. That it is inevitable we do not see. So far as the realities of self-determination are concerned, a union between Austria and Bavaria, a renewal of the old South German Confederation, would be far more logical than the greater union. As Catholics and inheritors of a European tradition, Bavaria and Austria are far more akin than either is to Prussia. If the League works the miracle of removing international fears, such regroupings based on affections rather than on the need of protection should become possible. The natural and necessary endeavor of the Republic of Austria to build up a new sphere of influence in the regions it lately controlled through political force and guile will be watched with interest and even sympathy. The future of Europe is going to be largely determined, within a few years, on the soil that was once Austrian. If the states indulge in tariff wars and encourage racial hatreds, the partition of Austria will merely have extended the Balkans to the headwaters of the Rhine. For the League remains a gigantic task of arbitration and conciliation, a task in which the new Republic of Austria, with her extraordinary tradition of diplomacy, may be of great influence. No nation of modern times has cared more earnestly for prestige. The only lines along which it can be regained for Austria seem clear. As a province of Germany, she might be richer than she is likely to be in independence, but with the path to national renown completely closed.

Housing and Prices

FOR sound sense and careful thinking we have seen few reports more deserving of commendation than that made by the Housing Committee of the Merchants' Association of New York. In such a problem as that which presses so acutely upon the population of our greatest city, it is almost as important to avoid going off on false scents as it is to work out genuine remedies. Indeed, it is more important; for if the public has its attention centered upon grievances that are unreal, or upon projects that can not possibly result in extensive improvement, not only can there be no chance of adopting any useful policy, but there will actually be paralysis of those spontaneous activities which are independent of any policy at all. The Merchants' Association report has the great merit of unflinchingly pointing out the real elements in the situation, and of showing the baseless character of some of the ideas that are most current concerning it. The fact that most of the points of this nature made in the report are common property among people who understand the subject, does not lessen the value of the firm and lucid presentation of them in the report.

The very first thing to be recognized, and the thing never to be lost sight of, is that the only way to solve the housing problem is to build houses. Profiteer-hunting may be more interesting, and is certainly more exciting, than a sober tackling of the question of supply; but, as is pointed out in the report, not only is the practice of "profiteering" a very minor element in the case, but what little good in the way of easing of the situation can be accomplished by the hunting down of actual profiteers is far more than balanced by the discouragement of legitimate building enterprise through fear of the odium which these proceedings tend to attach to homeowners in general. This is not to say that a just and sober endeavor should not be made to stop abuses; the trouble is with the indiscriminating spirit of a general crusade into which such agitations are so apt to fall. If we are to have more houses, we must encourage builders; and we do not encourage them when we seek to prevent those who already own houses from obtaining the return which naturally comes to them upon business principles. You may intimidate a man here and there into taking less rent than the business conditions of the time warrant; but you won't intimidate very many, and you will prevent a great many others from going into a business which you have virtually blacklisted.

This, however, is only one point of the committee's report. It finds the impediments to the construction of the necessary housing to consist chiefly in two things:

I. Lack of money for building operations caused by

(a) Insufficient return on mortgages due to Federal taxes.

(b) Insufficient return on operation of buildings, and apparent hostility of the public to the collection by the owner of a sufficient return, and

II. Doubt as to the continuance of the prevailing high prices of building construction, and reluctance to build now while they do prevail.

On the subject of taxation the committee urges exemption from income taxes of the revenue from real estate mortgages up to an aggregate amount of forty thousand dollars in the hands of any one individual. A recommendation of this general nature was made some time ago by the joint committee on housing of the New York State Legislature. As stated in the Review at the time, such exemption would be justified on the ground of urgent public necessity, and is also in keeping with existing legislation in the matter of farm loans. The degree in which this might be expected to be helpful is shown in the Merchants' Association Committee's report to be greater than might at first thought be supposed, and it is to be hoped that the measure will be urged upon Congress.

The question of high prices of building construction belongs in a different domain, and all that the committee or anybody else can do in regard to it is to express a judgment which might have influence on practical men. The committee believes, in common with almost all economists and business men who have studied the question, that there is no prospect of a general lowering of prices for a long time to come. The world is on a new price level, caused not by extortionate practices, or the plots of evil-minded persons, but by the enormous expansion of credit and of paper currency throughout the world, together with the diversion of a large part of the world's energy from fruitful productive enterprises to the purposes of war making. To some extent there should be a recoil in the direction of lowered prices through the restoration of normal productive activities. But the great factor of monetary inflation is with us to stay, certainly for a long time, and even the other process will be slow in making any marked impression upon prices. Moreover, while wages of labor have in some directions gone beyond even the great rise in the level of prices, labor on the whole, especially if we take into account the salaried as well as the wage-earning classes, has not caught up with that level. Accordingly, in the adjustments that remain to be made, there is every reason to expect, for a long time to come, increases in cost of production that will tend to cancel those decreases which will take place where scarcity of labor has run wages up to extortionate heights. Take it all in all, it is idle for persons contemplating building to wait for a drop in building costs that is certainly far off, when returns in the shape of rent, for a series of years at least, will be on an unusually high scale.

The whole situation offers a typical example of the way in which economic hardships tend to be lessened not by crying out against them, nor by resorting to repressive legislation, but by letting economic forces do their natural work. The way to reduce rents—that is, to reduce them on a large scale, and not merely in the case of an instance here and there—is to let them take their course. If you say you won't tolerate rents that strike you as exorbitant, in face of the plain fact that they are not high enough to tempt capital into taking advantage of them by going into building enterprise, you will be cutting off your one recourse. Let the temptation stand, and you may for a while have to pay rents that are beyond the natural return of capital, but you won't do it indefinitely because capital won't let you. On the other hand, if capital, already shy on account of the inherent difficulties of the case, is further frightened by unreasoning denunciations or threats, capital will keep out of the field; and no substitute for it will be supplied by anything that the denunciators or threateners will undertake to do in the premises.

Disorganizing the Army

THE American Army, which has given a good account of its foes, might well pray to be delivered from its friends. Its necessary reduction and reorganization is being effected by a simple process of Congressional starvation. Secretary Baker made perfunctory recommendations that the Regular Army be kept at 506,000, pending consideration of our permanent establishment. The proposal was in itself reasonable. It permitted the retention of a complete organization on a working basis. It afforded units sufficiently large to give proper tactical training to officers and enlisted force. It gave a chance for the army to avail itself of the new officer material developed in the war. Finally it furnished a slight margin of force to be used if our new responsibilities should require.

Mr. Baker, it seems to us, was much at fault in not pressing his recommendations. He has yielded readily to Congressional parsimony. It is to be feared that both the President and the Secretary of War make a virtue of neglecting army matters as a pledge of sincere devotion to the principle of disarmament. In any case Mr. Baker seems to have accepted the decision of a stupidly economical Congress, his recent appearance before the House Committee being too late to undo the mischief.

The Army is being reduced by the simple process of cutting the force to fit the appropriations. All technical services, such as aviation, tanks, and chemical warfare, must be limited to a depot basis, without provision either for active practice or for investigation. The personnel for these special services must be drawn from the regular force, which is quickly to be reduced to 180,000. About 23,000 temporary officers, the flower of the volunteer service, who have applied for permanent commissions, must be discharged. We have fairly in sight once more the platoon of fifty masquerading as a company with a major in charge, and the company of two hun-

A Great Physician

THE opening of the Johns Hopkins Medical School marked an epoch in medical education, and in the progress of medical science and practice, in America. The standard there so boldly set, and so firmly adhered to, has since become dominant in leading institutions, old and new, in all parts of the country; and now it is only by an effort of memory that we can recall how far we were from any such standard, and how doubtful seemed its prospect of successful establishment, when the new project was launched thirty years ago. In that great work Dr. Osler was a leading figure; and it is therefore matter of national interest that, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, there is presented a survey of his life and work, and an account of his rare and picturesque personality. To this object the July issue of the Bulletin of the Johns Hopkins Hospital is entirely devoted. It is natural that such a tribute should have been paid him by his former colleagues and disciples; but in doing so they have rendered a service to all who are capable of appreciating the highest possibilities of a great physician, teacher, and leader.

The fifty quarto pages of the Bulletin comprise papers dealing with every phase of Osler's many-sided activity—Osler as Chief of the Medical Clinic, Osler the Teacher, Osler and Patient, Osler as a Citizen and his relation to the Tuberculosis Crusade in Maryland, Osler's Literary Style, are five of the eighteen heads—and wind up with a copious bibliography. A perusal of these papers can not fail to impress any one with a sense both of the largeness of Osler's nature and the fruitfulness of his work; but the very division of the subject interferes with the obtaining of that rounded picture of the man which a general account from a single hand might more successfully convey. Fortunately, however, the article contributed by Dr. W. S. Thayer, the present holder of Osler's chair, contains a characterization which those who have known Osler will recognize as truthful, and which will give to those who have not had that privilege a vivid realization of a personality that it is good to hear about. After laying down the rules that should guide a physician and teacher, Dr. Thayer goes on in a passage which, though almost too long to quote, it would be a pity to abridge:

If you can practice consistently all this—and then, if you can bring into corridor and ward a light, springing step, a kindly glance, a bright word to every one you meet, arm passed within arm or thrown over the shoulder of the happy student or colleague; a quick, droll, epigrammatic question, observation or appellation, that puts the patient at his ease or brings a pleased blush to the face of the nurse; an apprehension that grasps in a minute the kernel of the situation, and a memory teeming with instances and examples that throw light on the question; an unusual power of succinct statement and picturesque expression, exercised quietly, modestly, and wholly without sensation; if you can bring into the lecture room an air of perfect simplicity and directness, and, behind it all, have an ever-ready store of the most apt and sometimes surprising interjections that so light up and emphasize that which you are setting forth that no one in the room can forget it; if you can enter the sick-room with a song and an epigram, an air of gaiety, an atmosphere that lifts the invalid instantly out of his ills, that produces in the waiting hypochondriac so pleasing a confusion of thought that the written list of questions and complaints, carefully compiled and treasured for the moment of the visit, is almost invariably forgotten; if the joy of your visit can make half a ward forget the symptoms that it fancied were important, until you are gone; if you can truly love your fellow, and, having said evil of no man, be loved by all; if you can select a wife with a heart as big as your own, whose generous welcome makes your tea-table a Mecca—if you can do all this, you may begin to be to others the teacher that "the chief" is to us!

Happy the man to whom such a tribute can be honestly paid!

Turning from Osler to the achievement at Baltimore in which he played so important a part, it is worth while to take every opportunity to emphasize the cardinal fact about it—the fact that it was big men, not big money, that did the work. The Johns Hopkins Medical School did enjoy the advantage of having a great hospital—the Johns Hopkins Hospital—at its disposal; the foresight of the founder and his advisers had from the beginning provided that the Hospital should be an integral part of the Medical School. But the endowment of the Medical School itself was only half a million dollars, which it owed to the liberality of Miss Garrett and her devotion to the cause of women's education—the admission of women on equal terms with men having been made an essential condition of her gift. It was the big men—Welch, Osler, Halsted, Kelly—that drew to Johns Hopkins the pick of the medical students of the country; it was the inspiration of these men, and not buildings or apparatus, that made the Baltimore school the focus of such energetic and fruitful enthusiasm as had never before been known in this country, and as has so largely contributed to the growth of a like spirit in our medical schools in general. The lesson is not that money is of no importance in universities. It is of very great importance; much money must, in the present development of science, be spent upon apparatus as well as upon men. But no amount of apparatus can accomplish great things if you haven't big men; while big men may accomplish great things though they have at their disposal no extraordinary supply of money or apparatus.

dred figuring as a regiment and commanded by a brigadier-general. In short, the army is being allowed to slip back to pre-war conditions at a rate which is in itself most demoralizing.

Now all this is simply bad business. It is saving a dollar now to spend a hundred later. Under whatever world conditions, we shall have to have an army. Membership in the League of Nations will involve contingent military obligations of a serious sort, to which our prospective force is quite inadequate. Simply as a matter of sound political tactics, the friends of the Covenant should seek to bring this nation into the League with a normal military establishment. It will hardly please even the more enthusiastic champions of the League to be asked to increase the army greatly as a result of League membership. But precisely that is likely to happen as a consequence of the failure of the Administration to defend the business interests of the nation that are involved in the regular army.

Senator Chamberlain, formerly one of the most enlightened friends of the army, now deals with best of intentions a sore blow to our morale. Et tu Brute! He has introduced a bill granting complete amnesty to all soldiers convicted of purely military offences. One and all, they are to have the reward of the faithful soldier, honorable discharge. Deserters are to have their forfeited citizenship restored. This bill follows close upon action of a special clemency commission which has cut all sentences by three-quarters and has already strained the quality of mercy to the limit. The proposed general amnesty would reduce the value of an honorable discharge. It would annul the immemorial regulations which rightly allot to a military offender who has not by subsequent exemplary conduct cleared his record only an ordinary discharge. Finally, this general jail delivery would discredit unfairly our military courts for a long future. Whoever has misled Senator Chamberlain has done a disservice to the army. The bill should be allowed to die in committee.

There impends a great task of reorganizing the military system of the United States. It wants considerate and prolonged debate. It can not be undertaken until our relation to the League of Nations is fixed. What is being done now, through the ignorant parsimony of Congress and the slackness of the Administration, will make the ultimate reorganization immensely more difficult and costly than it need be. Sometimes we wish for a few competent managers at Washington who should be chiefly concerned with doing the business defined in their oath of office. When Mr. Baker lets army reduction take care of itself he is merely reducing the security of the nation and prospectively increasing its expenses.

Sticking Labels on Frenchmen

"CLEMENCEAU is a Reactionary—he doesn't know what it is to be a Radical," said one American Peace Conference correspondent.

"Pichon is an Imperialist," added another. "The Birmingham Post in England says the French Foreign Office is the last survivor of the Old Régime."

"French Government and French people are out for our money," cried a third.

"The French husband is the worst in the world, as everybody knows," concluded the lady correspondent who had just been protesting that she was not a German sympathizer.

That settled the hash of France for one day. There is nothing like having fixed ideas—and labels with which to make the ideas stick.

In the world's great bitterness nothing has done more to poison public opinion in England and America than this plastering of labels on the French people's backs. In the difficult working out of peace it still goes on. It serves the purpose of those who are unwilling that any restoration of devastated France and Belgium should touch the prosperity of the German people who have wrought the ruin. It is wound up in the efforts of those who, to save Germany, would go further and see half our civilization changed in the revolutionary twinkling of an eye.

Lord Curzon may not be up to any vital evolution of the human society into which he was born, but he reduced the only present question to its lowest common-sense denominator when speaking to the House of Lords, July 5, on the Peace Treaty of Versailles:

"As to the proposal to give a guarantee to France against aggression, France has been devastated twice in the last fifty years. By geographical position she holds the frontiers of civilization, and all the nations of the world owe their present liberty and security to her. It is right that those who profit by these sacrifices should guarantee France against the necessity of repeating them."

A good example of uncertainty in the application of labels was given a few days later by General Smuts in a speech to an English political audience. He was explaining the limits of his approval of the Peace Treaty, to which he was a party. "Clemenceau called us British delegates—fourteen savages." It is doubtful if the General understood, and it is certain his hearers would not understand, that this lumping together of delegates from the Mother Country and her Dominions—Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, South Africa—contained no allusion to red Indians. Savages—which M. Clemenceau meant to say—is French political slang for men who, in Parliament or in their party, take each his solitary way and act without solidarity like wild men of the woods.

A really mischievous application of labels to the French people—and to some others—is the current use of the word "proletariat" and even of the word "people."

Counting roughly, one-half of the population of France is still made up of peasants or workers of the land; one-fourth is bourgeois, or property-holders of towns; and the remaining fourth comprises workmen living by day's wages. The nobility has done brilliantly during the war, but it is inconsiderable in numbers—one to a hundred of the population at most—and, being without legal standing or other separation from the common run of mortals than a certain society recognition, it has to be counted with the bourgeois. High-salaried men with prospects are bourgeois, low-salaried men without hope gravitate the other way. Intellectuels, less numerous than nobles, are like the British Peace Delegates—"savages."

Peasants, or the agricultural class, gave three-fourths of the French soldiers actually fighting in the war. Bourgeois, nobles, clergy, gave what they had. Workmen oftener than other classes were kept back in munitions factories, but otherwise they fought with the rest.

All slept in the swaths when the night was falling.

All these in war were the French people, birds of a feather flocking together to defend their common existence as a nation. From the labels attached by a certain foreign press, it might be thought that only workmen for day's wages are proletariat or people.

So far as the primitive sense of the name proletariat is concerned, such workmen in France have few more children than the bourgeois. However it may be in other countries, in French cities there is always an inordinately large proportion of unmarried workmen and this is not favorable to offspring. Now as in the past France has to look to her peasants for the coming generations and even for a constant supply of industrial workmen. One of the worst confusions resulting from this misuse of labels is forgetfulness or plain ignorance of the essential fact in all French history—Revolutionary or not—that France is preponderantly an agricultural country. If she had been, like England, without her own grain and her own cattle, she could never have held out for one year of war.

The confusion of labels becomes positive abuse when they are misused in political slang. French Socialists are the French People, so are the Syndicalists and the Anarchists—but the peasants whom even Jaurès could never make to run with either are not People.

In the French Republic the maximum electoral strength of workmen in this restricted proletariat sense is 4,000,000 votes. Like other Frenchmen, many can not or do not vote and surprisingly many vote like the bourgeois for whom they work and to whose ranks they are aspiring as never before. The entire vote for Socialist candidates to Parliament does not exceed 1,200,000, while the entire General Confederation of Labor which tries to unite all Syndicalists or Labor Unionists that go in for the Socialist conflict of classes or revolutionary methods has never reached 400,000 members. The "Free" or unattached Syndicalists, who are often held together by religion and are very uncertain politically, are nearly as numerous. Yet Socialists and Syndicalists only are counted as the French People when foreigners pronounce their oracles on popular government in France.

The present particular instance is most flagrant. In relation to the Peace Treaty the French People has come to mean to many in England and America that fraction of the Socialist party which has for its member of Parliament in a Seine constituency Jean Longuet, grandson of Karl Marx. In like manner, the Intellectuels of France have been supposed to be represented by a manifesto of which the only signature known to publishers, book-sellers, or readers was that of Henry Barbusse—doubtless magni nominis umbra, but a shadow only. And to such as these, fractions of a fraction, Germans entrust their hopes of a near revision of peace.

Once there was the People—Terror gave it birth—

Once there was the People and it made a hell of earth.

Perhaps Kipling would find it hard under present circumstances to situate such verses, and Tennyson, who was also a poet, might not find in Paris nowadays "the red fool-fury of the Seine." Perhaps the present confused count of Bolsheviks rests on labels similarly reckless of figures and facts.

Another flagrant instance is the use of the word "Republic." Out of some six hundred members of the French Parliament who are elected by universal suffrage, six may have declared themselves in favor of some kind of monarchy when it shall become possible, and a dozen may assume the name of "Liberal Republican" to show that, while they are of the ancient religion, they have accepted the modern political régime. Yet periodically for those to whom the People is a fragment of the population—the Republic is in danger.

In a memorable session of the Chamber of Deputies, July 7, 1919, Aristide Briand spoke his mind on this point, brought out acutely by the change in the electoral system which was being voted. He is also a "savage"—an independent Socialist who has never entered the party unified by Jaurès, but has been kept in Parliament by the workmen—real people they—of the factory centre of Saint-

Etienne. "I do not believe the Republic can be put in danger. Issuing from this war in which she has been so fully identified with France, the Republic has a strength against which all attacks would be broken."

STODDARD DEWEY

Paris, July 10

China's Reaction to the Shantung Settlement

THE decision made by the Peace Conference at Paris to transfer Kiaochow and all German rights in the province of Shantung to Japan served as a signal for an intensely nationalistic movement throughout China. This movement has manifested itself largely in opposition to certain Chinese officials at Peking who were said to have been pro-Japanese and responsible for Japan's enormous ascendancy in China in recent years, in anti-Japanese activities, and above all in a general awakening to the urgency of national self-defense. The Chinese people have simply plunged into another vortex of frenzied and violent emotionalism, as they have often done since their contact with aggressive foreign Powers. The present outburst seems, however, more frenzied and violent than any they have indulged in before, not excepting the display of emotional intensity in the days of the famous Twenty-one Demands.

Self-chastisement is a pronounced Chinese characteristic. When anything goes wrong with them, the Chinese first of all bring themselves to account and, in the case of national affairs, undertake a search for the foes within, much as the late Col. Roosevelt conducted his warfare upon the hyphenates. Accordingly, on May 4 several hundred students of the metropolitan colleges and schools, under the leadership of the students of the Government University, rushed to the house of the Minister of Communications, Tsao Yu-ling, and there beat him and his two friends, the one the then Chinese Minister and the other an ex-Chinese Minister to Tokio, who were dining at the house. The house was partly burned by the students. Thirty-one of the defiant youths fell into the hands of the police. Immediately the whole country rose with one voice to defend the action of the students, and demanded punishment, and even execution, for the three officials above mentioned. After much popular clamor and after the resignation of the Minister and the Vice-Minister of Education and of the Chancellor of the Government University as an acknowledgment of their failure to restrain the students, but in reality as a protest against the arrest, the thirty-one youthful heroes were finally released and acclaimed as patriots. But the Government did not discharge the three officials until almost all branches of business throughout the country had been suspended for three days as a national protest.

Meanwhile the agitation for boycotting Japanese goods spread like wildfire. Mass meetings of all classes of citizens were held, Japanese goods were burned, and violent anti-Japanese speeches were made. Several students in the leading cities, while engaged in anti-Japanese demonstrations, are reported to have died of wounds received from the police.

May 7, the anniversary of the day four years before on which China received from Japan the Twenty-one Demands, was observed everywhere this year as a day of national mourning, with heightened sorrow and hatred. Even more sensitive to the Japanese aggressions than the people at home were the Chinese students residing in Japan, who numbered several thousand. Hundreds of them have returned to China, with the special purpose of leading the nation-wide movement against the Island Empire.

But you can not resist the enemy with mere feeling, or as the Chinese would say, with empty fist. The boycott movement is but passive resistance and not a solution for the problem of the Japanese menace. Nothing short of the creation of a strong national army, to replace the existing personal armies of the selfish and truculent military governors, will make the voice of the Chinese people heard in international dealings, or enable them to redress their grievances. At present, universal military training is urged as the only means to safeguard the territorial and other rights of the nation. And, with the fear of impending domination of Shantung by Japan, the more thoughtful Chinese have realized, perhaps for the first time, that what is even more important than territories and political and economic rights is the great ancient culture of their country. Shantung, being the birthplace of Confucius and the Jerusalem of China, should not be debased by alien rule, especially by the rule of a country which has apparently outraged Confucianism, the creed of peace and righteousness. The thought of Shantung necessarily leads to the consideration of the whole country not merely as a vast land of natural resources and material wealth upon which the teeming millions depend for subsistence, but as a cherished historic home, rich in memories and achievements of the great sages and poets and artists. The superior man in China may be pardoned for being somewhat apathetic concerning the railroad and mining concessions which his Government is obliged to grant to foreigners, but he should be ready to die for the defense of the ideals and institutions which he has inherited from the great men of his race. The hope of China then lies in the rise of a vigorous but intelligent and balanced idea of nationality in which the masses and the educated can come together for the preservation of their spiritual as well as their material heritage.

The Chinese failure to steer a proper course during the past few years has been due to lack of sound political leadership. With the European Powers fighting among themselves, the Chinese were temporarily relieved from outside pressure and were in a position to put their house in order and make themselves a self-reliant and strong nation to remove the danger of further humiliation after the war. Instead of so doing, their politicians and militarists have all along revelled in the luxuries of unmolested holiday rowdyism, with the Japanese as an "impartial" spectator surreptitiously cheering and encouraging now one side and now the other. And the people at large were captivated by the romantic picture that a certain type of statesman in the West gave of the world which was to evolve out of the then prevailing chaos and barbarism. President Wilson's war addresses, translated into Chinese by a Ph.D. of Columbia University, ran through many editions. On the signing of the armistice last November, lantern processions were held everywhere by the students to celebrate what they termed the "triumph of humanitarianism." From that time on, they thought, justice and right would reign everywhere, and China would be accorded all the justice due her without the need of constant military preparation. Consequently, when the Shantung settlement was announced, the blow to the Chinese was a severe one. In unison with the disconcerted votaries of the "New Order" in the West, the Chinese now look upon President Wilson as a "lost leader."

But perhaps their disappointment in America is greater than the disillusion which followed the Allied professions. It is well to remember that China joined the war on the Allied side at the invitation of America, the nation always considered as her most trusted friend. With the help of America at the peace table, China felt pretty sure of the chance to repudiate the pretensions of Japan. No doubt President Wilson and the other American delegates did their best to stand by China, but the circumstances and necessity which accounted for their final yielding can not be fully appreciated by the Chinese. Mortals as they are, the Chinese naturally feel some sort of embarrassment and discomfiture towards a friend who seems to have left them in the lurch. A prominent American weekly in Shanghai has recently gone so far as to remark that the Shantung decision has greatly lowered the prestige of Chinese students returned from America, who were the loudest and the most enthusiastic vouchers for America's friendship.

It is unnecessary here to review the story of Kiaochow. There may be oral assurances by Japan that she will restore the Shantung Peninsula to China, with the retention of only certain economic rights in Shantung formerly enjoyed by Germany. But China knows too well from past experience the value of merely oral assurances made by Japanese diplomats. She can not rest assured, unless it is clearly and definitely written down in the peace treaty, that Japan will return Kiaochow and the Shantung rights either immediately or within a short specified time. Failing in this, China will have nothing definite to base her claims upon in the League of Nations, even if we grant that this much vaunted international machinery will be able to overrule the imperialistic ambitions of expansive modern nations.

For the plain truth is that modern Japan, like most other modern nations, is out for unlimited expansion. Nothing is so evident as her failure to learn anything from the war. Her so-called "idealistic" statesmen have sought to regenerate mankind by a piece of political machinery and to establish universal brotherhood by some means of coöperative pursuit of material interests. Meanwhile the realists in statecraft outwit the "idealists" and make tools of them. Japan has never cared for any such political scheme as the "idealists" have proposed. For she has become a true disciple of the West in that she is thoroughly saturated with the expansive ideas which the teachings of modern history and economics and science have given her. Over-population is the bogey and racial superiority the battle-cry of her statesmen. China, together with certain other "backward nations," is rapidly becoming "Japan's burden." Japan, too, it seems, has a "mission" to fulfill. The importation of morphia in large quantities through the Japanese post offices in China, the secret encouragement of the local bandits in Shantung, the bribing and cajoling of certain Chinese officials at Peking into granting large economic privileges, and the furnishing of large loans to both the Northern and Southern Governments to prolong the civil strife and obstruct political unity and reform in China—these are some of the features of Japan's programme in her attempt to impose her "superior culture" and fulfill her "mission" in the Asiatic mainland.

KUANG-TI MAY

The American Commission in Syria

The American Commission whose business is to investigate the Syrian situation and report to the Peace Conference at Paris is now sojourning in Syria and conducting what seems to be a plebiscite based on the principle of self-determination. It will have no trouble in finding out what the people really want; but, having found out, will it prevail upon the Allies to act upon its report?

Much has been written about the historic claims, the vested interests, the treaty rights of this or that European Power in Syria; but little or no consideration has been given to the claims, the interests, and the rights of the people themselves. True, they are various and conflicting. But hitherto no attempt has been made to discover a possibility at least of reconciliation, even though Syria has always been the object of the solicitude, the protection—or the subtle exploitation—of one or more of the European Powers. It is even more so to-day.

For though it be religiously a maze of cross-currents, politically, inchoate and nebulous, it is economically a land of promise. As it was in the past, before the Suez Canal was built, Syria is to become again the gate to the East. In recent years, subject alike to Turkefying and modernizing influences, it was the backyard, so to speak, of Oriental civilization and the vestibule of the civilization of Europe. And it is destined to be the melting pot of both. But can it become a self-governing state? Can the people, Mohammedans and Christians and Jews and Druses, coöperate in a common cause, strive to achieve nationality? Or are they to be kept apart from each other under separate autonomies and to remain divided politically as well as religiously?

The findings of the American Commission will have a bearing upon these questions. But will they have any influence on the action of the two Governments that are most interested in Syria to-day? The Turk, who was the principal agent of division, is gone. But are the Allies, who have freed the country of his criminal rule, going to divide it into principalities and states independent of each other—into different protectorates rather, or various spheres of influence and control? Instead of one government, the country to-day has three. They are military and provisional, of course. But the fact that the English are now occupying Palestine; the Arabs, Damascus; the French, Beirut and the coast, foreshadows an international project for the creation of a number of small weak states on what is called "the sphere of influence" plan, which will offer them protection and encourage their growth and development.

How do the people of the land feel about this? To answer this question, it is necessary to know who the people are. Approximately, two-thirds of the population are Mohammedans; about five per cent. of the other third are Jews; the rest are Christians of various sects and prejudices—and complaints. Racially, they are one people, speaking one language—Arabic. Politically, they are a dozen peoples, speaking a dozen languages. The minorities, whether Christians, Druses, or Jews, are the crux of the problem. But under the rule of the Turk, the minorities did not suffer, as is generally believed, from religious persecution. The Turk is tolerant by nature as by policy. But they did suffer from a religious idea translated into political supremacy; and so, in self-defense, they wrought political weapons of their respective creeds. Every sect rallied under the banner of its patron saint and placed itself under the protection of one of the European Powers. The Maronites looked to France; the Orthodox, to Russia; the Protestants and the Druses, to England; begging, crying at times aloud for deliverance, not from Mohammedan oppression, but from a Turkish administration that acquired its power and worked its will through a Mohammedan majority. Thus, while religious toleration was the rule and practice, religious sentiment and sectarianism, zealous and blind in the Christians and the Mohammedans alike, were at the bottom of every grievance, every political issue or combination, every concession or compromise. And the European Powers, although aware of these conditions, made no attempt to change them.

But there is a dominant national note to-day in most of the political parties and factions, no matter how colored they may be by religious sentiment or prejudice. For though the people are still divided on many questions of minor importance, they are, with one exception, all agreed upon four fundamental political principles: First, that Syria, Palestine, and Mt. Lebanon, included, shall remain one and undivided; secondly, that there should be but one central government; thirdly, that Arabic shall remain the principal language of the land; and fourthly, that the Jews shall not be permitted to establish a Zionist state in Palestine. The exception referred to is Mt. Lebanon. But even the Maronites, who are the majority Christians of Mt. Lebanon, are divided into three parties, one desiring independence from the rest of Syria under French protection, another desiring absolute independence without any mandatory at all, the third favoring a union with the other Syrian principalities which stand for the four cardinal principles of the national programme. The American Commission will find this out in a single day and would find nothing else if it remained in Syria for a year.

Now, having determined upon these political principles as a foundation, the Syrians are entitled to the right—they ought to be given the opportunity—of choosing and establishing a government of their own. But for the peace of the world and their own future welfare, it should be a government free from the exclusive domination of any one people or creed—absolutely free, in other words, from any domination based upon a religious claim, a religious sentiment, or a religious concession. There is small doubt that such a government, if placed under the protection of one Power only, to be designated by the League of Nations, would gradually achieve self-dependence and strength, and would prove itself capable of administering justice and maintaining peace and security in the land. I said one Power only, because a trusteeship of nations or more than one mandatory in the country, would prove fatal to the four cardinal principles mentioned. Indeed, two or more mandatories in Syria would have a tendency to engender the international jealousies and rivalries of the old "sphere of influence" plan, and would hinder, even defeat the new movement of what may be called de-religionized nationalism.

The autonomous government of Mt. Lebanon, guaranteed and protected by six Powers before the war, is a case in point. Nominally, it had but one governor, a Christian; virtually, it had six. For the Consular representatives of these Powers, who were to act as advisors, often became dictators. And in their striving for political prestige and influence at the capital, they encouraged and supported local factions, political and religious, and thus perpetuated and accentuated the sectarian divisions that kept the people denationalized and retarded the country's progress. Egypt, under the protection of six Powers, would have been, in this sense, another Mt. Lebanon.

Lord Cromer, who is a competent judge in such matters, speaks of international control, or administrative internationalism, as tending "towards the creation of administrative impotence." In other words, it results in less control, more friction, and no protection at all. For if those who are to guide a nation coming into being disagree among themselves or side with this political faction or that religious sect, what chance is there for any real guidance and protection? During the elections in Mt. Lebanon the Consular representatives of the so-called protecting Powers were so many political bosses, each one supporting the candidate of his choice.

There is no doubt that the American Commission will dwell in its report on these matters, emphasizing the essential principles on which almost all the Syrians are agreed. And it is to be hoped that the Allies, true to the lofty principles of racial integrity and national freedom for which the war was fought and won, will consider the report of the Commission favorably and will not experiment again in Syria with any project based on the religious differences of the people in order to justify the designation of two or more mandatories in the land.

AMEEN RIHANI

Correspondence

Ireland—Expostulation and Reply

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

It occurs to me that some of your readers who may be interested in the recent article of Professor Turner on the Irish question would like to have him explain two of his statements.

As I recall it he says that the Irish live under the same laws as the English. What does he mean by this? Does he mean the same thing as we do when we say that the Georgia negro lives under the same laws as the whites? Lord Morley tells us that his first experience in the Irish office was the examination of a case in which a priest was convicted of a crime and the jury that tried him was composed exclusively of Protestants although the country in which he was tried was 97 per cent. Catholic. In fact, every county in Ireland has almost exclusively a tory administration of justice, regardless of the population. Is this the kind of laws under which the English live? I have no library to which to refer and do not know whether I am correct in stating the above or not, but I do know that for the past fifty years every reform that has been granted to Ireland has followed a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and the arbitrary imprisonment of the leaders that advocated that very reform. Such has been the case in land reform, the attempts to enact Home Rule and other acts about which we hear so much when English rule is praised.

The other statement which I should like to have explained is the one that the act of Union was approved by the Irish and the present Government is of their own choosing. Who were permitted to vote at the election and how was the election carried on? Were Catholics allowed to vote? It seems to me that the great body of the Irish race was disqualified from voting. My earliest recollection of Irish affairs is a description of an Irish election held shortly after the act of Union in which Richard Lalor Shiels describes the voting. All voting was viva voce and the landlord stood beside the tenant and shook him until he voted as told. The hero of an election was the dare-devil who voted against the landlord and he was generally severely punished.

With the landlord desiring English protection for his rights and controlling all votes, and with the great bulk of the population disfranchised, it seems to me that the less said about that election the better.

Just one word in defense of the interest taken by the Americans of Irish descent in the Irish question. Ireland lost by starvation in two years five times as large a percentage of her inhabitants as England lost in the four years of the World War. She lost by emigration every year for the next 60 years after the famine two-thirds as large a percentage as England lost in the four years of war. This was all under the English rule. Generally speaking, the emigrant left on account of that rule. Do you expect him to forget everything and leave no tradition to his children? You urge friendliness for England on account of certain traditions and inheritances; we take no exception to this, but it seems to me that the Irish have a right to retain an interest in and a desire to better the land of their fathers. I might add that the United States to-day has a typical Ulsterman for President, with all his intolerance and bull-headedness; does the Review like it?

READER

Kennewick, Washington, July 12

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

With respect to the first of the questions of your correspondent, I meant my assertion as I made it: "Irishmen have as members of the United Kingdom exactly the same political status as other citizens in the British Isles." That is to say, the laws of the United Kingdom are made by a parliament composed of representatives of the people of the United Kingdom, elected by the people; and in this parliament sit representatives of the Irish as well as representatives of the other inhabitants. It may be added that the Irish now have twice as many representatives as their population warrants.

The statement contained in the second question is not one which I have made. Your correspondent will find on referring again to my paper the following: "the act which accomplished this [the Act of Union] in 1800 was unpopular and was brought to pass through bribery and intimidation." I did not in my brief statement add, what Lecky has explained so well, that no measure of reform or change could have been carried through the old unreformed Irish parliament without bribery and corruption, since, like the British parliament before 1832, it represented a small number of people and was unwilling to sanction any measure which might abridge its special privileges and vested interest.

It is not necessary for me to do more than note briefly that the negroes of the South are to a great extent debarred from taking part in the government of the communities where they live and are at the same time subject to numerous discriminations made by the white people, while Irishmen participate in the government and are not normally subject to any discriminations; that the numerous suspensions of habeas corpus in the past fifty years, regrettable as they are, have yet seemed necessary if the authorities were to cope with the violence and disorder used by Irishmen trying to effect changes which they wished—the disorder might seem to those who participated in it entirely justified, but it was at the same time proper from the point of view of the authorities that order should be maintained; that there was no election on the issue of the Union, and that Catholics were not allowed to vote in elections then—but no more were most of the people in England or the United States at that time; that in the early part of the nineteenth century voting was almost everywhere restricted to a few, and many of those who were allowed to vote were very largely controlled by landlords or employers; that the evils of earlier English administration which caused emigration, so far as they did cause it, have for some time been done away with; that it is most proper for Irishmen or their descendants in this country to wish well to Ireland and try "to better the land of their fathers," but that they will assist more successfully if they first obtain adequate information about present Irish conditions, and then act fairly and justly; that to call President Wilson "a typical Ulsterman" will seem to many people the highest possible compliment to north-east Ireland.

EDWARD RAYMOND TURNER

Ann Arbor, Mich., July 22

Professor Corwin on the Covenant

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the welter of declamation against the Covenant of the League of Nations, it is refreshing to encounter the restrained and dignified argument of Professor Corwin against it in the Review of June 7. No advocate of the Covenant can maintain that there are not substantial objections to it. Every advance, every adoption of a new policy or abandonment of the old, is a step into the unknown and must be taken with some risk and in the face of unanswered doubts. The conservative who puts the argument against a change clearly and strongly does a useful service, especially so if he avoids common exaggerations which awaken only intellectual contempt.

In any discussion of the Covenant, there are two general considerations which should be regarded as fundamental. In the first place some of the arguments advanced are not so much against the Covenant in particular as against any covenant which could be formed, if it created a league with really efficient powers. This fact is not an objection nor an answer to the arguments. To attack any league is a legitimate attack upon this one. But it is desirable for the defender of the Covenant to be able to say whether a point which troubles his mind is an objection to this Covenant merely, and therefore perhaps suggests a change which ought to be made or a misunderstanding which ought to be corrected, or is an objection to every workable covenant and therefore probably to be disregarded. Examples of such general attack are to be found in most of the objections which have been made to Article X.

In the second place a good deal of the argument proceeds on the supposition that the United States can and ought to have everything that it wants exactly as it wants it. The necessity of compromise in a complicated situation is ignored, and the present is a complicated situation full of conflicting interests which on both sides are valid interests. It is probable that Professor Corwin has taught his students the necessity of the compromises of the Constitution, but the present situation is closely parallel to that of 1788 and it is hard to see what compromise of the Covenant is likely to awaken after two generations such serious objections on moral or other grounds as did the slavery compromises of the Constitution. To deny the necessity of compromise, to insist that the United States should have its own way on every point, no matter what other nations may be forced to yield, is to render the formation of any covenant impossible.

A specific instance of this kind of argument is the assertion that the special promise to France by England and the United States to defend her frontiers against future German attack is evidence that the makers of the League distrust their own work and feel the need of adopting supplemental measures. As this point has been sometimes stated, it has been difficult not to believe that it was deliberate misrepresentation. This accusation can not be brought against the statement as made by Professor Corwin, but it seems clear that the inference to be drawn from the special agreement is quite the opposite from his. To refuse France's demand that the special protection she desired should be provided in the Covenant, where it would be distinctly out of place, and then to induce her to consent to its omission and to quiet her natural but unnecessary nervousness over her exposed eastern frontier by the supplementary agreement, is to show confidence in the League not distrust and is a legitimate compromise, made with special wisdom outside and not in the Covenant.

A more important impeachment of the Treaty, based on a demand for the ideal without regard to actual conditions, has reference to the Shantung agreement. I doubt if anyone in England or America would undertake to answer all the objections which can be made to that agreement. It is certainly not ideal. There is no doubt, however, that Great Britain and the United States stand somewhat in advance of the rest of the world in the demand that ideal justice and right be carried out in actual international arrangements. What are the statesmen of these two countries to do when the task is laid upon them of making a working partnership with other nations who will have as much to do in carrying on the business as their own two countries and without whom it can not be carried on at all? If the ideal is insisted upon in every particular, especially where the peculiar interests of other nations are urgently pressed, what will be the result? Under such conditions, if a league is to be made, only one outcome is possible—compromise, and the duty of the true statesman is not to demand inflexibly the ideal but to see to it that that compromise is made which is the best that can be had from the ideal point of view. Special antagonism to the Shantung agreement is excited by referring to it as an example of an alleged yielding to the discredited principle of the balance of power. This assertion is an inference merely, not supported directly by any facts which we know at present, and it need not be accepted by anyone who does not wish to do so, so long as an equally good inference as to the reason for the agreement is forthcoming. In the first place, if I were arguing with some of the Senators, I should say that it is logically indefensible to use a term of technical significance out of its ordinary meaning in order to cast odium on an arrangement not approved. If it is necessary to maintain the possibility of a defensive union against an unrepentant Germany—the hard necessity, as Professor Corwin calls it—there is then no historical justification for applying to an agreement for that purpose the technical name of a peculiar international doctrine and practice invented by European diplomacy after the fifteenth century. If there is, then every defensive alliance since the days of the cave man is an application of the doctrine of balance of power. That an alliance endeavors to balance or to out-balance a prospective enemy does not make it an instance of the balance of power, historically so called, for historically the term has a quite other and special significance. In the second place it must be remembered in considering Shantung that France, Italy, and other nations have insisted on securing national interests and obtaining compensation in a somewhat similar way though with more historical justification. It would be very strange if Japan, which has shown no evidence of being even so far advanced as these peoples in regard for ideal considerations, did not in turn urge similar interests and the need of like compensation. If granted to others, it would be practically impossible to deny the claim of Japan. It would not be a Japanese alliance with Germany or Russia that would be otherwise to fear, but the tumbling of the whole structure of the peace treaty. But where outside of Shantung could a similar concession to Japan be found? The answer to this question is what the statesman must find, and the attempt to do it by a critic of the treaty would be an enlightening experiment. The arrangement demands nothing of China which she has not already granted, and the definite promise of restoration gives her a new advantage. This argument must not be understood to be a defense of the Shantung agreement on any ground but that of necessity, but it is an emphatic declaration that in judging of it the necessities of the situation must take precedence over ideal considerations.

In comment on Article X and on the Monroe Doctrine, Professor Corwin is much more discriminating than many critics of the Covenant. There appear, however, the same two sets of objections, one based on misunderstandings or exaggerations and the other revealing a fundamental difference of attitude and faith which must either prevail against the League or give way to it. The second can easily be disposed of. Professor Corwin says: "It is clear, I think, that this Article is quite out of place in the League Covenant." The answer to this is simple and draws the fundamental issue squarely. It is that the Article is indispensable to the Covenant, that it is its very backbone, and that without it no league can be formed of any value for the preservation of peace. If there were any hope of removing this fundamental contradiction of view, it would lie in doing away with the misapprehensions which have gathered about Article X. Plainly it protects the members of the League against one specific thing and one only, "external aggression." There is perhaps some carelessness of formulation here, but the words should be ambiguous only to a criticism which is determined to criticise and not to understand. The execution of a judicial mandate or a mandate of the Council is not aggression. Only the unwarranted attack of an outside power is included. The Article does not protect against internal revolution, nor against the separatist action of a part, nor against partition with the approval or by the influence of the League, or by purchase and sale or by any kind of negotiation. The relation of the Article to the Monroe Doctrine, though that has been generally overlooked by opponents, should help to make it clear. The United States is asked to assume by this Article no obligation which it has not already officially assumed towards the States of the American continents with reference to non-American Powers. It is now asked to extend that obligation, and no other, to all the members of the League and to join with them in carrying it out everywhere, an immense enlargement of the influence of the United States and, if we can trust the honesty of our own purpose, an immense moral advance for the world. It is quite evident from the character of much of the discussion regarding the effect of the League upon the Monroe Doctrine that the objectors have in mind popular extensions of that doctrine—a virtual dictatorship of the United States over all American states for one example—which have never been officially affirmed and which have never been, nor ever would be, accepted by any strong American state. Unless the United States proposes to do by excuse of that doctrine something which the moral opinion of the world will not approve, we should rejoice that the rest of the world has come to our position in regard to aggressive action by one state against another and is ready to join with us in forbidding it. To object is as absurd as would be the position of a man who, being asked to look after a neighbor's house during the absence of the family, should refuse the assistance of the police as an interference with his rights.

In conclusion there are several other points in Professor Corwin's argument which should be briefly considered. That Article XXIII calls upon the United States to transfer to the League powers of government which can only be transferred by the Constitution making sovereign is an important suggestion and should be carefully considered, but it depends manifestly upon an interpretation of the Article in question which involves several nice distinctions which can not be here discussed, even if one accepted in the case the necessity of an amendment to the Constitution. That the League exists "primarily to safeguard the interests of the Powers controlling it," that it has "for its primary purpose the maintenance of a solidarity of interests among its principal members" seems to me an assumption without justification. It is based upon a belief which is surely mistaken, that the League represents no moral advance in international relations over the period of the balance of power. The apparent excuse for it is the preponderance of power in the Council given to the Big Five, but would it be possible to work a League as a going concern in any other way? And Professor Corwin has just before noticed in relation to the establishment of "an international tribunal comparable to the Supreme Court of the United States," which he desires, that "the thing which more than anything else has stood in the way of its establishment has been the insistence of small states upon equal representation in its membership." Is it true to say that "the authors of the League have confused two very different problems . . . that of furnishing the peace settlement . . . and secondly the problem of providing a permanent procedure for the peaceable settlement of international controversies." That the Conference has attempted to settle these two problems together and in the same document is no doubt true, but that is an entirely proper thing to do and does not involve confusion, and the effort to show that confusion has followed is not successful. The Council of the League is not "a continuation under a new name of the Peace Conference." Its powers are quite different and much more independent. It is rather a continuation under a new name of the War Council of the Allies, and one of the surest foundations of hope for the future success of the League is the great simplicity of the machinery which the Covenant establishes for its management against all sorts of temptations to complication. Conciliar management of an alliance of nations has abundantly proved its success, and the omission of elaborate legislative, judicial, and executive regulations is clear evidence of careful reflection. "Regional understanding" was not a fortunate designation of the Monroe Doctrine since it may undoubtedly mean an understanding between two parties, but it may also without question mean a one-sided understanding which prevails throughout a region, like the understanding about negro suffrage which prevails in the South and like, I imagine, the understanding concerning the enforcement of prohibition which will prevail in many regions, some of them not large, when that law comes into force.

"Despite some appearances to the contrary, the Senate to-day occupies a position of great strategic advantage." May the party of moral ideas which controls the Senate see the moral issues which are involved in the present decision!

GEORGE BURTON ADAMS

New Haven, Conn., June 28

Article XII; Not Article X or Article XXI

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

A treaty thus unequal in its conditions, thus derogatory to our national rights, thus insidious in some of its objects, and thus alarming in its operation to the dearest interests of the United States in their commerce and navigation, is in its present form unworthy the voluntary acceptance of an independent people, and is not dictated to them by the circumstances in which providence has kindly placed them. It is sincerely believed, that such a treaty would not have been listened to at any former period, when Great Britain was most at her ease, and the United States without the respectability they now enjoy. To pretend that however injurious the treaty may be it ought to be submitted to in order to avoid the hostile resentment of Great Britain which would evidently be as impolitic as it would be unjust on her part, is an artifice too contemptible to answer its purpose. It will not easily be supposed, that a refusal to part with our rights without an equivalent will be made the pretext of a war on us; much less that such a pretext will be founded on our refusal to mingle a sacrifice of our commerce and navigation with an adjustment of political differences. Nor is any evidence to be found, either in history or human nature, that nations are to be bribed out of a spirit of encroachment and aggression by humiliations which nourish their pride, or by concessions which extend their resources and power.

To do justice to all nations; to seek it from them by peaceable means in preference to war; and to confide in this policy for avoiding that extremity; or securing the blessing of Heaven, when forced upon us, is the only course of which the United States can never have reason to repent.

No, this is not a present-day discussion of Article XXI, or Article X, or the Shantung cession, or any other of the contents of the Versailles Treaty of 1919; it is an excerpt from a letter written by James Madison ("The Writings of James Madison," edited by Gaillard Hunt, Vol. vi, pages 256-257), written August 23, 1795, in reference of the Jay Treaty of 1794. One part of that treaty, Article XII, encountered so much hostility in the United States Senate that, when the treaty was finally ratified by that body on June 24, 1795, an amendment provided that Article XII should be suspended.

E. F. HUMPHREY

Princeton, N. J., July 25

Book Reviews

Economics and British Common Sense

NEW FALLACIES OF MIDAS. A Survey of Industrial and Economic Problems. By Cyril E. Robinson, with an introduction by Sir George Paish. New York: Robert M. McBride & Company.

THE writing of a book on political economy which is comprehensive without being exhaustive, scientific yet not academic, interesting but not trivial, is a real achievement; especially in these days when intelligent laymen, lacking the courage to wrestle with one of the standard text-books, are eager for more knowledge of economic questions than they can get from newspapers and magazines. The text-books are good, of course, and necessary to a thorough knowledge of the subject, but for a book like this, which contains so much seasoned thought in so small a compass, the busy layman should be truly thankful.

The first part of the book is a sort of primer of political economy, a preliminary exposition of certain fundamental concepts—work, value, capital, monopoly, rent, expenditure and the like—leading up to an examination and criticism of industrial society from the points of view of socialism, syndicalism, and individualism. None of these ideals, the author finds, can be realized in human society, for all have their fatal defects; but they have also their strong points, which, if taken over by capitalism, would make that system almost ideal and well nigh invulnerable. This is sheer eclecticism, no doubt, but Mr. Robinson calls it compromise, and roundly asserts that by means of it the English have created political democracy, and will sooner or later achieve industrial democracy as well. Certainly, the conservatives of England have shown extraordinary capacity for absorbing the best ideas of their opponents, even as the aristocracy has maintained its vitality by the influx of new blood from the middle class.

However that may be, Mr. Robinson points out, as many others have done, that socialism, notwithstanding its ideals, is theoretically unsound, and that, if fully realized, it would involve a servitude more irksome than the "wage slavery" of the present day. Besides, there is no assurance that state socialism would give the wage earners any permanent benefit; on the contrary, it might cause a serious falling off in production, in which case there would be universal poverty and no diminution of social discontent. Unless we could be content, like the ancient Greeks, to be civilized without being comfortable, socialism would be a failure; and, emancipated but disappointed, we should be longing for the flesh pots of Egypt. And yet, socialism has contributed something to politico-economic theory by showing what the state can do, and any plan for improving industrial society must take this into account.

While socialism has lost its hold on British labor, and the socialist members at Westminster are but a "handful of discredited cranks," syndicalism, less political but more revolutionary, has occupied the vacancy; and now the cry is for decentralization, direct action and unions of productive labor. Let the miners own the mines, the railway servants the railways, the agricultural laborers the farms, and let the state be little more than a statistical bureau, determining needs and adjusting values. Obviously, private property becomes group property under this system, and there is danger of exploitation as before, necessitating interference by the state, thus bringing centralization in by the backdoor. For all that, syndicalism has made an important contribution to political thought by showing what esprit de corps can be aroused in a productive group, and what notable results might be achieved if this enthusiasm could be utilized for increased production.

Similarly, individualism, notwithstanding its glorification of the strong and its cynical neglect of the weak, has its own offering to make for the general good. Liberty is the most precious possession known to man, more highly valued by the freeborn than life itself. From the economic side two phases of liberty are essential to happiness and progress—the right to choose or bargain, and the right to save, both involving, as prerequisites, the right to personal freedom and the ownership of property. The future industrial society, if it is to be truly successful, must provide for these.

Gathering up the threads of his argument, Mr. Robinson gives in rough outline his conception of the future industrial society. Capitalism will hold the field against all comers because no other system can give proper scope to the bargaining and saving instincts of man. This, however, by no means involves the concentration of property in the hands of a few; on the contrary, the ownership of capital can be and must be widely diffused, so that the workers may have a two-fold income and thus a double interest in the success and permanence of the capitalistic system.

The capitalism of the future will include what is of permanent value in socialism, for the state will carry on all those activities which can be done better by collective than by individual effort, although the limits to state activity can not yet be clearly defined. Similarly, capitalism will take what is best in syndicalism by giving more responsibility to groups of workers, allowing them, where possible, a voice in the management, and encouraging them to acquire a financial interest in the business in which they are employed. Although profit-sharing has not yet been very successful, other plans for labor co-partnership are more promising. The time may even come when capital will no longer hire labor, but labor, whether of hand or brain, will hire capital. Then there will be no question of expropriating capital, but of encouraging its accumulation in order that it may be furnished to labor at the lowest rates.

Perhaps Mr. Robinson is a little too optimistic in his forecast because of his faith in the innate reasonableness of the English people. They grumble; they threaten; they rebel; but when confronted with an emergency they see where their true interest lies; they compromise their differences and unite with their former enemies until the trouble is overcome and the field is clear for other issues and new battles. State socialism is an importation from Germany, which the British have never taken seriously. They have played with French syndicalism in the same way and it is not likely that they will allow it to ruin the country. Fabianism is more to their mind, but the possibilities of improvement along that line are quite limited. Cooperation has been a great help to the laborers as consumers, but has not solved the problem of production. There is left the possibility of an alliance between labor and capital, and, as Mr. Robinson intimates, this is the only hope of industrial reconstruction in Great Britain.

Mr. Robinson's optimism seems to lead him astray in at least two directions. In the first place, he has no fear of the coming depletion of Britain's coal deposits, for long before coal is gone, we may be certain that some substitute for coal will be discovered. Engineers and other scientific authorities are not so confident as to that. Again, Mr. Robinson lightly dismisses Malthusianism as mere moonshine, and argues that the world is not within a thousand years of being overcrowded, because Russia has a population of only 23 persons to a square mile while Belgium formerly had 625. Such loose thinking in these respects does not, perhaps, invalidate Mr. Robinson's general argument; neither does it alter the fact that the United Kingdom has 45,000,000 people to support and can not maintain these in comfort unless she can hold and increase her trade with the less populous regions of the earth.

As to Midas, the author presents him at the beginning of the book and again at the end to point the moral, telling what a great mistake he made in wishing that everything he touched might turn to gold and in thinking that a miracle could make him a happy man. Now, as in the day of Midas, wealth is not the same as welfare, and material things alone can not satisfy the soul. The life is more than meat and the body than raiment. If capital and labor both realize this, and if teachers plan their systems of education with the highest ends in view, a brilliant future lies before the British people.

National Readjustments

PROBLEMS OF PEACE. By Guglielmo Ferrero. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

THE GREAT PEACE. By H. H. Powers. New York: The Macmillan Company.

PROFESSOR FERRERO, in a brilliantly written little volume, has sketched interestingly and accurately the main outlines of European history from the downfall of Napoleon I to the conclusion of the Great War. He does more than this. With his breadth of historic vision, his insight, and his power of coordination, he points out the failures of statesmen in the past and the way of wisdom for the future. His main conclusion, on the last page, in favor of the League of Nations deserves to be quoted, both because it is the mature opinion of Italy's foremost historian and because it differs from so much of the imperialistic and anti-American talk which has been finding expression in Italian newspapers: "The Americans, who have already saved Europe from German domination by intervening when Russia abandoned the common cause, can do much to help Europe to save itself from the dangers which await it by using all the authority America so justly enjoys to encourage and impel the old continent to follow this path resolutely. They will by so doing render a great service to Europe, and to America as well. Western civilization is a grandiose Gothic vault, soaring sublime toward the sky. One of its arches is Europe, the other is America. If either arch is broken, the other will be endangered."

There is in Ferrero's volume relatively little special pleading for Italy. Italy, he thinks, however, was originally compelled to become an ally of Germany and Austria in 1882 in order to defend herself, not against France which had seized Tunis, but against Austria which was dangerous because Austria and Prussia had put an end to their long antagonism to each other. Italy really got nothing but the assurance that Austria would not harm her, while Italy on her side had to repress "irredentism." The Triple Alliance of 1882 was, therefore, for Italy nothing but an empty shell. But when the alliance was renewed in 1887 Count Robilant obtained real advantages from the pact with the Germanic Powers by two additional clauses; by one Germany undertook to give armed aid to Italy if France, in Africa or elsewhere, attempted to alter the balance of power in the Mediterranean to Italy's disadvantage; by the other clause Austria pledged herself to respect the status quo in the Balkans as far as possible, and, in the event of being compelled to occupy more Turkish territory, to consult and compensate Italy adequately. Italy's motives in entering and carrying on the Great War may not have been quite what the author would have us believe, but there is truth in his contention (p. 252) that "though the effects of Italian intervention were at first not much felt by the Allies it may be said that the forces of Italy were the salvation of the world at the most terrible crisis of the war, between the collapse of the Russian front and the arrival of American reinforcements in sufficient numbers." For Italy's reward he personally makes only the modest and wholly justifiable claim to the Trentino, Trieste, and Istria. "Part of the nation would like to add Dalmatia and its islands and a protectorate over Albania . . . and her share of Asia Minor. But the Italian people are not in agreement about these claims, because influential groups maintain that the national, historical, and strategical reasons which justify the former demands do not cover Dalmatia, and they are very reluctant to involve Italy too deeply in Eastern affairs" (p. 242).

Professor Ferrero does not discuss in detail any of the complex problems which President Wilson had to face at Versailles, but only sets forth a few guiding principles which a century of history has made manifest, especially the importance of the recognition of the principles of Liberalism and Nationalism. By all lovers of Italy his volume will be welcomed as a little missionary which aims to retain for Italy the high regard of the American people.

Mr. Powers begins where Ferrero leaves off. Writing last autumn when victory was in sight and a peace conference imminent, he attempts to indicate the details of a just and lasting peace. After an elaboration of general principles he considers in turn the various regions of the earth where nationalities wish to be recognized, boundaries drawn, and wrongs set right. Many of the questions which were of supreme interest when the author wrote last October have now been settled (for the time being, at any rate) by the treaty which Germany has ratified. Most of them have been settled in a more radical, thorough-going, and anti-German way than he advocated or anticipated. Mr. Powers easily knocked to pieces the simple, off-hand solutions which were so freely offered early in the war by well-meaning persons who knew little of the complexity of European problems. For he has traveled much in Europe and is able from personal knowledge to set forth warningly and impressively the difficulties and complications of rival claims. But he has failed to catch the enthusiasm and optimism of the newly-liberated nationalities; he often remains without a satisfactory solution of his own, or is pessimistic as to the suggestions of others. Austria-Hungary, he thinks, ought to be kept together, with the possible exception of the Czecho-Slovaks, but even for these "the prospect is not bright." "Polish history offers an inadequate basis for faith in a Polish future," the German menace of economic domination is dangerous, and hence he favors for Poland autonomy and federation with Russia rather than a nominal and unreal independence. To none of the other border peoples of the former Russian Empire would he accord any recognition, except perhaps the Finns. In the liberated parts of Western Asia and Africa he would probably favor the mandatory system, if that had been invented when he wrote. Time only can show whether his more conservative way of handling the problems of nationality would have been the wiser course.

A Novelists' Novelist and His Clients

The Works of Leonard Merrick: Limited Edition.

CYNTHIA. With an Introduction by Maurice Hewlett. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

THE ACTOR-MANAGER. With an Introduction by William Dean Howells. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

CONRAD IN QUEST OF HIS YOUTH. With an Introduction by Sir James M. Barrie. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

WHILE PARIS LAUGHED: Being Pranks and Passions of the Poet Tricotrin. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

"THERE have been many author's editions," says Barrie in his preface to "Conrad in Quest of His Youth," "but never, so far as I know, one quite like this, in which the 'author' is not the writer himself but his contemporaries, who have entirely 'engineered' the edition themselves and have fallen over each other, so to speak, in this desire to join in the honor of writing the prefaces. Such is the unique esteem in which Mr. Merrick is held by his fellow-workers. For long he has been the novelists' novelist."

A title glorious enough but not free from negative implication. We may fancy Leonard Merrick accepting it with smile responsive but slightly rueful, since to be the tidbit of the elect is to be caviare to the general. This joint tribute of his fellow-craftsmen is a sort of amende. "Why, then," says Mr. Howells, after giving his testimony, "is not this masterly novelist a master universally recognized and accepted? That is something I have asked myself more than once, especially in reading the criticisms of his several books, not one of which has lacked the praise of some critic qualified to carry conviction of its merit." Perhaps, he answers tentatively, because these books do not deal with titled persons and a great world; or because, however individual poverty and misery may be conquered in the given story, there remains a sense of the poverty that still remains in the world; or—and here we abandon geniality for criticism—because "the stories are almost always unhappy, very unhappy. There is no consolation in their tragedy; they do not even 'raise a noble terror' such as was once the supposed business of tragedy. Upon the whole, they leave you feeling mean, feeling retroactively capable of the shabby things which have been done in them."

This is a grave indictment, too grave, one must think, to be urged against the spirit of genial irony which rules Mr. Merrick's work as a whole. The novel for which Mr. Howells here in a way stands sponsor is "The Actor-Manager," which he thinks "in every way the best of Mr. Merrick's stories." He adds, it is true, "so far as I know them;" but this qualification does not change the fact that the book for him sums up satisfactorily enough the merits and defects of his author. But what of the other three stories on our list? From them, surely, we turn without any such sense of dingy complicity as Mr. Howells fairly connects with that rather dispiriting study of the theatrical world, "The Actor-Manager." Mr. Howells finds hearty praise, and rightly, for the rare excellence of Merrick's "form." The appraiser says he can not explain what he means by form, but mentions this practitioner's easy concealment of mechanism, and has in mind also, one supposes, that instinctive economy of means and that firm flow of narrative which are so much more commonly mastered to eastward than to westward of the Strait of Dover. There are John Galsworthy with his perfect handling of the major episode, Frank Swinnerton (in "Nocturne," at least), Sherwood Anderson but now in the tense restraint of his "Winesburg, Ohio" sketches. But Mr. Leonard Merrick is more easily and lightly a master of form than any of these. It is inherent in his action, keeps us continuously and expectantly in motion, with never a pause or a hiatus. "There is no one with a greater art of telling a story," says Barrie, accordingly, "if that art consists in making us forever wonder what we are to find on the next page."

But the one thing we may be sure of

(and this may be what has prevented Merrick's "universal acceptance") is that we shall find at the end no pat and comfortable solution of what may be called the running problem of the action. The story will have been told, but we ourselves left, as it were, with one foot in the air. Mr. Hewlett nearly puts his finger on the point when he speaks of Merrick's "underlying, deeply-fused sympathy with real things and fine things, and the seriousness of aim which, tantalizingly, stops short just where you want it to go on, and provokes the reader to get every book of Mr. Merrick's as it appears, just to see him let himself go—which he never does. He is one of the most discreet dissectors of the human heart we have." To dissect the human heart is bad enough (says the universal acceptor); to be discreet about it is hardly tolerable.

Meanwhile it is interesting to see how each of this man's fellow-workmen finds what he wants in him, and distrusts the rest. How natural that Barrie should exult in "Conrad in Quest of His Youth," and should express a good-humored envy of a performance which is, indeed, a good deal in his own line. How natural that Mr. Howells should be attracted to the careful, if not highly enlivening realism of "The Actor-Manager," and should trace an analogy to his favorite Russians. And as for Mr. Hewlett, what more in character than his deprecation of the main theme of his chosen tale, and his exaltation of the romantic character of Cynthia. Apart from their "form," their excellence of structure, these books have in common a mood of unimbittered disillusion. "Cynthia" and "The Actor-Manager" express the almost foredoomed struggle of the honest but not inspired artist between his conscience and a livelihood. "Conrad in Quest of His Youth" expresses the hopelessness of middle age's yearning for past days and their irrecoverable zest. Strange how envious and apologetic the early forties are in the presence of the early twenties—as if the lesser age were the real possessor of the earth, and the greater a mere lingering encumbrance! "While Paris Laughed" gives utterance to the mellow remembrance, indulgent without envy, of maturity for youth and its follies and ecstasies. The poet Tricotrin is very ridiculous: who would not have been in his shoes, at that age? Mr. Merrick has accomplished no more surprising feat than the sublimation, in this book, of those very materials which have been so tediously pawed over and refurbished by commercial chroniclers of the pseudo-Bohemian life.

This limited edition, newly set with the author's final corrections, is notable for its modest excellence of format and its very reasonable price.

H. W. BOYNTON

Three Books About Poetry

A NEW STUDY OF ENGLISH POETRY. By Henry Newbolt. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

CONVENTION AND REVOLT IN POETRY. By John Livingston Lowes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

THE NEW ERA IN AMERICAN POETRY. By Louis Untermeyer. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

MR. HENRY NEWBOLT'S twelve lectures on English poetry constitute an informal "Poetics" for our time. Mr. Newbolt is a liberal with reservations. We doubt if he has melted down his plate; perhaps he has merely sent it to the new firm of silversmiths, Messrs. Bergson and Croce, for reengraving. He restates the old poetical faith in terms conformable to the new philosophy, as fifty years ago theologians were recasting the Pentateuch in forms considerate of Darwin and Spencer. Mr. Newbolt is finally, we suspect, a sacristan in the great Catholic and Apostolic Church of English poetry, but a sacristan proud of the new memorial windows to Bridges, Yeats, and Binyon, and willing to place an altar candle at least for Mr. T. Sturge Moore. He has a quick and various delight in poetry; his attitude toward it is almost chivalrous; his faith brightens his polemic, like a glove worn upon a helm. He is, in short, a mixture of analyst and rhapsodist, a very good analyst sometimes, a very good rhapsodist sometimes, but not free from the liabilities or disabilities implicit in the combination. It is natural enough that his analysis should be happiest in negation. His disapproval of anything modern is the weightier for being cautious and polite; in an excellent lecture he disposes of the futuristic plea of Signor Marinetti with a suave thoroughness in which the thoroughness is braced by the suavity.

Mr. Newbolt defines poetry as "the act of expressing an intuition in words" (page 8), and an intuition is apparently little more than a sensation or impression realized as ours. This identifies poetry with an elementary psychic act, and in its vast comprehensiveness the old notion of rarity and specialty in poetry is lost like a chapel in an amphitheatre. Mr. Newbolt, however, is a worshiper, if man ever was, and he proceeds to restore the rarity and specialty by a definition of great poetry on lines quite remote from the definition of poetry itself. Great poetry is that which "touches the universal longing for a perfect world" (page 17). This definition seems not so much erroneous—as supine. The analyst is reposing; for the moment Mr. Newbolt is not so much rationalizing poetry as poeticizing logic.

Mr. Newbolt is much stronger in his contention that forms must vary and renew themselves, since form is merely the embodiment of spirit, and the sign of the authenticity of spirit is difference or variation. This removes the dykes, but Mr. Newbolt, never so radical as his advertisements, restores the greater part of them by a very sensible remark to the effect that a "form, a metre, a stanza, may be used a hundred times by a hundred writers, and each time with originality" (page 305). In other words, the multiplex in metre is not the condition of multiple effects. For Mr. Newbolt personal expression is supreme. He does not quite class epics and dramas with lyrics, but he seems to regret that he can not nerve himself for the plunge. Of course he is right in the ultimate sense that poetry inheres finally in the man. We can not lock Shakespeare out of "Hamlet"; Shakespeare could not lock himself out. But Mr. Newbolt seems to us ill-advised in slurring the evident and important distinction between what moves us directly through its influence on ourselves and what moves us indirectly through our sympathy with its effect on others.

Mr. Newbolt seems at times on the point of acquiescence in Croce's doctrine that the test of artistic merit is the agreement of the artist's work with the artist's intention. But Mr. Newbolt is not an Englishman for nothing; from that verge he recoils, asking with quite irrefutable force: "A work of art may be a perfect expression of the maker's feeling, but what if that feeling be a cruel, a cynical, a frivolous, or an insane feeling?" (page 353). To which nothing need be added. The exorcism of that spectre is complete.

In the first chapter of Mr. Lowes's notable book, "Convention and Revolt in Poetry," the author is troubled by the fact that in poetry the means of communication is words, and that words, unlike the things they stand for, have neither form, color, warmth, taste, nor smell (page 7). How can this be? Mr. Lowes's distress grows out of his failure to perceive that words do not give objects directly, but give meanings which do give objects, and that, while the relation of word to meaning is that of a check to its umbrella, the relation of meaning to object is that of a shadow to its substance or an echo to its sound. Now checks—with patience—will fetch umbrellas, and shadows are images of things; and those two obvious but overwhelming little facts are the quietus to all Mr. Lowes's perturbations on the subject of the arbitrariness of words. Mr. Lowes, having decided that words can not express things, decides that they express nothing but relations, and by relations he means the likenesses of which simile and metaphor are the conduits (pages 8-14). Language can not give an eye or a star, but may express their similarity; as if the relation between an unimagined eye and an unimagined star could be conveyed in any form that would have value for an art whose basis is the imagination.

After this first misadventure comes a bright and deft, but not supremely important, chapter on the "Ways of Convention," and then the book—the real book, the great book, begins. It is difficult to be patient with Mr. John Livingston Lowes. What is to be said of the sheer rapacity of a man who adds wisdom to scholarship and modernity to wisdom and equipoise to modernity and brilliancy to equipoise and geniality to brilliancy? What is to be said of the moral obliquity of a writer who robs his readers of the legitimate consolation of finding his defects in some particulars commensurate with his preëminence in others? What lastly, is to be said of a man who has packed into one book all the good things that the reviewer expected to say about poetry in the next ten years, and has rifled his existence of its meaning? It is doubtful if another American could bring an equal knowledge of the past to the assistance and support of an equal knowledge of the present. He is perhaps the single critic among us whose attitude toward innovators is wholly admirable, an attitude by which their friends and their adversaries might equally profit, and he has a smile as tolerant as Chaucer's for the queer grotesques who add themselves daily to the varicolored and noisy pilgrimage to our poetical Canterbury in this April of uncertain winds.

Mr. Lowes's cogeny is great. He forces even the born quarreler, the man who peaks and pines in the lassitude of assent, to a continuity of agreement by which he is at once astonished and provoked. One half wishes, however, that he would omit those Meredithian parallels to free verse on pages 277-279 which plague one with a fitting doubt as to his possession of the soothsaying ear. Surely that doubt is calumnious; without that gift how shall we explain that store of perfect phrase from the masters with which his memory is gemmed? We may add, much in his own vein, that the profusion of this pearl and gold in a judicial treatise strikes us as a little barbaric; a court of justice is not a cave of Aladdin.

A reader fresh from the catholicity of Mr. Lowes finds it difficult to keep step with Mr. Louis Untermeyer in the depreciation of the New England poets which occupies the foreground of his introduction. They lack "keen and racy originality," the quality that makes "the art of all great writers a human and enduring thing" (page 5). This detraction, even if successful, would be useless. On the current theory, which is undoubtedly Mr. Untermeyer's, that the fitness of literatures to peoples is a relative and a changing fitness, the soundness of yesterday is no threat to the validity of to-day. The June number of a magazine need not defend itself against the competition of the May number by assertions that the May number was vapid or droning; it has a much surer defense in the far less debatable affirmation that May is May and June is June. In any large view the generations stand or fall together; futile ancestors will have baffled descendants. God, or Nature, or Destiny, or what you will, has not begun to love this waspish little world since 1850. Not even the birth of Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee Masters has sweetened the temper of the universe. Does not Mr. Untermeyer see that if Emerson and Lowell and Whittier, in their day and in their way, really lived, the chances of a real life for Mr. Sandburg and Mr. Masters and Mr. Untermeyer, in their differing day and way, are indefinitely heightened?

We deprecate Mr. Untermeyer's causticities because it seems to us that he belies his own disposition in their utterance. In him these prickles are cutaneous; they have no roots in the large geniality of his temper. Again, one notes with interest that the same sin has different gravities in different persons. It is very wrong to enforce morals in poetry if you can offer no better excuse for this impertinence than the fact that you are Emerson or Lowell. But if you are Mr. James Oppenheim, the case is altogether different. It is regrettable that the privilege of being Mr. James Oppenheim is so unequally distributed in the United States of America.

Mr. Untermeyer's specialty is hardly thought; least of all is it analysis. Scholarship is a wrap for the aged and infirm with which his redbloodedness can cheerfully dispense. His clash with tradition now and then penetrates even to his grammar, and a profuse, hearty, jovial English does duty for style. On the other hand, his acquaintance with present-day verse is wide enough to shame other critics into a recognition of their own shortcomings. His sensibilities, naturally keen, if not subtle, have been quickened by the exercise of a poetical gift which, if somewhat overworked and undertrained, is nevertheless a true gift, revealing a frank and joyous commerce with the world as its distinctive property. This leads us to the pith of his criticism. Mr. Untermeyer is an appraiser of vitality. In the old days it was assumed that living people were alive as a matter of course, and literature undertook, not to bestow that life, but to give it shape and direction. Nowadays we have discovered that the world which physicians and biologists innocently presume to be alive is really in a state of semi-swoon or stupor, and the first object of literature is not to guide it or fashion it, but to bring it to. If your patient has fainted, the cordial is more timely than the food; above all things you must cut his stays. The matter is burlesqued a little in the above phrases, but the burlesque covers a real, if qualified, sympathy with Mr. Untermeyer's attitude in this point. The characteristic vice of æsthetic impressions—of impressions of beauty—is tenuity; the desideratum in such feelings is often, not fineness or nicety, but energy. Mr. Untermeyer tests the new poetry for life, and that touchstone, even within the confines of the newer verse, is fruitful in discriminations. Toward H. D. and the Imagists he is cool; even the homage to Miss Lowell, though ample and unhesitating, is official in tone; it reminds one of a military salute. It may be thought that Mr. Untermeyer's criteria of life and death are rough-and-ready. In some persons he mistakes the convulsive for the animated; there are other persons whom he buries alive. The writer of this article can find a good deal of vitality in his graveyard, possibly because he is an inmate of the place. After all deductions, however, our critic has done a thing that it was well to do and that only a radical could have done for radicals. For that service let our thanks be ample.

The Run of the Shelves

ERNEST DOWSON is not a wholly admirable figure. If he had added rather more than he did to the world's store of beauty, it would, of course, not have found itself particularly troubled by the helpless dissoluteness, the utter lack of purpose and of self-control that marked the thirty-three years of his life. As it is, it will not be disposed to judge him too harshly, it may well, indeed, extend its pity and a measure of gratitude; for there are plenty of "drunk and disorderlies" who contribute nothing in exchange for the nuisance they make of themselves. Dowson, at least, did something. But it is one thing to be Poe, and it is another thing to try admiringly to behave like him—and worse; it is one thing to be Keats, and quite another to be, as Arthur Symons describes Dowson, in a little volume of his "Poems and Prose" (The Modern Library: Boni and Liveright), a "demoralized Keats."

Equally not at home in England and in France, he plumbed the depths of decadence and literally ended with the century. Incapable of giving body to the vague dream of beauty that haunted him, he sought a petulant and thwarted revenge by immersing himself in the sordid. French literary cénacle and cabmen's shelter in London were alike to him, since all were nothing. "Cynara" is the poem most generally remembered, "certainly one of the greatest lyrical poems of our time . . . an intoxicating and perhaps immortal music," says Mr. Symons. But a very tawdry poem, for all that. The little "Requiem" for Neobule comes nearer, in our opinion, to an adequate expression to his very pretty and generally frustrated gift.

In his "Women Novelists" (Charles Scribner's Sons) Mr. R. Brimley Johnson undertakes the not unprofitable task of presenting the file of English women novelists from 1778 to 1876 in that solidarity always produced in women by the withdrawal of the interfering male. As critic Mr. Johnson is not authoritative; indeed his criticism, of which the due supply is punctiliously forthcoming, is mere inspectorship in which gauging and measuring take the place of sensibility. It is hard to believe that he has even applied his mind to some of his own judgments. Speaking of Miss Austen's comic figures, he says: "We laugh with the eccentricities, not at them" (page 242). Now the difficulty of laughing with Mr. Collins or Lady Catherine de Bourgh, for example, though a very simple one, is quite insuperable: Mr. Collins and Lady Catherine do not laugh. If Mr. Johnson means that we identify ourselves with these persons, he exaggerates our humility; it is as difficult to feel with Mr. Collins as to think with Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Johnson has a "Great Four," comprising Miss Burney, Miss Austen, Miss Brontë, and George Eliot. He is friendly to Miss Burney, zealous for Miss Austen, circumspect with Miss Brontë, and apprehensive of George Eliot. George Eliot's faculty, her varied executive force, is almost harassing to Mr. Johnson; he seems to view it as an incumbrance to George Eliot herself. (The luggage of women is always a distress to their male companions.) She had not so great a genius as Jane Austen or Charlotte Brontë; of that Mr. Johnson is certain (pages 208-9). She was "once acclaimed very humorous" (page 242)—sic transit gloria mundi. Mr. Johnson is more happily employed in the recall to momentary prominence of gifted writers, like Mrs. Craik, Mrs. Oliphant, and especially Miss Charlotte M. Yonge, whose fall from popularity to neglect was effected with merciless celerity. He has a good eye for critical documents; in fact he might have compiled an interesting chronicle of the rise and fall, or the flux and reflux, of these writers in critical and popular esteem. His true office in relation to these ladies is that of escort.

The grouping of these novelists calls attention to an unusual trait or contrast of traits which many of the leaders illustrate. Revolt and check—strong revolt kept in hand by stronger authority—is almost the peculiarity of the clan. Even in Maria Edgeworth and Jane Austen the potential rebellion is discernible. Both wrote decorous—ultra-decorous—novels, yet both showed a vigor of satiric impulse which, in another time, another race, or another sex, might have overturned decorums. Mrs. Shelley, who defied society in her elopement with a married man, lived to write the romance of "Frankenstein," which upheld, to quote her own words, "the excellence of universal virtue." The Brontë sisters, Charlotte and Emily, wrote novels equally remarkable for daring and the arrest of daring, novels in which a passionate originality bows finally to the restraints of a Yorkshire parsonage. George Eliot's case, probably the most signal of its kind in history, hardly calls for discussion. Never did emancipation go so far only to find itself halted and turned back by refusals peremptory enough for a Scotch Calvinist or a Massachusetts Puritan. Even Mrs. Ward, whom Mr. Johnson does not touch, exhibits traces of the same anomaly. Her fame began with a novel whose radicalism extorted a polite rebuke from the leader of political liberals, Mr. Gladstone; at the present date the securities, including perhaps the sobrieties and gentilities, would claim her as a valuable ally. The examples seem too numerous to be accidental. View these women novelists as disciples and subjects, and you are struck by their independence; view them as rebels and protestants, and you marvel at their conformity. The double temper is possibly explicable by the sex; perhaps it relates itself to the life of an island people, a people to whom the call of the sea is excelled or equaled by only one other force—the call of the port.

"A Treasury of War Poetry" (Houghton Mifflin) appears in Second Series, under the editorship of Prof. George Herbert Clarke. It is a treasury, filled with banners, various and splendid, and if a little faded by the passage of only a few months, still capable of stirring and summoning. It would be rash to say that there is a single great poem in the collection, but with such a record the future will never be forced to wonder what it felt like to live the war. As to what it was fought for, the poets are a good deal clearer than the politicians.

The reflux of British interest and sympathy into ante-bellum channels may be mildly presaged in the publication of the "Life and Letters of William Thomson, Archbishop of York" (John Lane Company), prepared with taste and affection by Ethel H. Thomson, his daughter-in-law. The appeal of such a book will be mostly to the fellow-citizens and fellow-believers of the kind Archbishop who was successful for twenty-eight zealous years in reconciling manliness with a cassock and modesty with a throne. An American will linger a little over the signature, "W. Ebor," in which the shortened form of the Latin rendering of York (Eboracum) hides the homespun name of Thomson in the amplitude of its spreading train of historical associations. Ritualism is a conspicuous topic in the book, and, from the standing-ground of 1919, one looks back with a mixture of envy, pity, and astonishment at the seeming beatitude of a time and class which resorted to points of vesture and gesture to supply its demand for conflict and excitement. One is reminded of the early prosperous days of the Vicar of Wakefield in which the migration from the blue bed to the brown assumed the magnitude of an event. The Vicar's family, like England in our time, had its terrible awakening. Will the new time be restorative of the old values? One would be glad to know if the Primroses, in their old age, amid the fading memories of the anguish which had convulsed the family life, ever reinstated in its old significance the annual transition from the blue bed to the brown.

In the latest text-book on American history, published in the year 1918, is a paragraph on "The Meaning of Land Ownership," in which the authors tell us that "the peasants of Europe were also engaged in tilling the soil [though] very few of them owned outright the fields they tilled. It was otherwise in the colonies." Later, in a section on "Land Ownership and Liberty," they say further that "the embattled farmers" were "free landowning citizens" who "paid tribute to no barons of the soil." In general they leave the impression upon the mind of the reader, in most cases a young pupil attaining his first knowledge of American history, that in colonial America every man owned the land he tilled in full and absolute title and was the greater lover of liberty because of that fact. While the connection between landowning and liberty, as these authors state it, is somewhat problematical in view of the known conservatism of the landowning classes, and while it is idle to quarrel with those who would dignify every revolutionary radical and agitator as a lover of liberty, we do take exception to their statement that every American colonist was the owner of the lands he occupied and cultivated.

The authors of this text-book, and others of like minds, will do well to study carefully a work that has just been issued by the Yale Press, entitled "The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies," by Professor Beverley W. Bond, Jr., there to discover that outside of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, not a colonist legally owned an acre of the land he held, and that thousands of them, either willingly or unwillingly, paid "tribute" in the form of a quit-rent to "barons of the soil." Whether this payment to the king in the royal colonies or to proprietors elsewhere played any very vital part in checking or increasing the spirit of independence or is deserving of any great amount of consideration at the hands of the historian is not the question. The point is that such a quit-rent existed and was paid by thousands of the "embattled farmers." It is high time that the writers of our text-books and others with more ambitious literary pretensions familiarized themselves with the facts regarding our colonial land-system, if they intend to write about it, and to all such we recommend Professor Bond's book as an admirable source of information.

Among the books of Henry Holt and Company's Autumn list are "Colas Breugnon," Romain Rolland's first novel since "Jean-Christophe," DeMorgan's "Old Madhouse" and Inez Haynes Irwin's "The Happy Years," a new Phoebe and Ernest book.

It All Depends

Both in this country and in Canada the volume of outcries against what is termed the suppression of radical publications has been increasing among those who are pleased to call themselves revolutionaries. During the war the Governments of both countries in general and their post office departments in particular were the targets of bitter denunciation for their refusal to allow certain publications the use of the mails; among them Socialist periodicals that were believed to have given proof of opposing enlistment and obstructing the pushing of the war against Germany.

The seizing of power by the Bolsheviks has called forth legislation aimed to prevent the introduction of Bolshevism here. Although their control of Russia itself is anything but secure, the Bolsheviks have been boasting that they would make it hot for other countries, and there is not lacking proof that they have been sending funds to America and Canada to produce similar revolutionary movements. The sudden springing into existence here of Bolshevik periodicals evidences a campaign of agitation.

These periodicals, as well as certain native weeklies, have been declaiming against the Government for what they call its tyranny in adopting laws directed against freedom of the press and freedom of speech. In this cry the Socialists, have vehemently joined—widely split as they now are into Right and Left wings. At the same time they are doing or trying to do more in the way of censorship than the Government ever ventured to do. Before the split, the press of the pro-Bolshevik wing was full of charges that the regular Socialist newspapers refused to publish notices of its meetings and proceedings, and such charges were not unfounded. The regular Socialists now retort that if the Lefts ever obtained majority power or rule by force they would ruthlessly suppress all moderate Socialist publications, as they have done in Russia. But whatever the two factions may do and say among themselves, both assume the rôle, before the great outside public, of being valiant defenders of the complete freedom of the press against what they denounce as reactionary forces.

Such professed solicitude for both the abstract and the practical rights of freedom has a most touching quality, and easily imposes upon the unsophisticated. No agency, in point of fact, has been as rigorous and arrogant a suppressor of a free press as this self-same Socialist party. Before the war, it was vigorously suppressing; and the precedents it then instituted still remain as precedents to be similarly exercised whenever its leaders think it expedient. The case of the New Review is an exemplification of this policy.

The New Review was an independent Socialist periodical founded in New York City in 1912 by Herman Simpson, William English Walling, Alexander H. Fraser, Bertha W. Howe, and others, all of whom were then members of the party in good standing. In its issue of August, 1913, the New Review published an article entitled "Danger Ahead," which showed that the membership of the party was declining at an alarming rate, that in a single year 50,000 dues-paying members, or about two-fifths of the entire enrollment had deserted. The figures were in fact taken from the Party Builder, the official organ of the party's National Executive Committee. But as published in that journal, their significance, owing to the obscure way in which the matter was put, was not easily visible, even to party members. Moreover, it was supposed that few outside the Socialist party ever read these dry, formal statements. But the article in the New Review was full, explicit, and conspicuously featured. It pointed out that this great defection was in large measure due to a constitutional clause forced through the Indianapolis Socialist National Convention in 1912 by Mr. Hillquit, Mr. Berger, and other leaders which provided for the expulsion of any member advocating sabotage. While the editors of the New Review likewise opposed the use of sabotage, they believed that the passage of the constitutional clause was unwarranted and unnecessary. The bureaucrats, naturally, could not deny the accuracy of the facts which the New Review had published. What enraged them was the "exposure" and the extent of public attention which it attracted. But in addition they had long resented independence of spirit within the party, and they now determined, by stifling the New Review, to discourage the starting of any similar periodicals.

The Central Committee of Local New York thereupon passed a formal resolution boycotting and blacklisting the New Review. This proscriptive order barred not merely the issue containing the article to which objection was raised. It prohibited the sale and circulation at Socialist party meetings of all future issues, notwithstanding the contributors of the New Review were leading Socialists in many countries. What the order signified was the assumption of a hierarchy to dictate to members and prospective members what they should and should not read. Yet the claim could not be substantiated that the sole object was to circulate exclusively Socialist matter. At one juncture, when it suited the designs of certain of the leaders, the entire national machinery of the party was used to boost the circulation and sale of the Metropolitan Magazine, a non-Socialist publication. The mailing lists of the party were placed at the disposal of the business office of that magazine, and members were employed as canvassers to drum up subscriptions within the party ranks. The nominal justification for this promotion was that the magazine contained a series of articles by Mr. Hillquit. But the subscriptions solicited were not for these few issues, but for six months or an entire year.

Just what the order against the New Review did may best be gathered from extracts of a written protest sent, on September 24, 1913, by the New Review Publishing Association:

To the Central Committee of Local New York, N. Y. City. Comrades: Through the Socialist press and otherwise it has come to the notice of the Board of Directors of the New Review Publishing Association that the Central Committee of Local New York (Manhattan) has promulgated an order forbidding the Branches of the Local from selling or distributing The New Review at public or propaganda meetings.

While comprehending perfectly the motives underlying this order, the Board of Directors of The New Review Publishing Association desires to protest vigorously against it. The members of the Board, who are also members of the Socialist Party, deny the right of any authority in the party, even the highest, to dictate to the smallest subdivision of the party what kind of Socialist literature it may or may not use in the propaganda of Socialism. This Board regards the action of the Central Committee as a usurpation of authority, which, if permitted to stand, threatens to destroy within the party all freedom of speech or press and to suppress all honest and free discussion.

Free speech and free press are the most fundamental of all democratic rights, antedating the birth of the Socialist movement, and no progressive movement, least of all the labor movement or the Socialist Party, can thrive without the freest discussion of principles, policies, tactics and methods of procedure.

It has been asserted that this act of the Central Committee is not a violation of free press because it relates only to public meetings. The members of this Board deny that any valid distinction can be drawn between propaganda and other meetings. In the first place, the sale and distribution of literature takes place almost exclusively at propaganda meetings; hence to prohibit the sale of The New Review or any other publication at such propaganda meetings is equivalent to prohibiting its sale at practically all meetings. Secondly, to prohibit a minority from disseminating its views among those not yet members of the party is practically to prohibit that minority from propagating the ideas of Socialism in accordance with its own lights.

The protest concluded by demanding that "the high-handed and usurpatory order in question be reconsidered and rescinded." It was complacently ignored, not only by the body to which it was addressed, but by the whole Socialist party and its regular press. The very Socialist newspapers and periodicals which later, during the war, shrieked about governmental "violation of freedom of the press," had not a single word of condemnation to say on this occasion. To them the expurgation of the New Review was a perfectly proper and necessary demonstration of Socialist party discipline, and they stoutly defended it as such. But the main justification given was that the New Review was tacitly siding with the believers in sabotage. This was a pretext, as events proved. Less than four years later, when German agents were instigating the sabotaging of industrial plants here, a resolution was passed, in a formal national committee meeting, revising its attitude on sabotage.

Proscriptive tactics of this nature have been carried further by Lenin and Trotsky. Having the power to decree anything they please, they have suppressed, not merely bourgeois and moderate Socialist publications, but also trade-union magazines. One instance of many is the following decree published in the Bolshevik organ, Bednota, September 17, 1918:

Suppression of the newspapers.—The Department of the press decides definitely to suppress the following magazines, which stirred up agitation and made appeals to the upsetting of the power of the Soviets. They are: The Professional Union, The Typographer, and the newspaper, The Free Voice of Labor.

The list of publications suppressed by the Bolsheviks is a long one. No printed matter of any kind disapproved by the Bolshevik rulers, whether newspapers,

(Continued on page 264)

Over Forty Years Ago

As early as 1888 Francis B. Crocker and Schuyler S. Wheeler conducted electrical experiments which later led to their association in the organized firm of Crocker-Wheeler.

Professor Crocker and Dr. Wheeler are still associated in the management of the Crocker-Wheeler Company.

Both are past presidents of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers.

And they still continue their work broadly in the Electrical Industry.

Schuyler S. Wheeler
President

Crocker-Wheeler Co.
Ampere, N. J.

NEW YORK
BOSTON
SYRACUSE
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
BIRMINGHAM

PITTSBURGH
NEWARK
NEW HAVEN
PHILADELPHIA
BALTIMORE
SAN FRANCISCO

TIFFANY & CO.

JEWELRY SILVERWARE WATCHES CLOCKS STATIONERY

PRODUCTS OF DISTINCTION

PURCHASES MAY BE MADE BY MAIL

FIFTH AVENUE & 37TH STREET
NEW YORK

THE PROBLEM OF THE PACIFIC.

By Mr. C. BRUNSDON FLETCHER, a prominent Australian journalist.

"The only way to make the Pacific safe," says SIR WM. MACGREGGOR in the preface, "is to keep political Germany out of it."

"A helpful contribution to the understanding of an important subject."—The Sun. $3.00

FIFTY YEARS OF EUROPE (1870-1919).

By CHARLES DOWNER HAZEN:

The author of "Europe Since 1815," etc., writes of that period between the Franco-Prussian and World wars when the shadow of the former and the dread of the latter hovered over the minds of men. Maps. $2.50

"A masterly study of a period that, in importance, is without a rival in the annals of modern Europe . . . will bear reading and rereading . . . it informs and interests, it will have the effect of inducing even the least serious of its readers to think."—N. Y. Times.

MAIN CURRENTS OF SPANISH LITERATURE.

By J. D. M. FORD, of Harvard.

Present interest in Ibanez, Benavente, and other Spanish writers makes this book especially timely. It also pays attention to the work of writers of Spanish America. Given as lectures, the chapters retain the directness, simplicity and interest of the spoken word. 284 pages. $2.00

HENRY HOLT & CO.

19 WEST 44th ST., NEW YORK CITY

(Continued from page 262)

magazines, books, or pamphlets, is allowed. The suppression is not merely temporary, it represents a permanent and implacable policy, attended by summary shootings. It has been hailed with delight by the Left wing of the Socialist party in the United States, which declares it "a necessity of class warfare." The Right wing, although disapproving of the suppression of moderate Socialist newspapers, strongly relishes the suppression of all "bourgeois" publications. Yet facts such as these make no impressions upon the gullibles who, taken in by a flow of professions, rush forward to represent the radical press here as victims of a grinding governmental oppression.

GUSTAVUS MYERS

Books Received

FICTION

- Aikman, Henry G. The Groper. Boni and Liveright. $1.60.
Emerson, Willis George. The Man Who Discovered Himself. Forbes & Co. $1.50.
Goodman, Daniel Carson. The Taker. Boni and Liveright. $1.75.
Locke, W. J. Far-Away Stories. John Lane. $1.50 net.
Off Duty. Compiled by Wilhelmina Harper. Century. $1.50.
Tarkington, Booth. Ramsay Milholland. Doubleday-Page. $1.50 net.

Weyl, Maurice. The Choice. Mitchell Kennerley. $1.50.

GOVERNMENT AND ECONOMICS

- Fitzpatrick, Edward A. Budget Making in a Democracy. Macmillan. $1.50.
Kalau, Maximo M. Self-Government in the Philippines. Century. $1.50.
Purinton, Edward Earle. Personal Efficiency in Business. McBride. $1.60 net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

- Edwards, William J. Twenty-five Years in the Black Belt. Cornhill Co. $1.25.
Hershey, Amos S., and Susanne W. Modern Japan. Bobbs-Merrill. $1.50 net.
Power, Rhoda. Under the Bolshevik Reign of Terror. McBride. $2.00 net.

POETRY AND DRAMA

- A Treasury of War Poetry. Second Series. Houghton Mifflin. $1.50.
Dowson, Ernest., Poems and Prose of. The Modern Library. Boni and Liveright. 70 cents net.
Drinkwater, John. Abraham Lincoln, a Play. Houghton Mifflin. $1.25.
Hagboldt, Peter. The Test. Cornhill Co. $1.25.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

- Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World. Century. $5.00.
Kelman, Rev. Dr. John. The War and Preaching. Yale University Press. $1.25.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Gillian, Strickland. A Sample Case of Humor. Forbes & Co. $1.25.
Husband, Joseph. A Year in the Navy. Houghton Mifflin. $1.35.
Symons, Arthur. Studies in the Elizabethan Drama. Dutton. $3.50 net.
Tompkins, Raymond S. The Story of the Rainbow Division. Boni and Liveright. $1.60.

Trevelyan, G. M. Scenes from Italy's War. Houghton Mifflin. $3.50.

The London Spectator Welcomes The Review

